To rule means to enforce one's will, to impose it, by some means, upon others, and this includes, first, the ability to form independent judgments, and, secondly, power. Judgment depends upon intelligence and knowledge, and the courage to make use of these qualities, and power consists of the possession of means which cannot be resisted. The masses of the people have never possessed either, although they are better off in this respect today than they ever were before. They are on the way to acquire both in a degree which will enable them to rule themselves, and that will be the beginning of their world-rule.

At present, however, they do not possess that measure of intelligence and knowledge which would enable them to form correct independent judgments of their own regarding the affairs of society, neither do they command the means by which to impose their will upon society, that is, to rule it. Therefore a majority vote today is not an expression of the true independently formed judgment of that majority. It signifies nothing more than the the fact that a majority of voters have adopted certain opinions of others, better able to judge than they themselves, as most likely to represent their interests. For behind every such social idea looms a material interest which endeavors to enlist the public powers in its service, and this is the essence of all practical politics.

In order to form correct judgments in political matters the working people must understand their common economic interests; in other words, they must find out their real position in society. And in order to enforce their own will, based on such understanding and knowledge, they must develop a vivid public spirit and solidarity which will enable them to act in common, to combine all their individual forces and powers for the advancement of their collective interests.

Though ours is pre-eminently an age of collective forces, there is still a large field for individual action and initiative: the field of thought. We are all called upon to do our own thinking, for nobody else can do it for us; and to be merely the echo of another man's thought is to be his intellectual slave.

True democracy—economic as well as political—cannot be brought about, and placed upon a solid footing, without intelligent, well-informed and independently judging masses of people who have the courage to stand by their judgments, and rely upon and enforce them, and proudly bear the responsibility for their actions.

It is easy to advocate the collective ownership of the means of production and distribution by all the people—which is true democracy—but how many are there among us who fully realize the gigantic task involved in it? And it is the people who will have to perform it, the same people, mark you, who today are still the slaves of ancient superstitions and the defenders of institutic analyzed prejudices and conventional lies. To educate them, to raise them to an intellectual level which will find them capable of not only producing the wealth of society, but also directing it into channels beneficial to all, is the most important duty of Socialists, and not only a duty, but an honor and a pleasure.—Buffalo Socialist.

TOWARD A NEW CIVILIZATION.

It is a great mistake, often made by superficial observers of the Socialist movement, to assume that Socialism can only thrive on misery, and the conclusion at which such critics arrive is that persons in tolerably good circumstances need not be, and very rarely will be, Socialists. As a matter of fact, however, it is just the better situated workmen who constitute the backbone of this movement and are the most active and enthusiastic exponents of its ideas.

Misery may be, and usually is, the background of a popular economic movement, but the impetus of such a movement proceeds from an intelligent understanding of the tendencies of a given time, and such understanding is as a rule not the outcome or the companion of misery.

A great movement, in order to become great and efficient, needs an amazing amount of human energy and sound knowledge, and these are just the things which poorly paid and poorly nourished and ill-educated men and women are usually lacking. The only desire of the very poor is individually to get rid of their misery, or, at least, to mitigate it to some extent in the shortest possible way, without any consideration for common interests whatever. To take advantage of even the slightest chance offered to improve their individual lot, often at the cost of some of their still more unfortunate companions in misery, is their only aim to which every thought of solidarity is sacrificed.

And you cannot blame them for doing so, since you have proclaimed in thunderous tones that self-preservation is the first law of life.

But while fully recognizing the desperate position of people so situated, and heartily sympathizing with their efforts to gain whatever advantage opportunity may offer them, we cannot help emphasizing the fact that this temper does not in itself build up a strong social movement, nor provide the means of maintaining it. It takes people whose material circumstances enable them to devote a considerable amount of their time and energy and means toward the advancement of common interests and purposes to create such a movement and make it effective.

On the other hand, it must be understood that the aim of Socialism is not merely to abolish poverty and its fearful consequences, but to bring about a new civilization which will humanize all relations of men and put social economics on a basis of the highest efficiency. It will end the despotism which poverty as well as the acquisition of property exercises over man today—a despotism that rules the masses with fear of misery, and the rich with the goad of ambition and avarice, and makes all of us slaves of that barbarous habit of rating men, not for character, intelligence and moral standard—but for wealth.

Socialism realizes that in modern society the main object of everyone is the acquisition of as much wealth as he can get, and that every human consideration is subordinated to that aim. The result is a state of affairs in which man, instead of being the master of his tool, money, is its slave, is the tool of his tool.

Socialism recognizes the fact that the concentration of wealth in the hands or under the control of a few becomes the most important instrument of power, politically and socially, by which its possessors govern society absolutely, and make the dependent masses virtually their subjects. And this concentration of wealth also becomes an obstacle to further economic development in as much as it militates against the full utilization of the economic resources of society for the common benefit.

Socialism will remove all the social—and therefore preventable—causes of material and intellectual poverty, of social and moral slavery, of physical and spiritual misery, and it is therefore the ideal, not only of the destitute masses, but of the intellectual elite of modern society. It is the ideal of all who wish to see civilization to become what it ought to be, the social expression of the highest endeavors of man in every sphere of life and throught.—Exchange.

FOR A "MESS OF POTTAGE."

The Canton newspapers of December 20th contained a statement that Andrew Carnegie had contributed $1,750 to the fund raised by the First Presbyterian church of this city for the purchase of the new pipe organ which was dedicated Sunday, December 15th. The article further stated that "the gift of the Carnegie corporation is in line with Carnegie's general philanthropical work. He has a special fund for the aid of churches throughout the country in need of organs.

When the germs of Carnegieism and Morganism and Rockefellerism and Capitalism generally enter a church at the front door, religion must, of necessity, go out at the back door. To acknowledge the gift of the tainted, polluted, bloodstained money of Carnegie, wrung from the sweat, the hopes and the lives of the people he has robbed, is equivalent to serving notice to the world that the church so accepting it is no longer an instrument for the teaching of the doctrines of Christ, but an institution for the worship of Mammon.

The churches of this country are becoming entirely too much Morganized, Carnegieized and Rockefellerized to be regarded as institutions for the uplift of the human race and for spreading the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The donations made to churches by the great capitalists of this country for pipe organs and endowments of various kinds are given for the purpose of deadening the conscience and silencing the voice of the ministry and priesthood and causing the people to forget the real iniquity that lies back of it all.

By accepting such gifts, the churches either knowingly or through ignorance become the subservient tools of the capitalist system that is grinding the fact of the working class. What minister, what priest could denounce the iniquities of the predatory rich of this country after accepting from them great donations or endowments for the benefit of their church?

The silence and inactivity of the ministry and priesthood on the great problems confronting the world today have already been interpreted by the criminal rich and the oppressors of men and the upholders of injustice and the workers of iniquity as God's sanction to wrong. The time is coming soon when the ministry and priesthood must take an unmistakable stand on this great battle now raging between the rich and the poor of our nation, or their sincerity will be doubted by the oppressors as well as the oppressed.

Jesus was ever on the side of the poor and the oppressed and against the exploiters of men and He lashed the money changers and the thieves and robbers out of God's temple. By accepting these pipe organ donations we are inviting the thieves and robbers into God's temple and driving the poor and the oppressed out of God's temple. If the tones coming from the pipe organs which Carnegie has donated to the various churches could be dissolved into their original elements, you would hear nothing but heart sobs, wails of distress, the shrieks and cries of the 600,000 victims annually killed and mangled in the industrial system of America. That might possibly give some idea of the accursed method by which Carnegie has obtained the money with which he is today polluting the churches. The acceptance of such gifts from men who have blasted the hopes and destroyed the lives of the poor and oppressed is an insult in the face of God and takes away the liberty of the church to criticize its alleged benefactor. The moral support of capitalism by the church and its endeavor to keep the working class of this country in the grip of plutocracy is atheism and infidelity to God of the rankest type.

In the days of Pharaoh the priests and the false prophets lived upon the alms of the rich and flattered and betrayed the working class according as they were fed.

At Ahab's table sat 400 of these fellows—"subservience to the powerful had made them liars." These false prophets always sided with the rich. They shut their eyes to the social conditions of the people and they did not attack the sins of their day. Those who have become immensely rich by the process of exploitation are using every means within their power to stilt the voice of the ministry and priesthood and prevent them from crying out against the great wrongs they have committed.

Let us hope and pray that the time is not here and that it may never come when the ministry and priesthood of America will "live upon the alms of the rich and flatter and betray the working class according as they are fed," or pipe organs donated.—Allen Cook (Canton, Ohio, Daily News.)

POINTED PARAGRAPHS ILLUSTRATING SOCIAL CONDITIONS AND SHOWING WHY SOCIALISTS ORGANIZE TO END THEM.

The man who says "It can't be done" is liable to be interrupted by somebody doing it.

In the same way the "anti" who cries "Socialism is impossible" is being bumped every day by evidences of its possibility.

With the men it's a long time between thinks.

In 1860 there were but two millionaires in the United States and no tramps.

Today there are 35,000 millionaires and 3,000,000 tramps, and the country is seething with industrial unrest.

Millionaires don't make a rich nation.

The more there are of them the greater is the general poverty.

On June 30, 1812, the old-age pensioners in Australia numbered close upon 80,000.

As the total population of the commonwealth is over five millions, these figures are strikingly arrestive.

They indicate the magnificent prospects which confront individuals under a so-called individualistic system which permits the majority to produce the wealth of the country and a few to grab it.

There is only one short cut to Socialism—that is, to cut short the flow of profits into the hands of non-producers.

The greatest war the world has ever seen is between Capital and Labor—for it is a war of centuries; it is a war of five continents; it is a war hemispheric.

Socialism stands for construction; that's why it abhors international wars, which signify destruction.

The gospel of Socialism is the most hopeful ever preached.

When people are happy they will avoid the wrong, which brings unhappiness.

Under capitalism the spoilers have carriages and the toilers ambulances.

No man can become a capitalist by his own labor.

This is the outstanding fact about capitalism, which shows what a gigantic robbery it is.

Capitalists became the "upper class" by mounting the backs of the workers.

Only two classes in the community count—the producers and the non-producers. Labor represents the former class.

Society may be roughly divided as follows: Seventy per cent, wages workers, including civil servants, 25 per cent small capitalists (like shopkeepers, farmers, professional men), and 5 per cent large capitalists and loafers.

The small capitalists do their share of work, but much of it is misdirected. The large capitalists mostly live on profits, rent, interest and dividends, and what little work they do is generally harmful to society.

The deadliest enemy of the home is the landlord. The boss is another. Socialism would banish both.

The desire of every man to be his own boss is a natural one.

That is why the private employer is unnatural.

When the machinery of production and distribution is collectively owned and controlled every man will be his own boss.

The insectibane of Socialism will destroy the bugs of industry—the parasites who live on rents, interest, profits and unnecessary work.

Invention is increasing unemployment in two ways. It is enabling more people to live on dividends, for great inventions are usually put on the market by joint stock companies. It is also depriving a number of workers of their means of livelihood.

The world will not benefit to any extent by improved machinery till industry is socialized. Then the output of wealth will increase to such an extent that there will be enough for all, and as all will be employed the hours of labor can be reduced by half.

Many wealthy people are Socialists. They see in Socialism a fuller life for every man, woman and child. It can hurt none, for none will want under Socialism, and it can brighten the lives of many millions.

The class struggle is evident on all sides. The snarl of the boss or mistress, the ever-threatening sack, the sack itself, the speeding-up, the sacrifice of the children—these are common manifestations of the struggle.

Without education in working class ideas and ideals the workers remain children until they die, bluffed throughout life by a parasitic capitalism.

Socialism means securing to every man the results of his own industry.

The only people who can consistently object to that are those who believe in securing the results of other people's industry.—New York Daily People.

ONE LOOMING ISSUE TO BE SETTLED.

The railroads "are resigned" to have their properties physically valued.

But—

"The railroad men urgently request that the valuation be carefully made and that the law be framed for the protection of all concerned."

So runs the word from Washington.

Which, being interpreted, means that the railroads are hopeful of getting the valuation made by friendly hands and so carefully done that the wind and water won't show.

That, men and brethren, forecasts a nifty little issue during the coming years.

For don't forget that in each $150 of annual transportation tax levied by the railroads on the average American family of five, there is reason to believe that $100 represents a surtax added to the cost of living for the enrichment of men who did not give a full or fair equivalent.

It represents capitalized pull, capitalized privilege, rather than money or energy directly invested.

It represents pretty pieces of paper held by banks for collateral or speculative loans as well as securities in the hands of innocent widows and orphans.

It is a "pillar" in the temple of our "prosperity" which must not be shaken by any blind Samson lest the structure topple and all be buried in its ruins.

Yet—

There are many millions of widows and orphans, or women who may become widows, and little children who may at any time become orphans who are living on the ragged edge of want. wtihout a penny against a rainy day, and aren't they, also, entitled to consideration?

To continue to tax them on the inflated holdings of the privileged few is to prolong into endless time the injustice under which they now suffer.

A physical valuation that should put a seal of sanction upon the accumulated pillage of the careless past would suit to a nicety the comfortable gentlemen in whose pockets the bulk of it bulges.

But would it be an end of agitation or a solvent of unrest?

We guess this issue, also, will have to be settled right.—Labor World, Duluth.

THE STRIKE at the Beaver mine at Cobalt, Ontario, has been settled.

CHARLES P. NEILL is being fought for the office of Labor Commissioner. Neill, in his official capacity, exposed the brutal conditions under which women and children worked in the mills of the South, and the southern senators who are dominated by the economical interests of their masters, who own the mills, are after the scalp of Dr. Neill.

JOHN P. MORGAN died last week in Rome, Italy. The working people are not lamenting the passing away of America's industrial despot and financial king.

Another czar will take his place, and the successor of Morgan will be just as brutal in the exaction of profit as the man who formerly wielded the money scepter of America. Some time the people will overthrow the hellish system that breeds a billionaire and a tramp.

REV. W. B CALL, chaplain at the St. Quenten prison, California, has been discharged on the grounds of being a grafter and a swindler.

The representative of Christ made a business of filching money from the prisoners, under the pretense that he would use his influence in their behalf but Call got the money and forgot to use his influence.

Even in this age of greed, the preacher with his eyes on heaven, falls a victim to the love of "filthy lucre."

THE SOCIALISTS in all parts of the country have drafted resolutions demanding the liberation of "Mother Jones."

As "Mother" Jones has been given her liberty, the Socialists should carry on a campaign that will wipe out the hellish industrial system that furnishes the armed power of a state to mine operators to suppress labor.

Any system that puts a woman of four-score years in a military bastile, is damnable, and a blot on our so-called boasted civilization.

DISTRICT ORGANIZER MARION COPE is carrying on the open meetings under the auspices of the Western Federation of Miners with great success and is securing many new members. Meetings are to be held during the present week at different points over the district. Monday night a big meeting was held in Webb City, Tuesday night at Carterville, and Wednesday night another meeting will be held in Joplin at 620 Main street. At the meeting last Friday night in Webb City a rousing time was had and twenty-odd applications were received. O. A. Mattingly and Marion Cope were the chief speakers.—Missouri Trades-Unionist, Joplin.

THE AVERAGE membership of the American Federation of Labor for the fiscal year 1912, as reported to the Rochester convention by Secretary Morrison, was 1,774,760. The average membership for the first five months of the present fiscal year, October to February inclusive, shows an increase of 172,527, or a grand average paid membership on February 28, 1913, of 1,947,287. The month of January was the banner month in the history of the Federation, the paid membership for that month reaching 1,979,420. This latter figure is closely closely hugging the 2,000,000 mark, for with but the addition of 20,580 members for January the goal would have been reached. The organizing campaign of the American Federation of Labor is adding members, and it is confidently expected that the prediction made last fall that a prodigious growth would be made in the coming year will be realized and the membership roll permanently fixed beyond the 2,000,000 mark.

JOHN P. WHITE of the United Mine Workers of America, is hopeful of bringing about an amicable settlement of the coal strike in West Virginia.

The settlement with the Paint Creek Collieries Company, in which settlement 4,000 of the strikers returned to work, indicates that matters are moving favorably for the strikers.

In the settlement the main demands of the miners were granted and the break in the ranks of the mine operators is looked upon as indicating a settlement that will cover the strike zone of West Virginia.

The strikers have made a heroic fight and are determined that victory shall be theirs.

GOD BLESS old Mother Jones, "the angel of the miners," and may her present suffering and danger enable the miners to win their strike and obtain a chance to live a slightly more human life at once; and may the miners of America soon heed her bugle call to vote their complete emancipation by putting the Socialist party into power.

Mother Jones is worth more than ten million parasitic butterflies of fashion; her political intelligence surpasses that of millions of American men, and her fearless, measureless love for human beings and burning passion for social justice shames a hundred thousand ministers. She is God's great ministering angel, the incarnate spirit of motherhood, a mighty prophetess of the coming reign of justice, love, and joy.—Christian Socialist.

THE I. W. W. "GENERAL STRIKE" of the tailors in Seattle took the following chronological order:

First day, member discharged;
Second day, pickets arrested;
Third day, general strike called;
Fourth day, appeal for a sympathetic strike of A. F. of L. unions;
Fifth day, appeal for funds;
Sixth day, strike collapses.

History will record this industrial upheaval in which seventy-one men and one woman participated as another of the strikes "the I.W.W. never lost." Verily, it is to laugh!—The Timber Worker, Seattle.

It is very probable that when the next issue of Spokane Sewer appears, there will be a lengthy article dripping with slime, telling how the A. F. of L. scabbed on the tailors of Seattle. The "Slander Syndicate" is a stranger to truth and an ingrate, even to those who have been so foolish as to contribute to the soup fund.

IN THIS ISSUE of the Miners' Magazine appears an article taken from the Tacoma Ledger of Tacoma, Washington, in which article it is reported that Joseph Ettor of I. W. W. fame, returned to his father's home after an absence of six years.

We have published the article in the Magazine in order that the members of the Western Federation of Miners may know that Ettor, whose heart bleeds for the poverty-stricken wretches of wage slavery, seems to enjoy the luxury of high living with a feeling of satisfaction that will compare favorably with the epicurean tastes of that aristocracy whom he has so often flailed with the most vigorous diction of the English language, and when he failed to give expression to his pent-up wrath in English against plutocracy, he resorted to the language of his fatherland to scourge the soulless exploiters, whose bank accounts were built on the surplus proceeds of ill-paid toil.

Ettor, according to the Tacoma Ledger, enjoyed the cushioned seats of the Pullman, and the menu of the dining car was fully appreciated by this proletaire who has been shouting for One Big Union—One Big Soup House.

It is somewhat strange how a proletaire of the I. W. W. can become a glutton and gorge himself on aristocratic fodder, when fortune favors him with the opportunity. "Nuf ced."

THE STRIKE at Britannia mines and Beach remains unchanged. After four weeks the company has failed to make any appreciable progress. Information received from reliable sources shows the company to have between forty and fifty men working, practically all of whom are foreigners, the company being unable to get any English-speaking strikebreakers.

One of the company's agents attempted to send men from Portland, Oregon, to work at the mine, but he met with very little success. Two men sent by this agent arrived in Vancouver about ten days ago. They were sent here in ignorance of the fact that a strike was on, and on arriving in Vancouver and hearing about the strike refused to act as strikebreakers. The local union paid their expenses while here, and sent them back to Seattle.

Some more of these agents are trying to create the impression around the city that there is no strike, but naturally the public refuse to believe this, as the strike is well advertised.

The foreman at the Lunnell camp has quit his job. All men with any principle refuse to handle men who act as strikebreakers.

From the present outlook the Britannia Mining Company will not pay such large dividends as they did last year.

Employment agents in the city are striving hard to send men to work at the mine, but their efforts have been in vain.—B. C. Federationist.

DO YOU HEAR IT? It is the wind shaking with an ominous rustle, the leaves of the fear-haunted woodland! It is the first breath of the gale of the future, stirring vaguely the quiet somnolence of the underbrush; it is the virgin sign of freedom in the vast forest of the world, as she receives on her pensive forehead the kiss of the impetuous Aeolus.

Do you hear it? It is the wild wind rending to tatters an unseen mantle in the hollows of the sleeping hills, the flame-like force of the idea blowing in gusts through the thickly clustering branches of the mighty nations, a wilderness of souls; it is the first blast that shakes the oak trees; it is the unloosening of the hurricane; sweeping away, through the ravines and upon the peaks, the dim haze of sterile resignation.

Warm and fruitful breeze, pass through the forest. Each leaf that you touch is a voice newly born; each branch that you stir is an arm that takes up a weapon—a voice that shall join the heroic concert to salute the bright morning of emancipation—a strong arm that shall stretch itself forth to find the breast of a tyrant!

It is the breath of the revolution!

Do you feel it? It is the upheaving of the granite, under the hills, which is crumbling to pieces, beaten by the iron fists of Pluto; it is the bleeding heart of the world throbbing beneath its titanic chest; it is the white hot spirit of a giant who breaks from his hateful prison and hurls into space the words of flame.

It is the rumbling of the earthquake that announces the full bursting forth of the crater.

Do you feel it? It is the reverberation made by the mighty hammers of the gods striking at the very bottom of the abyss. It is new life that is being born in the depths of the black whirlpool—life that causes a shudder of fear, even in the asylum of Death where the invisible vampires reign.

Listen!

It is the revolution which is advancing.—From the Spanish of Praxedis G. Guerrero, the heroic martyr of the Mexican revolution. (Translated by Ralph H. Chaplin.)

"The Madness of Democracy"

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND is one of the great men of the Catholic church in America, and no one will deny the fact but that he is a scholar of brilliant attainments, but that his heart beats in sympathy with the masses of the people is a question that is open to discussion. In an address delivered some time ago this archbishop expressed himself as follows on the Initiative Referendum and the Recall:

"The shibboleths of the clamor—the Initiative, Referendum, the Recall—put into general practice are nothing more or less than mobocracy, the madness of democracy. * * * The ultimate verdict rests with the whole people, but many, we must admit, are the problems regarding which the whole people have no adequate knowledge."

The argument set forth by the archbishop against the Initiative, Referendum and the Recall, on the grounds that many of the people have no adequate knowledge of problems that are demanding a solution, is about as logical as the conclusion reached by a parent, that because his boy could neither read nor write that he should not be sent to school.

The fact that many of the people lack the intelligence to pass upon questions that may be submitted for their consideration is not a logical reason why those who are competent should be denied the right to have a direct voice on questions that vitally affect the people.

But according to the archbishop, for the people to be clothed with the Initiative, Referendum and Recall is but "mobocracy," or "the madness of democracy."

Every powerful financial shark in Wall street will place the label of his approval on the sentiments expressed by this exalted prelate of the Catholic church. Rockefeller, Morgan, Frick, Corey, Gould, Belmont and all the insatiable exploiters of a continent, will applaud the attitude assumed by the learned apostle of the Catholic church, but men who love liberty and revere justice will condemn the opposition of a potentate in the church who becomes an ally of those powerful combinations that are using every weapon to silence the voice of the people in public affairs.

But regardless of the attitude assumed by prelates of the church and regardless of all the influences exercised by all the forces that are arrayed against real democracy, the people are destined to rule and establish a democracy where humanity shall be free.

Some Doings in Alaska

ALASKA has had its first territorial legislative body and the members of the House and Senate have introduced a number of bills, some of which are of a progressive character. The territorial Legislature of Alaska recognized the worth and merit of the gentler sex when a bill was introduced clothing woman with the right to cast a ballot.

The lawmakers of Alaska, although living almost beyond the borders of civilization, have a far higher respect for woman than that respectable and cultured element in the nation's capital who resolved themselves into a mob and insulted those advocates of woman suffrage who believed that they could parade the streets of Washington without being molested by well-groomed degenerates, who had forgotten the respect that was due to womanhood.

In the territorial Legislature of Alaska the greatest fight developed against the eight-hour law for miners.

The Treadwell Mining Company is a power in Alaska, and its paid lobbyists were busily engaged in raising barriers against a measure that would concede a real eight-hour law to the men of the mines. The Treadwell Mining Company launched an association some time ago which this company recognized as a labor organization, and while the Legislature of Alaska was considering the eight-hour bill, the Treadwell Mining Company instructed the officials of its labor organization to forward the following to the lawmakers:

'At a regular meeting of the Alaska Labor Union, a labor organization consisting of 600 men employed in and about the mines on Douglas Island, a resolution was passed on February 28th, instructing the following committee to present memorials to all the members of the Legislature from the First division endorsing an eight-hour law for Alaska for men employed in and about the mines.

In this memorial it was to be stated that our meaning of an eight-hour law is a law to mean eight hours of actual labor. The Alaska Labor Union, being an organization that believes in fairness, thinks that a law of that kind would carry out their principles of a 'Square Deal for All.' Very truly,

"JERRY CASHEN,
"PETER JOHNSON,
"JAMES FAHERTY,
"Committee on Memorials."

The Douglas Miners' Union No. 109, W. F. M., having learned that such a memorial was sent to the Legislaoture, and likewise having become cognizant of an invitation having been sent to the members of the Legislature to attend a banquet tendered by the Treadwell Fire Department, the following was drafted and adopted and ordered sent to the Legislature:

"Douglas, Alaska, March 15th, 1913.

"To the House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska:

"Greetings: We desire to respectfully call the attention of the members of the House that the Treadwell Fire Department is a part of the Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Company, and that the chief of the Treadwell Fire Department is merely one of its paid employés. We make this suggestion because we believe that many members of the House would not knowingly accept social favors from a corporation which has been as unfair to the miners of Alaska as has the Treadwell.

"We also desire to respectfully call your attention to the fact that the Alaska Labor Union is not a labor union in the sense which it is used by organized labor everywhere in the world. It is merely a mouthpiece of the Treadwell Company for the purpose of influencing public opinion and has never served, and was never intended to serve, any other purpose. Respectfully,

"DOUGLAS ISLAND MINERS' UNION NO. 109,
"Western Federation of Miners."
By "JAS.. D. CAREY,

"THOMAS BROOKS,
"Committee."

Organized labor in Alaska is confronted with every weapon that is to be found in the older mining districts of the United States, and must use all its energies to defeat the conspiracies of economic masters.

Corporate combinations in Alaska have assumed the attitude of autocrats and concede nothing save that which is wrested from their iron grasp by the organized power of labor.

The laboring men of Alaska, of all trades, crafts and occupations, must come together and fight together to prevent the absolute rule of corporations in the northwestern territory.

Acquitted

THE MILITARY TRIBUNAL in West Virginia has acquitted "Mother" Jones and ten of the miners who were held with her on a charge of conspiring to murder the hired thugs and assassins imported by the mine owners to enable them to create a reign of terror in the coal regions of the state, where the miners are striking for better conditions.

The drumhead court-martial would not have hesitated to condemn "Mother" Jones to death if the mine-owning oligarchy, which rules West Virginia, had not been fearful of its effect upon the working class throughout the United States. The oligarchy has authorized and directed outrages quite as damnable. Its thugs have shot down men and women and children. It has suspended constitutional guarantees and proclaimed military law. It has hesitated at no infamy, save the killing of this old woman, to crush the spirit of resistance and drive the miners back to their holes and hovels.

There is no land, outside of Russia and Mexico, where the workers are treated as mercilessly, where they are held to have no rights whatever that the governing class need respect, as they are in the mining regions of West Virginia. Where there is such terrible exploitation, where there is such grievous injustice, the limit of the workers' endurance finally is reached and the system can be sustained only by bullets and bayonets.—Milwaukee Leader.

There is but little question of doubt but that "Mother" Jones would have been convicted and sentenced by a military court, were it not that her corporate persecutors feared that punishment meted out to "Mother" Jones might result in an uprising in this country that would ultimately prove disastrous to legalized robbers, whose outrages have been upheld by the bayonets of the state of West Virginia. The great army of the laboring people of this country has been patient, but there is a limit beyond which even industrial czars and their hired Cossacks hesitate to go.

A match-light sometimes starts a conflagration, and the imprisonment of "Mother" Jones might have precipitated a conflict in this country that might have gone far towards ending the brutal and hellish system that puts a higher value on Profit than on humanity.

Precedents

THE SUPREME COURT of West Virginia has rendered a remarkable decision in sustaining the executive order of Governor Glasscock proclaiming martial law in the Kanawha coal fields.

The court sustained the constitutional authority of the executive to establish military law in any district in which he may assert that insurrection exists. The court even held that the executive may order the arrest of any person in any section of the state where martial law has not been declared and have him removed to the district under martial law for trial by court martial.

The decision of the court leaves no constitutional right that the executive of West Virginia is bound to respect if he shall proclaim martial law. We have no doubt that if the issue were raised in any state the courts would be bound to reach a like conclusion.

The situation in West Virginia, as in Colorado under the military reign of terror instituted by the Mine Owners' Association, emphasizes the fact that the government—the state—is employed by the capitalist class to hold the workers in subjection precisely as the government was employed to run down fugitive slaves and maintain the "peculiar institution" from overthrow. Yet the same force which was used to maintain slavery was invoked to destroy it.

The military could be employed to compel the mine owners to remove their hired thugs and martial law could be declared preliminary to seizing the mines and operating them by the public, with the same constitutional warrant and justification that they are now employed to suppress strikes, to throw strikers into the bull pen and to condemn them to prison or death by drum-head court martial.

These decisions are making precedents that some day will return to plague their authors. If the constitution, if the law, and if the courts cannot be invoked by a striking miner to save his life, how can the mine owner expect that when public necessity shall require that the state take possession of his property and administer it he can invoke the constitution or the laws to save his profits?

He who takes up the sword shall perish by the sword. The men who go down in the mines, the men who toil in mill and factory, the men who are doing the work of the world, are many and strong—the men who own the mines and the mills and the forests are few and weak. The few are conscious of their power—the others know not their strength. But they are learning. Some day they will know—some day they will be the masters. And then—well, they will not be without precedents.—Milwaukee Leader.

The above editorial in the Milwaukee Leader is worthy of the most serious consideration on the part of the working class, particularly, that part of the working class who stand beneath the banner of the labor movement. During the past ten years it has become apparent to men of observation that all branches of government are under the control of that element in our citizenship that are armored with economic power. The working class—the disinherited class—is not only victimized by exploitation, but labor, in revolt against economic slavery, is confronted by courts and the armed power of state and nation.

Lazarus, with Dives as the prosecutor, has no standing in court. The robed dispenser of justice on the bench can see no merit or honor in manhood wearing the rags of an impoverished slave.

Baer of Pennsylvania has said that our courts "are the bulwarks of American liberty," and when such an industrial despot pays a tribute to the judiciary, it is time that the victims of wage slavery reached the conclusion that courts are the bulwarks behind which tyranny and greed are intrenched.

The weapons, however, which capital have forged to keep labor in subjection may yet become the weapons through which labor may be emancipated.

A Tribute to Organized Effort

THE INDUSTRIAL BANNER, published at Toronto, Canada, in its issue of March 21st, commenting on the workmen's compensation act, pays the following tribute to the work of the labor movement in the interest of those who are made to feel the burdens imposed by unfeeling capital:

"The representatives of the organized labor movement who have had the responsibility thrust upon them of looking after the interests of the wage earners of the province and presenting their views and claims before Commissioner Sir W. R. Meredith, chief justice of Ontario, have had no light duty to perform.

"The thanks of the organized labor movement of Ontario is due to the indefatigable efforts of Fred Bancroft and Joseph Gibbons perhaps more than any others for the able manner in which the interests of union and non-union workers alike have been looked after and safeguarded.

"The vice president of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada has spent a vast amount of time and energy in the gathering of statistics used in the presentation of labor's brief before the commission. He has proved himself an indefatigable worker, and there will be, indeed, few trades unionists who will not be willing to render him the measure of commendation that his valuable services deserve.

"Of Chief Justice Meredith it may be said that the organized workers are confident that he is actuated by the laudable ambition to have enacted into legislation the best compensation act in the world.

"As to the full merits of the proposed plan we may say that we will be better able to discuss and pass a final opinion upon it when several of its recommendations are clearly defined and the report is fully rounded out. As we have stated, we are gratified at the good work of the labor representatives who have appeared before the commission, and we have absolute confidence in the integrity and honesty of purpose of the commissioner.

"It will be well, however, for the general public to recognize that had it not been for the persistent and determined agitation of organized labor, no action would have been taken by the politicians to supersede the old obsolete and useless compensation act for one that will give a far larger measure of protection to the working class.

"If the wage earners of the province are to secure this larger measure of justice at the hands of the politicians, they can thank their lucky stars that organized labor has been on the job and that the time had come when it could no longer with safety be denied.

"And now it's up to the politicians, and it goes without saying that their course of action in the Legislature will be closely watched. The workers of this great province expect that the report of the commissioner will be dealt with entirely upon its merits. No half measures will suffice the men who have built up the industries of Ontario and made her great. They must have full and ample protection for both life and limb. They ask nothing more at the hands of the politicians and the old political parties, and, what is more, they are not prepared to accept anything less."

The above in the Industrial Banner is interesting, as it shows that nothing can be accomplished or achieved on the part of the working class without organized effort.

Labor scattered and divided as individuals commands no consideration from the majority of men who occupy seats in a legislative body.

Men who are wage earners, or in other words, who are dependents on jobs, should scorn to stand outside the pale of organized labor in this day and age, when all the forces that oppose the working class are solidly united to defeat any measure that lightens the burdens of the class that toils.

When labor becomes thoroughly organized, there will be no necessity for labor to be on its knees imploring the representatives of privilege to concede a few crumbs.

Labor organized, industrially and politically, can spring from its knees and stand upon its feet, to demand that justice shall prevail.

They Are Growing Wiser

THE FOLLOWING LETTER from South Porcupine, Ontario, has been received at the headquarters of the Western Federation of Miners, and the editor feels justified in making known its contents to the membership of the Western Federation of Miners:

"South Porcupine, Ontario, March 27, 1913.

"To the Officials of the W. F. M., Denver, Colo.

"Dear Sirs and Brothers. Greeting: At a special meeting held by this local the 27th, Thursday, 7:30 p. m., to discuss the fake eight-hour bill as introduced by the minister of mines of Ontario, in the Provincial House which is now in session, a copy of the Industrial Worker, dated March 20th was introduced, and an article read, headed 'Queer Actions of W. F. of M. Officials.' After considerable discussion on the article, the following motion was passed:

"Moved and seconded that the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of the paper containing the article to the officials of the W. F. of M. and that this local go on record as repudiating the entire article, and that this local affairm its loyalty and allegiance to the W. F. of M Motion carried.

"Enclosed please find copy of the issue which contains the article.

"M. P. GUINEY, President,
"JAMES DOGUE, Secretary."

The article mentioned in the communication sent by Porcupine Miners' Union to headquarters contains the usual scurrilous vituperation of character-assassins who were degenerates from the time they crawled from a cradle.

The reputation or character of no man is immune or safe from the defamatory assaults of these professional reprobates, to whom honor and shame are strangers.

They never feel the sting of conscience or the slightest pang of compunction as they spew their malignant and virulent poison upon the good name of men in whose presence they would forget the dirty vocabulary from which they drag their calumny and detraction. With the unblushing effrontery of painted harlots, the gab-professors of the I. W. W. have hurled their verbal garbage at every man in the labor movement who has refused to give his approval to the conspiracies of the pariahs in filching money from the unsophisticated.

There was a time when a large percentage of the members of the Porcupine Miners' Union permitted themselves to lose their heads and be swept off their feet by the snarls and growls of this chronic aggregation who dubbed themselves r-e-v-o-l-u-t-i-o-n-i-s-t-s.

Men of nerve and courage never laud themselves as fighters. It remains for the cur with the yellow streak to beggar the English language for words to pay tributes to his prowess.

The members of Porcupine Miners' Union, as well as other unions of the Western Federation of Miners, are no longer hypnotized by the noise of mouth-warriors, who are only brave when no danger signals are in sight.

The I. W. W. takes everything and gives nothing, save abuse and vilification.

It has begged from every labor organization that it has defamed. The I. W. W. keeps no books; neither do crooks.

The "Bummery" would befoul a sewer and make a cesspool blush for its lack of putrid depravity.

Arizona at the Head of the Procession

THE FOLLOWING CLIPPING has been sent us from Globe, Arizona, and has been taken from a special dispatch to the Globe Record of Phoenix, Arizona:

"Phoenix, Ariz., March 27.—The much discussed strike injunction legislation, which subject has been before Congress and nearly every state in the union for the past three years, has finally been passed on by the Arizona Legislature and the following provision shall be granted by any court of this state, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employé, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at least and such property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

Picketing is Legalized.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peacefully assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.'

"Representative Thomas Maddock made an effort when the bill was before the House to have stricken out that provision permitting persons going near any work for the purpose of peacefully persuading any person to abstain from working, it being the argument of the Coconino county representative that such situations usually brought on the trouble incidental to strikes. Representative Perry Hall insisted he could see no harm in a man peacefully arguing with a workman to quit work.

Maddock Opposes Bill.

"'Yes, but you can never tell when a man is going to quit being peaceful and become violent,' declared Maddock, the representative from Coconino. 'And if he is not around where workmen are at work urging them to quit work, there is no opportunity for trouble, and I think courts should have the right to issue injunctions restraining men from being interfered with when they are at work by other men who desire to have them quit work.'

"The injunction paragraph, however, was written in the code in the Senate unanimously and in the House by the following vote: Ayes—Babbit, Ball, Cooke, Craig, Graham, Hall, Irvine, Jacobson, Johnson, Jones, Kelton, Kerr, Lewis, Lynch, Moore of Yavapai, Murphy, Saxon, Wren and Linney. Nays—Buchanan, Crofoot, Curry, Duncan, Ellis, Gonzales, Kane, Maddock, Mattox and Moore of Pima."

The above law in the state of Arizona, shows the progressive spirit of the people of the new state, who are determined that Democracy shall mean something more than the definition of political hypocrites.

Labor is asserting itself in Arizona, and labor in Arizona realizes that the power of courts must be checked if labor is to enjoy legal rights and constitutional liberty. It may be that the courts of Arizona may declare such a law unconstitutional, but should the courts use the judicial dagger to murder this law, then the courts will be met with an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the vassals on the bench from using the usurped authority of nullifying acts of a legislative body.

The time is about here when the people will no longer submit to a government by the judiciary.

Queer Action of W. F. M. Officials

WHEN PLANS WERE LAID by detective-hiring officials of the Western Federation of Miners to pull that body out of the I. W. W. there commenced the downfall of the metal miners as a revolutionary force. Then when some of these same officials faked the miners into the A. F. of L. through a misleading referendum there came an entire stop to all revolutionary propaganda. Instead of industrializing in the slightest degree, the conservative A. F. of L., we now find the Western Federation of Miners lined up with the reactionists as one of the main bulwarks of the capitalist system.

Knowing that this was inevitable there comes no surprise when a member of the W. F. M. informs us of recent actions of those who control the organization that at one time threw fear into the hearts of the master class. The information given is as follows:

Cobalt camp was organized in 1906 by the W. F. M., at the time when the miners were still in the I. W. W. The seeds sown at that time have steadily grown.

Five other locals of the W. F. M. have been organized in new camps and due to the actions of the rebels they are permeated with the idea of real industrial unionism.

Conditions in the northern part of Ontario province have daily grown worse until the level of the unorganized in the southern part has almost been reached. The tactics of the president W. F. M. are unable to cope with the situation.

On November 16, 1912, Porcupine, the second largest local union of the W. F. M. in Ontario declared a strike against reduction in wages. They tied up the mines. Every man came out. Preparations were made to enforce their demands of an increase in wages and the eight hour day.

This was the first blow for the eight hour day in the province since the five W. F. M. locals were organized. The Porcupine miners thought that the other locals would strike with them, especially as some of the Cobalt miners and those in other organized camps were working in mines owned by the same companies against whom the strike was called. Agitation for a general strike of all these miners was nearing success when two members of the Western Federation of Miners appeared in the scene and placed a damper on the proposed action. The damper was in the form of a "threat" of non-support and an invoking of the Industrial Disputes Act.

This "Industrial Disputes Act" requires 30 days notice of strikes. Violation is supposed to bring 30 days in jail or $10 per day fine on each worker. The miners violated the law in Porcupine and only three men were jailed. These three were liberated within two weeks.

When the operators saw that the other locals were not acting they tried to recruit scabs in the unorganized camps of Copper Cliff and Sudsbury, and the steel mills of Sault Ste Marie and other places. They were unsuccessful. The reason was soon learned.

The miners at the above mentioned places were full of the industrial union spirit. During the agitation for the general strike in Ontario these miners had written to Cobalt No. 146 and Porcupine No. 145, W. F. M., asking for organizers and instructions on how to proceed to organize. As Porcupine local was on strike, Cobalt, the largest local, took upon themselves the work of organization.

And it is reported that private letters came to Cobalt Union No. 146 from the Headquarters of the Western Federation of Miners advising them against organizing these places at this time!

These queer actions on the part of the officials of the W. F. M. and also the desire on the part of the workers in the organized camps for concerted action, taken with the general restlessness of the unorganized workers, shows that the field is ripe for the I. W. W.

Let the footloose rebels in the Ontario province unite with the militants in the Western Federation of Miners in organizing the miners in Copper Cliff and Sudsbury, and the steel workers of Sault Ste Marie into the I. W. W. Once let the I. W. W. gain a foothold there and the One Big Union will reign supreme where now the W. F. M. is making a poor showing.—Industrial Worker.—Spokane.

The above article shows the work of the professional disrupters. Every scheme is resorted to for the purpose of shattering confidence in the officials of the Western Federation of Miners.

Covert intimations and cowardly innuendo are the chief weapons of the "Bummery." This collection of characterless hoodlums, even resort to the most brazen falsehoods with the sole purpose in view of weakening any and every labor organization whose members refuse to gulp down the meaningless verbosity of the chronic dead-beats and bilks.

The following placed on a bill-board of the I. W. W. in Salt Lake, shows not only the concerted action of the breeders of dissension, but likewise, the desperation of the "Slander Syndicate" in its assault on an organization, that it has frequently attacked, simply because it has absolutely failed to control the policy of the workings of the W. F. M.

The following is food for mental digestion.

Local 69, I. W. W.

Western Federation of Miners disgusted with the present form of organization. A stampede has started into one big union. President Moyer admits that the W. F. M. is no longer able to win any strike they may be engaged in. The I. W. W. taking control of mining industry."

The other side of the board reads as follows:

"Local 69, I. W. W.

Western Federation of Miners have lost badly fought strike at Blair, Nevada, after nine months of listless striking they have been again dragged down to bitter defeat.

A stampede of mine workers into the I. W. W. has started disgusted and disgruntled W. F. M. leaders. Now the members have at last awakened to the necessity of the one big union of labor as the only logical remedy. Get together workingmen; step inside and see the secretary who will be pleased to give you all information about the rising giant of labor, namely the I. W. W.

Initiation fee 50 cents; Dues per month 50 cents; one class, one card, one label and one enemy."

Porcupine Miners' Union having considered the slanderous article published in the Industrial Worker of Spokane, took the following action:

"PORCUPINE MINERS' UNION NO. 145.
of the
"WESTERN FEDERATION OF MINERS
"South Porcupine, Ontario, Canada, March 30th., 1913.

"To Porcupine Miners' Union No. 145, W. F. M.

"Fellow workers, we, your committee appointed at a special meeting on March 27th, to draft resolutions dealing with an article recently published in the Industrial Worker, entitled "Queer Actions of the W. F. M. Officials," submit the following for your consideration:

"Whereas, there has appeared in the Industrial Worker, in its issue of March 20th, 1913, an article entitled "Queer Actions of the W. F. M. Officials" and,

"Whereas, Said article contains a mixture of truth and lies in just the proper proportion to make it more vicious than falsehood could be, proceeded step by step in its series of calumnies until the infamous purpose of the article is disclosed and avowed in the closing paragraphs to be the disruption of the W. F. M. and the establishment of the I. W. W. in its stead; and,

"Whereas, A man who would write an article of this kind, reflecting upon the character of individuals and the integrity of a labor organization without signing his name for publication, shows himself beneath the respect of honest men, and by his cowardly act relies the revolutionary pretensions of his words, and a paper that would give space to such an article shows that it is more intent upon disrupting and destroying the labor movement than in educating the workers; and,

"Whereas, Internal disrupters in a labor movement are always more to be feared than opposition from without, adopting the tactics of the detective and if they are not getting paid are scabbing on the job; but such work, always to be condemned, becomes still more reprehensible when pursued in time of strike, the membership of this union putting forth their best efforts to win the strike, considering every suggestion and using all lawful means to gain a larger measure of justice for the toilers, while the workers of the country are turning their eyes upon us in Porcupine and the entire membership of the W. F. M. are assessed for our support, then we deeply resent an article that represents us as guilty of perfidy to our brothers who have loyally supported us and traitors to the organization that sustains us; and

"Whereas, It seems from the reading of the article that the man who wrote or furnished the statements upon which it is based is a resident of this locality, probably a member of this union; and,

"Whereas, He should be stripped of all disguise and shown for what he is, a fit associate of M. E. White, chief of the Theil Detectives, and the membership of the W. F. M. and the entire working class should be informed that disruption and treason have no place in the councils of Porcupine Miners' Union; therefore, be it

"Resolved, By Porcupine Miners' Union, No. 145, W. F. M., in regular meeting assembled, that we strongly condemn such disruptive tactics and that we hereby affirm our allegiance to the Western Federation of Miners; and, be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes, a copy forwarded to the Miners' Magazine and to the Industrial Worker, with a demand upon the latter paper that they publish the resolutions and forward to the Secretary of this organization the name of the traitorous correspondent."

REPORT OF ORGANIZER ALFIREVICH.

Salt Lake City, Utah, March 28, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

In accordance with the constitution of the W. F. M., I will endeavor to write a brief report and bring some of the facts as they stand before the members in the other places, so that they may know about present conditions existing and concerning our organization in the strike zone in Utah, where I am placed by President Mayor as organizer to work in the interest of the Federation.

I will not go back to the time when I was able to enroll hundreds of men under the union banner, but will rather say that with all difficulties, I added this month a few new members to Salt Lake Union and think I will enroll quite a few more in the very near future; that is, those working in fair places, Murray and Midvale, as you all know that the strike is still on in Garfield, and will be on to the bitter end.

Salt Lake local, beside the strikers who are still out and on the relief, have, and will always have, enough members to show the cruel barons that a fortress is here for the fight for the rights and protection of the workingmen.

The Bingham strike is of more importance to organized labor than many of us realize, and this fight is worth a big price; also it needs to have the close attention of all union men, and prompt response with a helping hand. It has not been mentioned as yet in our Magazine that four small companies accepted union demands, where about a hundred union men are working with paid-up cards.

As to the other companies, according to their own reports and statements, the production at present is less than one-half of what it was before the strike, but cost of production is doubled, and the present profit, if any, cannot meet the requirements of the hungry stockholders, therefore some move or settlement should be made soon; otherwise as long as these places are declared unfair there will be no chance for any fat dividends.

While these struggles have resulted in taxing union men with assessments, we should not forget victories for the workers won already. Since stronger efforts have been made to organize workers in Bingham in July, 1912, we can show and positively prove, that only through these efforts wages have been increased in Utah to over 8,000 men 25 cents a day, and to 1,000 men 50 cents per day. Therefore, we should be glad to forget all sacrifices and accept reward in the knowledge that we are helping in the great struggle between an exploiting and an exploited class to uplift justice and humanity.

No doubt we naturally incline to despise those among us who become traitors and scabs, but their own conscience will pay them back in full for their treacherous acts, and yet, when they wake up to see that it is better for an honest man to walk freely and proudly than to bend his head and shoulders to a cold, selfish, wealthy man.

CONVENTION CALL.

January 2, 1913.

To All Affiliated Leagues and Members—Greeting:

You are hereby advised that in accordance with the vote of the third biennial convention of the National Women's Trade Union League of America, the fourth biennial convention will be held in St. Louis, Mo., beginning Monday, June 2, 1913, at 10 a. m., and will continue in session from day to day until the business of the convention has been completed.

Representation.

The membership of the convention shall consist of the following:

The five officers and the other six members of the Executive Board.

Each local league shall be entitled to send one delegate with one vote for every twenty-five members or fraction thereof, up to 500 members, and after that, one to every fifty.

Each affiliated trade union local, central labor body and State Federation of Labor shall be entitled to send one delegate with one vote.

Every other affiliated organization shall be entitled to send one delegate with one vote.

In order to encourage interest in forming local leagues, members at large shall be given voice, but with no vote.

Only those leagues and affiliated organizations whose annual dues shall have been fully paid up sixty days in advance of the national convention, shall be entitled to vote at the convention.

Credentials.

Credentials in duplicate are enclosed. The original credentials must be given to the delegate elect and the duplicate forwarded to the secretary, Room 901, 127 North Dearborn street, Chicago, Illinois, not later than April 15.

Purpose: This being the tenth anniversary of the organization of the National Women's Trade Union League of America, we want to see to it that out of our widening experience we establish such measures for constructive work as will enable us to meet with greater knowledge and capacity the ever-growing problem of women in industry. The establishment of schools for women brickmakers and bricklayers, the introduction of women conductors and messengers, women core makers in the steel foundries, women taxicab drivers, even a woman smokestack painter, are but a sign of the times that all trades are being thrown open to women, even though often for the ignoble purpose of creating cheaper labor, and unless we safeguard conditions by the organization of women we will have them on a greater scale than ever before the underbidders in the labor market, to the hurt not only of themselves but of their families. A convention is after all but a living illustration of the thought, "As one lamp lights another nor grows less, so nobleness enkindleth nobleness," and, we may add, knowledge bringeth knowledge. The enthusiasm of such a meeting and the planning together how better to equip ourselves for service helps to establish that concerted action so necessary to all constructive work.

The duty of the hour demands that every affiliated organization be represented and send its full number of delegates.

Be fully represented. Send to this important convention your ablest, most experienced, thoughtful and faithful members.

Business.—The president will appoint the following committees from the delegates to assist in transacting the business of the convention:

Credentials, rules and order of business, organization, resolutions, legislation, committee on officers' reports, Life and Labor, education, votes for women, union label, constitution, special committee on recent judicial industrial decisions.

RECENT NEWS FROM PORCUPINE.

The strike is still on and the struggle is still on. The judicial authorities, in their zealous devotion to the mine owners, in order to crush the strike, have reached the summit. On March 13th nine strikers were arrested and charged with assaulting five strike-breakers from the Hollinger mine. These nine men were kept in custody at Timmins until March 28th, when the trial was to be held.

Now, let us see what occurred when the time for trial came and the interested parties appeared at the "capitalist" bar of justice, and see how that justice is administered in Porcupine. The trial commenced at 1 o'clock on March 28th, and what do we hear? Magistrate Torrence says that the men are to be tried, not for assault, which was the charge placed against them, but for taking part in an unlawful assembly. Counsel for defense and all who were present were astonished; the accusation was for assault, and immediately when court opened the charge was changed. Counsel for the defense arose and protested that he had prepared to defend his clients on the charge that had been placed against them. Protests, however, did not avail. That was the way the powers that be wanted it, and that is the way it had to be.

The trial began and the evidence showed that no crime had been committed by accused men brought before the court; showed that innocent men were kept weeks in custody. The magistrate was forced to acquit the following: A. Petonett, John Cassidy, Alix Gauthier and Joe Roberts. A. Hollowell was let go by paying the court costs, John Skinner, Chris Kipp and Frank Bowers were held to appear before a judge and jury in Sudbury on April 26th. They would not take any chance on Magistrate Torrence's ideas of justice.

The mine owners demand that some of the strikers must go to prison and that the Miners' Union must be put to expense defending its members in the courts, but we feel satisfied that the trials of these men will show that attempts are being made to railroad innocent men to prison. It is a crime to go on strike without giving the masters sufficient notice, so that they can import scabs and thus not lose any profits. The courts are depended on to "deliver the goods" for the mine owners.

The three men to be tried are charged with being members of an unlawful assembly in a public place, namely, in the Bank saloon, Timmins. Five strike-breakers from the Hollinger mine filled up on whisky, and apparently acting under instructions to start a row with the strikers, came into the Bank saloon. The proprietor of the saloon said that they appeared to be intoxicated and even the strike-breakers admitted that they had been drinking and were feeling pretty good. The evidence went to show that what occurred was nothing more than an ordinary saloon brawl, and that some of the men held for trial took no part in it, but then they are strikers, and that is apparently sufficient grounds to condemn them.

The appeal in the "Lemieux Act" cases was held before Judge Kehoe on March 26th at Golden City. These are the cases against Cleary, Holowatsky and Croft for inciting to go on strike and for going on strike, whom the government was forced to release from prison by the protest of the working class. Magistrate Torrence had sentenced them to prison for ninety and sixty days, respectively. Judge Kehoe has taken the cases under advisement and will give his decision on April 5th.

We earnestly urge all men to stay away from the Ontario mining districts and especially not to come to the Porcupine district. The strike takes in all of the employés in the mining industry in all the crafts, trades and occupations. If you come into this district at the present time looking for work you will be aiding the mine owners to break the strike.

We ask you to give us your earnest assistance to secure liberty for the four men who were unjustly sent to the Central prison, Toronto. If there was any doubt in your mind as to their guilt, the action of the government officials in these recent cases should remove it.

The strikers are determined to win the battle and are confident of victory. We ask you to do your duty to preserve what little liberty we have left. Yours for emancipation, WM. K. RADIX.

YOU CAN NOT SERVE TWO MASTERS

Why certainly not; no one but a fool will think that such a thing is possible. No one can serve two masters and serve them well.

Being of this opinion and also being intelligent enough to realize that there are two distinctive classes of masters in society, one George Wadell, mill superintendent at McGill, Nevada, politely informed John Donohue, secretary of Steptoe Mill and Smeltermen's Union 233, for several years employed by the Steptoe Valley Smelting and Mining Co., that he could not serve two masters. In other words, that he could not be a trusted employé of the said company and at the same time be the financial secretary of the union. He therefore handed Secretary Donohue his "two-by-four," which the latter took without ado, only stating to Mr. Wadell that he was a union man since he was a young boy, and he was too old to change his mind now.

A couple of days after this took place, said superintendent met Secretary Donohue and informed him that he could go back to work if he resigned as secretary of the union, stating that he (Wadell) had no objection to any man being a member of the union, but that the company would not tolerate one of their trusted employés being an officer in the union.

This change on the part of the superintendent was perhaps owing to the fact that the company can not afford at this stage of the game to lose experienced men, as Brother Donohue is, and, therefore, they concluded to get him back to work, but at the same time not relax on their former position, because to do so would have shown a weakness on their part, and, of course, it would have perhaps encouraged the hundreds of slaves employed by them to raise their bended backs, if that were possible, and for once in their whole lives assert their manhood and proclaim their rights to organize.

But, O Lord! These slaves seem to have gone behind any hopes.

After due consideration we have concluded to let Brother Donohue go back to work, feeling that by so doing he was no less a staunch union man, but that he would be of better assistance to us in building up Local 233 by being on the job and in daily contact with those now union men.

The company's object in firing Secretary Donohue was to instill into the minds of their slaves the fear of losing their jobs if they dared to become members of our union, a needless effort on their part, because the poor fellows, not possessing any more backbone than a worm and no more brain than an ant, they are good, faithful servants of their master and would not do anything that would displease him. Oh, no, our Lord. We are your slaves and as such we will be faithful to thee to the extent of binding the chains of slavery upon unborn generations. No, our Lord; we will not become members of the Western Federation of Miners, because that organization compelled you, our Lord, to grant us unworthy ones an eight-hour work day and some increase in wages, and if we would all join hands with that organization they would compel you, our Lord, to recognize their unions, to grant us a further increase in wages, so that we could buy more food and clothing for our wives and children. They would compel you, our Lord, to install more safety appliances to protect our lives and limbs, and through their pernicious propaganda they aim to usher in the dawn of a day when there will be no masters and slaves.

All of these things, our Lord, would naturally displease you; they would lessen the profit you are making off of our labor and finally end your parasitic career, all of which, our Lord, does not harmonize with our ideas of American slaves.

We, therefore, hate the handful of men that, under these conditions, have the temerity of being members of the Mill and Smeltermen's Union, and at this date are instrumental in holding for us that, which through their effort, we have gained in the past. But, our Lord, this handful of men are fearless men; they seem to think that they are the ones that produce all wealth and, therefore, the wealth should belong to them instead of you, and with their persistent effort they propose to open our eyes and to finally get us to cooperate with them to throw you off our backs.

These things they propose to do, our Lord, in spite of you and ourselves.

They have here amongst them a black foreigner whom they call an organizer, and while he has not made very much progress with us, still he has succeeded to get around him a fairly good bunch, which some day may prove to be the foundation and backbone of our emancipation. But as yet, our Lord, you need not fear, because we are your slaves and willing to serve you, our only master. TOM CORRA.

LETTER FROM A SOCIALIST FATHER TO A SON WORKING HIS WAY THROUGH COLLEGE.

By W. E. G.

Dear Son—Apropos of your remarks regarding churches filled with unthinking people, you are right in that this orthodox multitude is the greatest obstacle in the way of obtaining a juster order of society here on earth.

They preach against the evils of the day, meanwhile by their vote giving honor, place and power to the grafter in their very midst who despoils them, while they complacently sing and pray and pass resolutions to remove the effects of the very evils they unknowingly help to create, but, after all, they may be a necessary conservative force, to hold in check the too radical element that is not yet sufficiently grounded in the constructive principles of BROTHERHOOD to successfully carry out the co-operative commonwealth.

The cost of living here below is increasing by such leaps and bounds, and Heaven with its tinkling bells and elysian fields seems so far away, that even these people are slowly being awakened to the fact that there is something earthy, so radically wrong, that it might be a good idea to start Heaven right here and now. Some day the human race will wake up to a realization of the fact that no one individual can have more than the rest without paying the price in an abnormal development that entails suffering. It will require a new race of men, altruistic in thought, reasonably sound in physique and unselfish in action to work out the new order. You should feel proud that you in your youth are one of the new race that will usher in the new time.

This new race is being born out of the débris of the old, and it behooves us as thinking men and women not to be so filled with the thought of the wreckage as to crowd out the evidences of the constructive forces at work upon every hand, for you cannot judge the man of today by the man of yesterday; neither can you judge the men of tomorrow by the men of today; therein is hope.

Remember, this universe is the work of the Supreme Intelligence. He created it, knows it—it must be good, all of it, the whole of it must be a perfect whole, and man as a part of it is working out exactly as He forsaw He would.

It seems incongruous that man should prey upon man, that creatures that rend and tear and sting each other should exist in a universe whose first law is harmony. I believe there is a correspondence between this outer condition and man's inner discord.

Coincident with the passing out of man's violence and greed from within I believe will go poverty and disease and all the warring elements of his world.

I am glad you can appreciate the undesirable features of business, as you say in your letter that you had rather herd swine than prepare for a business career.

Business as it is today is a system of reaping profits where others have labored; it is fundamentally wrong and diametrically opposed to the teachings of the "Sermon on the Mount;" it engenders hatred and jealousy and is the antithesis of BROTHERHOOD.

Everywhere one hears the expression, "That's good business," which is on a par with what was spoken fifty years ago of slave holders, namely, "He is kind to his slaves." The world was then unconscious of the wrong of human slavery, as it is today of the fact that "good business" is the successful exploitation of human beings.

A society whose individual members buy, sell and own the earth, and whose entire existence is largely expressed through the operation of all industry for profit is not very far removed from the childhood of the race.

We regret the mistakes of an individual, of a people, a race, forgetting that in the universal scheme of things there can be no final mistake, for through mistakes man gains wisdom and learns to live comformably to the law of his being.

The processes of nature are slow and orderly, but economy and harmony are the first laws of their operation.

She may seem to waste with a lavish hand, but we shall find later on that the waste was but the husks of some unfoldment, and that sometimes the unwholesome or irregular was but the coarser covering of a hidden beauty struggling for expression.

Man will some day be more than man, just as today man is more than animal.

To lift the weight of centuries of wrong thinking, to get away from the customary, the habitual, the legacy of untold millions of men, who have left us their unconscious mistakes and errors of thought, as well as their attainment, is growth, but the process of this growth is painful.

The whole world groans and suffers as it unfolds toward a better way of life.

To look at suffering as a philosophy of life may seem absurd, but this is a fact, that all live men suffer, and herein is hope, that suffering is the evidence of growth.

Here and there today we see the individual man dreaming an ideal of altruism, to be realized by the awakened man of tomorrow. And we who suffer most are but the advance guard in this army of the evolution, marching on to the heights of tomorrow.

To have awakened, to be able to suffer, is a privilege.

Ages of painful evolution lie between Jesus or Tolstoy with their thoughts and ideals, and a Hottentot with his bows and arrows, and as great a gulf lies between us and the man of tomorrow.

Millions of men have been used in the process, and so today numbers of us suffer, while the system of individual ownership for profit is passing and the ideal of universal co-operation is being born.

Glad that you have a place where you can work and earn your board while attending school.

However, you seem to think your sleeping quarters in the little room above the horses in the barn as somewhat tough and lonesome, with only the scampering mice for company. Consider yourself a favored son of fortune, in that you have this great opportunity of truly plebian outlook; it may develop in you an understanding sympathy for the great army of unskilled workers, the non-attached, whose intermittant wage forces them to foot it from place to place, carrying their roll of blankets with them, to sleep in camps or barns, while aiding in the construction of the great works of our time—creators of the very prosperity that others enjoy—they themselves are forced out of the home-making class into an abnormal and unnatural way of life, fertile for vice and crime. I tell you this because some day you may be able to help remedy these barbarous conditions.

As regarding your lonliness, why, lonliness is but that condition in which the value of friendship is ascertained.

We hope this letter will give you a new viewpoint of the things that lay before you, and in which you may find your real work, aside from your work for bread, and thereby join us in constructive thought along these lines.

With love, YOUR FATHER.

ARE CHRISTIANS PROMOTING WARS?

By R. A. Dague.

General Sherman said, "War is hell." Now, I ask who is responsible for continuing hell in this world? All the so-called Christian countries are constantly increasing their armies and navies and taxing the people more and more each year to equip their armies and build war-ships. The "New York Call" says:

"By this time next year the standing armies of Europe (which now number five millions) will have them increased to six millions.

"It will require an addition of over $250,000,000 annually to defray the cost of the huge increase in German armaments that has just been ordered.

"Militarism has become a craze, a madness, a national lunacy."

Statisticians say that Great Britain expends four hundred and forty-four million dollars a year on war and only seventy-five millions on public schools. Russia is creating a billion-dollar navy. In the United States we are building two warships each year, at a cost of thirty millions, and our expenses to maintain our army and navy are increasing at a rapid rate.

Dr. David Starr Jordan, President of Stanford University, recently in a lecture said:

"Half of all the money in the world is spent in protecting one nation against another."

"San Francisco has just about as much use for the soldiers and warships stationed here as I have for the buttons decorating the tails of my coat."

A statistician has carefully made an estimate of the killed and wounded in wars in the past one hundred years, and places the figures at $140,000,000. He says the dead bodies of the victims of war since 1815 would cover an area of 2,800 square miles.

There are in the United States 300,000 Boy Scouts and 2,000,000 in the world. The movement was planned by professional men killers in England. The object of it is to cultivate the war spirit in the boys so that when scheming rulers and capitalists want to use them they will obey orders and become veritable fiends of cruelty, distruction and murder.

Poor innocent, deluded boys! Poor ignorant, betrayed and stupid working people, who are so willing for a mere pittance to go to war and murder other boys and other working men whom they have never seen and who have done them no harm, at the request of an ambitious King or selfish scheming plutocrats who want to capture the markets, or steal the lands or mines of other people.

The curse of war! The horrors of war! Can it be fitly described? No, no. There are no words in any human language that can properly portray the horrible, devilish, atrociousness of this unutterable curse that afflicts humanity.

A correspondent of "Brain and Brawn" who witnessed one of the battles in the recent Balkan-Turkish war, writes to that paper as follows:

"A gun collides with a cart (carrying wounded piled in heaps on filthy straw) and upsets it; with a crash, a shriek, a thud, the human cargo rolls into the slush, and the next gun goes right through the sprawling heap of maimed mankind. It does not much matter—only a few wounded men wounded a little more. Where they have fallen there is a purple pool; when we pass the spot a minute later the men's heavy tread splashes our faces with red specks. * * *

"There were three surgeons in the redoubt, these did their best with almost every necessary deficient. I saw them at their work with bare arms and blood-stained hands, soaked to the skin, faces streaming with the sweat of indescribably hard work; they looked with their saws and knives like the torturers of the Inquisition. Shirts served as bandages. volunteers assisted; but hardened men turned sick at some of the sights; halves of faces carried away, exposing to the core life's machinery; limbs torn off, bowels hanging out, pools of blood in which swam brain remnants and intestines like living worms; amputated legs and arms thrust into corners as offal for dogs. * * * Water ran short, for the enemy held the springs in the vineyards. Many drank the muddy pool water mixed with blood which had collected in the trenches; this caused vomiting, followed by thirst even greater that before."

Now, I ask, who has been responsible the past two thousand years for continuing this murderous, hellishness on this otherwise fair earth? Are they not fiends, wild-eyed, insane, inhuman demons? Surely these men are heathens—are blood-thirsty savages, more beast-like than human—monsters who have never heard that Jesus said: "Blessed are the peace-makers for they shall be called the children of God."

"The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

Oh, no, these are not savages, not pagans, but on the contrary are Christian nations. They are chiefly Roman Catholics and Protestants who build houses for God, send Bibles to the pagans, pray three times a day: "May thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven." They are the professed followers of Jesus whose birth was announced by angels who came singing: "Peace on earth, good will to men." For sixteen hundred years these professing Christians have fought their fellow men with all the malignity and ferocity of tigers. They have spilled rivers of blood and spread desolation, despair, death and hell throughout the world, and for what? The answer is because of religious bigotry, ambition and spoils, but chiefly for the latter. It is the brutal system of capitalism, or competition. that makes men lie, and cheat, and steal, and murder. It is the system that is supremely selfish and wicked. Men are not born heartless, savage murderers. They are made such by our system of capitalism that knows no mercy. Its motto is: "To the victor belongs the spoils." It appeals to the meanest propensities in men. It lives by selfishness and war.

Will that time ever come of which prophets tell us when "swords shall be beaten into plow-shares and spears into pruning hooks and nations shall learn war no more?"

No, not so long as the present system of capitalism exists. War is a necessary part of a system of which speculation profits, and the getting of wealth for nothing is its chief corner-stone. Wars will go on until Socialism stops them. It is the only international movement that is trying any practical methods for abolishing wars. Will not the Christian church put a stop to war? No, not the present mammonized church. There are many individual church men who oppose wars, but the church as an organized body in Europe with all the Kings and rich are busy promoting war. In the United States they are organizing the "Boy Scouts" and the "Militia of Christ," with the intent of using them in killing when necessary to protect their property interests. Jesus is called the "Prince of Peace," but for sixteen hundred years the churches seemed to have followed the lead of the "Prince of War." But is not the modern church opposed to war? No, not the rich, powerful churches, either Catholic or Protestant. Some of the smaller and weaker sects are opposed to war, such as the Quakers, the Christian Scientists, Spiritual and Universalists—those classed as heretics. Even the agnostics and infidels are doing much active work in trying to abolish war and to get hell out of the rich fighting orthodox Christians.

The labor unions are also endeavoring to abolish war. While Socialism now numbering its fifty or sixty millions of adherents in all parts of the world, stands unwaveringly and solidly against bloody strifes. Its four corner stones are justice, reciprocity, universal brotherhood, and universal peace, and its rallying cry is "an injury to one is the concern of all."

After a careful study of the subject, I do not hesitate to say that Socialism is not only sound to the core economically and politically, but it more truly represents genuine Christianity than either the Catholic or Protestant denominations.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, that gifted Socialist writer, said:

"O men, wise men, superior beings say, Is there no substitute for war in this great age and era? If you answer 'no,' then let us rear our children to be wolves and teach them from the cradle how to kill. Why should we women waste our time and work, in talking peace, when men declare for war?

In conclusion, I say to every man who reads this: Come with me, brothers, and let us take the pledge of George Kirkpatrick. He says:

"I extend to you my right hand.

"I make you a pledge.

"Here is my pledge to you:

"I refuse to kill your father. I refuse to slay your mother's son. I refuse to plunge a bayonet into the breast of your sister's brother. I refuse to murder your wife's husband. I refuse to butcher your little child's father. I refuse to wet the earth with blood and kind eyes with tears. I refuse to assassinate you and then hide my stained fists in the folds of any flag."

FARRINGTON PULLS THE MASK FROM GREED IN B. C.

Nanaimo, Vancouver Island, B. C., March 17, 1913.

Six months have passed since the Canadian Collieries Company, operating on Vancouver Island, British Columbia, locked out 1,500 of our members who were employed in their mines at Cumberland and Ladysmith. While the labor press of British Columbia has carried explanatory articles concerning this trouble, little has been written relating thereto for the United Mine Workers' Journal and other labor papers throughout the United States, and, as a consequence, a great majority of the rank and file of the Miners Union know little or nothing of the importance of this contest, the causes leading up to it, the difficulties encountered since its inception, or the influences that have been used to defeat the miners in this section of the Pacific Northwest who are struggling for a greater measure of the things to which they are entitled.

Vancouver Island is rich with almost inexhaustible deposits of the finest quality of bituminous coal yet discovered on the American continent, and said to be equal to the famous Welsh coal which is reputed to be the best in the world. These vast and rich deposits of coal have been monopolized by a few combinations of capital, the greater of which is our present foe, the Canadian Collieries Company, which is a ramification of the Canadian Northern Railroad and Steamship Company, a corporation composed principally of British capitalists and incorporated for $100,000,000.

Much of this coal is mined by Chinese and Japanese workmen, and all of it is mined under non-union conditions, and it is used for coaling vessels plying in the Trans-Pacific trade, but the greater bulk of it is shipped through the Straits of Georgia and Juan de Fuca into the markets of British Columbia, Alaska, Mexico, San Francisco, Portland and Seattle, in competetion with the union-mined coal of Washington and Easter British Columbia. An idea of the advantage this coal has in the markets of the Pacific coast will be gained from the knowledge that union-mined coal produced in the Roslyn-Cle Elum field of Washington, has been entirely excluded from the local Seattle market because it cannot be transported over the Cascade mountains and meet the competition of Vancouver Island coal. Again, Oregon with Portland as its chief base of distribution, receives almost all of its coal supply from the same source. Coming, as it does, down the coast and entering the Columbia River at Fort Stevens, whence it reaches Portland and is sold at a price that prohibits competition from the adjoining state of Washington, and this notwithstanding there is an import duty of forty-five cents per ton on all coal coming from the Island into the United States.

However, this is not the worst feature of a bad condition. There is another angle to it that must have the consideration of the United Mine Workers of America. Extending along the Pacific Coast of British Columbia six hundred miles, from Vancouver Island to Prince Rupert near the Arctic Circle, is one immense bed of high-grade coal which has been monopolized by practically the same interests that operate on Vancouver Island. Already this rich source of supply is tapped by many mines in process of development, so as to be ready for the opening of the Panama Canal, which will undoubtedly in the near future make this territory one of the greatest coal producing centers on the American continent. It is anticipated that with the opening of the canal myriads of alien workers from European countries will be induced to enter British Columbia via Vancouver City and Victoria, the natural ports of entry into this new field of labor. Even now the large steamship companies have agents scouring Europe, who are painting seductive pictures of the possibilities of this new El Dorado and offering inviting transportation rates to all those who wish to enter after the opening of the canal. That their efforts will result in multitudes of workers migrating into British Columrich mining properties and will be used to develop these ric bia is not doubted. Much of this foreign labor will be used to develop these rich mining properties and will create a tremendous tonnage that must find a market. These mines are located so that the output can be dumped from the tipple into ocean-going vessels, and, with the long haul around the horn eliminated, can be freighted without transfer from the mines to the Atlantic seaboard at a transportation cost that will allow it to become a strong competing factor in the markets now supplied by the union-mined coal of the eastern states.

As a matter of fact the Canadian Northern and other steamship companies have already contracted for the construction of an additional number of modern ocean freighters to be used in this trade.

So that is it is not beyond reasonable conjecture to expect that within a comparatively short time we will find this coal bidding for market on the Atlantic seaboard as well as on the Pacific Coast. This feature in itself would not be so bad if there could be an interchange of competition but that cannot be, for the reason that the much superior quality of this coal will always bar outside competition from its own sons.

The duty devolving upon the United Mine Workers' of America because of this conditions, is to organize Vancouver Island and adjacent territory, raise the standard of employment and act as a balancing medium in the establishment of equitable competitive mining rates. This will be a herculean task, but it must be done, or we must suffer from inequitable competition, and the job can be easier done now than after the task gets bigger.

Recognizing the seriousness of this condition and being desirous of protecting the interests of our membership, as well as being anxious to extend assistance to the men employed on Vancouver Island who, because of the absence of an organization, were being infamously fleeced and subjected to impositions that reached the last degree of toleration, the International Executive Board decided to expand the power and protection of the organization to the island. In keeping with this decision a District Convention was held in Nanaimo during the month of November, 1911, and a district organization was formed. From the beginning the men took kindly to the organization which grew rapidly in numerical strength, and there was every prospect of a substantial organization being established, when, during September 1912, the Canadian Collieries Company, evidently fearing their power was passing, began singling out and discriminating against the more active of the men. Peaceful overtures from the men for an explanation of the management's action met only with arrogant rebuff. This sort of treatment was tolerated until it could no longer be endured without resentment, and after every peaceful means of redress had been exhausted the men decided to show their opposition to such injustice by taking a holiday, which they did, and after which the company refused to allow them to return to work unless they should sign individual contracts (old iron-clads so familiar to the men in the United States), the terms of which would make the signers little more than bondmen, and which would result in the voluntary dissolution of their union. This the men refused to agree to, and the fight has been on ever since.

During the progress of this struggle all the modern instruments used to defeat men engaged in industrial struggles elsewhere have been used to defeat the men engaged in this contest. Hardships, hunger, evictions, brutality, arrests, strike breakers, false press reports, illegal repression of vested rights, intimidation, political prostitution and armed guards are elements common to this battle for human rights.

However, notwithstanding that the company have mustered every influence at their command, they have not been able to produce any considerable part of their original tonnage, or to discourage the men involved, an dif solidarity, fidelity and courage are a harbinger of success the end will see the United Mine Workers' of America established on Vancouver Island.

FRANK FARRINGTON.

CONDITIONS OF THE COAL MINERS INVESTIGATED.

Nanaimo, B. C., March 24, 1913.

The Royal Labor Commission, appointed by the Provincial government to investigate labor conditions throughout the province of British Columbia, commenced their labors in Cumberland February 19th and completed their work of receiving testimony and evidence relating to mining conditions under the Canadian Collieries Company at Ladysmith on February 26th. The foregoing announcement will undoubtedly be of interest to the members of the United Mine Workers' of America, inasmuch as the function of the commission on the occasion mentioned, was to learn the causes which created our present trouble on Vancouver Island.

To recount all the testimony given before the commission under judicial oath would make an article too voluminous for ready comprehension. Hence only a recapitulation of the general testimony will be given, which will be sufficient to show that the Canadian Collieries Company is entitled to high rank among the scientific exploiters of labor. The story written into the records of the commission by the miners' representatives, and unrefuted by the company, is the same story that is woven into the history of every mining district where men toil without the protection of an organization. Frugal living, industrious and practical men who have spent all their working days in the pursuit of mining, told of cruel oppression, iniquitous robbery, infamous abuses, official arrogance and soul-racking drudgery encountered during their struggle to win a means of livelihood from this company.

Poorly ventilated mines, dangerous working conditions, excessive cost of living, exorbitant rentals, short weights, monthly pays, and lax, or non-enforcement, of mining laws are only a part of the cycle of evils surrounding these men. This company respects no specified or uniform scales for narrow work, dead work or company work. The rates of compensation paid for these classes of labor depend entirely upon the caprice of the pit boss, who is the only determining factor. No one employed at such work knows when he starts work what he is going to receive for his labor until pay day, when he receives what the pit boss has decreed he shall have. Those who object to the price paid have one of two alternatives to choose from, which is to accept the boss' fiat or quit.

The day wages paid range from $1.35 to $2.86; narrow work price from nothing to what the boss wishes to pay; dead work price the same as narrow work. The tonnage rate is 82½c based on the long ton of 2240 pounds plus ten percent coal added for impurities, which means that the miner must load 2464 pounds of coal for one ton. Or, in other words, a miner loading 100 long tons of coal receives pay for 90 long tons, the company confiscating ten percent of his output to cover impurities even though there are no impurities in his coal.

To add to this iniquity the company operates a docking system under which any particular car of coal found to contain 50 pounds of impurities is seized by the company.

The miners of Cumberland are compelled to pay the company thirty-cents per pound for thirty and forty percent giant powder. The miners of Ladysmith pay twenty-cents per pound for the same explosive, while the miners working for the Westen Fuel Company at Nanaimo, receive identically the same grade of powder for sixteen cents per pound. These three camps are all within a radius of eighty miles so that the wide difference in the price of powder cannot be rightfully attributed to the difference in freight rates. Neither is the comparatively low cost of powder at Nanaimo any recommedation for the Western Fuel Company, which concern has its own schemes for fleecing its employés. Nor is the inequality between the cost of powder at Ladysmith and Cumberland any evidence that the Canadian Collieries Company favor the Ladysmith men who, while they suffer to a less degree from extortionate powder cost than do the Cumberland men, nevertheless equalize the discrepancy through the application of other impositions. This powder abuse is given added significance by the facts that this coal is of an extremely stubborn nature, full of faults, and that it is not unusual for a miners' powder expense to run as high as $50 per month. This one evil alone demonstrates the utter helplessness of the men and the complete mastery of the company.

A few abbreviated quotations taken from the great volume of testimony, follows:

Mike Gedritis: "I worked two months and averaged $1.75 per day. The following month I earned $4.50 per day and the boss told I was earning too much money and reduced my yardage price fifty-cents per yard."

Frank Terry: "I drove 12 yards of narrow work and was paid for 9 yards. Was ordered out of the company's office when I went to claim the other three yards."

R. Smith: "Was earning $2.10 per day when my place caved and had to clean it up without compensation."

A. Griosi: "Received $9 for 18 days work but was afterwards made up to $2 per day."

Fred Doherty: Drove 31 yards of narrow work and was paid for only 20 yards. Made complaint and was told that I was earning too much money. I did not receive pay for the other 11 yards due me."

John Borus: "I worked a place where I had five feet of dirt to handle. I earned $31 for 22 days work. I complained and was told by the mine boss that the company did not pay anything for handlingg dirt."

William Langden: "I worked a place where I handled eight and nine cars of rock each day. I earned $54.80 in 25 days. I complained and was told that if I did not like it I could take out my tools."

The above quotations are only samples and are not an exaggeration of the testimony of numerous other witnesses who testified before the commission, and are quoted only as additional evidence to prove the unscrupulous practices and ravenous greed of the Canadian Colleries Company.

Furthermore, it was developed before the commission, that the employés of this company have been contributing to an accident and sick fund, of which the company's general manager is the custodian, and which was created to care for the funeral and medical expense of killed, injured and sick employés. At the inception of this lockout there was a combined surplus of $8,000 in this fund which, by every manner of reasoning, belongs to the men who paid it in, but, notwithstanding, the company have paid nothing into this fund their general manager now refuses to allow the creators of the surplus to reap any of the benefits therefrom but is expending it to care for men who were imported to fill the places of the men who created the fund.

This coal retails in Vancouver City and Victoria for prices ranging from $8.50 to $10 per ton, so that both the producers and consumers are being pillaged and the loot is going into the hungry maw of the Canadian Colleries Company, one of whose spokesmen tesified that he did not believe in labor unions and that he preferred Chinamen to white workmen. The reason rs obvious.

Evidently fearing the light of publicity the real culprits who are responsible for the policies of this company did not appear before the commission in defence of their merciless and thieving practices, but remained in the background and sent a few petty subordinates to the front who, in the main, testified that they were without power to answer for the actions of the company. And this is the company whose officers while deserving the scorn and mental lashing of every decent and justice-loving man, wields sufficient power to have maintained at the expense of an already outraged public an army of special provincial police to protect them in their villainy, and whose general manager has decreed that the United Mine Workers' of America must be driven from Vancouver Island.

FRANK FARRINGTON, International Representative U. M. W. of A.

JOE ETTOR RETURNS TO HOME IN TACOMA.

Must Remain Here or Lose Parents.—Happy Father Says He and Wife Will Go Away if Boy Leaves Again.

Joe Ettor is home. He arrived late last night on Northern Pacific train No. 1. And it may be a long while before another train takes him back to his labors in the executive councils of the I. W. W.

Joe's father, M. A. Ettor, 1315 East Twenty-sixth street, a well-to-do teaming contractor of Tacoma, is going to try to divorce his son from the risky work in a radical cause. He says he will offer him a partnership in his business and he will give him everything in his power that a father can give to win the boy from the ways of the I. W. W.

But if Joe refuses, all the wrath of an outraged father will turn in disappointment and sweep the relationship of father and son aside forever. That was the decree of Ettor Senior last night, after he had clasped Joe in his arms at the union depot.

Boy Must Stay, Or——!

"I've got that boy in my heart," he said, "and I won't have any more of that stain on my name. Joe's had enough. I'm going to keep him here. I've got a good business and Joe can stay here and help me. But if he don't stay —then I'll sell everything I've got, take my wife with me, and go. Joe will never hear from me again. I'll hate to do it because Joe's been a good boy, but if I get mad enough—here he placed his cigar in his teeth and muttered the rest of the sentence.

Sleek and fat, with no trace of the ten months spent in a Massachusetts jail, showing in his plump cheeks, Joe sat in his home last night for the first time in six years. He smoked a big Havana cigar from a box his father had bought for him, and he told of the riotous scenes of the Lawrence strike. Asked what he and his companions, Giovannatti and Caruso, thought of while waiting for their trial on a first degree murder charge which grew out of one of the Lawrence riots, he said: "We didn't care a rap."

Never Expected Conviction.

"We knew they couldn't hang us or there'd be a revolution in Massachusetts the next day," he said. "The only thing we were the least bit worried about was that they would fake up a case that would send us up for a few years. I never heard so many lies told in my life as I did during that trial. They made them out of whole cloth. But it wasn't enough. That jury was a good one and they saw through the feeble attempt to get us. Yes, it felt good to be free again. But we never for o moment expected to be found guilty as charged.

During all of his conversation Ettor, who is but twenty-seven years old, carefully refrained from using the words "execution," "hang" or "electrocute." He passed over this part of the story quickly.

Expects to Remain Home.

"No, I won't go back East for a while. I was on my way home when the Lawrence strike began and they sent me down there. I had my grips packed and everything ready to start for home when the trouble broke out. Now I am home, and I guess I will stay for a few months," he said.

Ettor bears a livid scar about three inches long extending from his left eye straight up to the roots of his long, bushy black hair. He got this, he said, two years ago, when he was waylaid in New York.

"It's all in the game," he said with a smile. "We can expect those things. We have to bear them and grin and then go on fighting."

Ettor would give no intimation as to whether he would leave the general executive committee of the I. W. W., according to his father's wishes, or not.

Dining car conductors on the Northern Pacific who traveled with Ettor on his trip west, said last night that he lived on the fat of the land during the entire time. The best meals the dining car afforded were set up for him and his Pullman accommodations were also of the best.—Tacoma Ledger.

LABOR PARAGRAPHS.

Illuminating the Keen Struggle Between Labor and Capital.

Higher wages won't solve the industrial problem, or give the producers justice, because higher wages are offset by higher prices. The element of private profit must be driven out of industry before industry can be conducted on just, humane and rational lines.

The industrial problem lies at the bottom of all problems.

The agitator always has been and always will be an educator.

He points out incongruous conditions and he challenges the right of those who exist without returning to society an equivalent.

If we first free the mind, then the shackles will fall from limb and soul.

Some people imagine prices have gone up in an airship and must soon come down.

The fact is they are up in the solid sphere of monopoly and will only fall when capitalism falls.

War provides employment; that's one of the capitalist's excuses for it. When next he uses that argument remind him that burglary also provides employment.

Socialism isn't a system. Capitalism didn't appear in the world as a system; it gradually grew into one. So with Socialism, one can not give a cut and dried plan of its operations.

Labor believes in work. That's why it opposes the capitalist, who seldom works.

Some small capitalists work, but a number of others, who live on rents and dividends, dodge it.

The shirkers are increasing in number, because inventions, which are creating more dividend drawers, are at the same time creating more unemployed.

Labor believes in private property, but would reorganize industry so that every worker would, almost automatically, acquire private property.

The private property which labor opposes is the sort which is used to exploit others, such as land, factories, machinery, etc.

Socialism will triumph and wage slavery vanish, only as a result of economic education. The workers, therefore, must concentrate all their thought, energy and sacrifice on this education. Nothing else now matters.

Socialism is an economic movement, therefore it does not concern itself with religion. But by freeing men from wageslavery, and the unnecessary struggle for existence, it will give them greater opportunity for spiritual development.

Isn't it worth $25, or $50, or $100 to each worker to become his own boss? Well, let him put that amount into an education fund. Economic education will abolish wage slavery.

When social co-operation has been brought about exploitation will cease, for co-operation doesn't mean "dividing up things" and then making a fresh start on the old robbery.

Socialism doesn't mean "dividing up" at all. Socialism simply means the public ownership of all the principal social services, and neither individual nor sectional robbery would be possible under it.

Unionism is by its cultivation of the social spirit is laying the foundations of future society. Its watchword is brotherhood, its aim freedom and its gospel humanity.

Employerdom is anti-social, for it is based on competition. The employer not only robs his employés, but in order to live he must trample on rivals.

The ranks of unionism are ever open to the non-unionist worker. They are not open to the capitalist, because unionism's mission is to abolish the capitalist, not to absorb him.

Nothing can stay the progress of Socialism except ignorance, for it is based on reason, science and truth. Because of its firm foundation its opponents find difficulty in fighting it.—New York Daily People.

MAKING HUMAN SACRIFICES OF THE AGED.

In the holiday mail which came to this office was the following letter:

"Respected Friend—I am an old man, refined and intelligent, in fairly good health for my age of 80 years. I have but few dollars, no friends, no home, but a room with strangers; no vices of any kind. Now, my dear friend, what am I to do? I fear a possible lingering illness, entailing therefore a burden upon those who may witness my last hours. My multiplied years admonish me that the shadow upon the dial of time will before long cease to record the passing days of my earthly life. I want to escape the almshouse and suicide, which is in my daily thoughts. I do not want to become an actor in a tragedy as dark and deep as was ever woven from the warp and woof of human experience.

"Can you give me any comfort, or shall I sink down into the rayless depths of utter despair and find serenity in death?"

The letter was written in a hand showing the traces of age, but remarkably firm for one of four-score years. The chirography corroborated the evidence of the phrasing of the letter that the author is a person of unusual mental background, who has retained his strength of mind and has keen appreciation of his present position.

The communication was signed by the full name and address of the writer, an important detail, as it permitted the North American to institute an inquiry into the genuineness of the letter. The report we have received from an expert charity investigator confirms every point of the letter. The writer is old; he is a man of a respectable and useful past; he has refined personal tastes; he has lived a clean life so far as any record can show; he has no bad habits; he is sprightly in mind and body; he is poor; when he wrote the letter he was facing the almshouse or a more horrible alternative.

Now, this case in itself is not important enough to call for such prominent notice as we give it here. If it were only an instance of an old man in the situation that hundreds of thousands of other aged persons, men and women, are in at this moment, we would, however reluctantly, be compelled to pass it by with an appeal to the charitable for temporary relief. But it is just because of those hundreds of thousands of others that we make this old man's case the subject or rather the text for an editorial. He is not worse off than they. Indeed, he is much better off. For he is to be taken care of, while they must struggle on under their weight of years, helpless, hopeless. dependent on desultory aid or virtual prisoners in the sordid and repulsive surroundings of the almshouses, to which our public sentiment, miscalled charity, condemns the unfortunate old.

And among these hundreds of thousands, convicted of the most heinous of modern crimes—poverty—and undergoing life sentences for their offense, are thousands of married couples whose lives go back together to youth. Their memories span the gulf of years to the time when with the world full of promise they joined heart and hand in a bond that God and man promised them should be till death did them part.

Through toil and endeavor, sickness and health, storm and sunshine, with high hopes or disappointed hearts, they have worked on, giving their best to the world. With the sinking of the sun in their western sky they have felt the chill of the coming night. It has made them dearer to one another. They have drawn closer for companionship as all other companions faded. Like children in the woods as darkness falls they have huddled together more fully to realize the only human touch that each had with life.

The end comes. The magnificent charity of a world overflowing with plenty offers them a life term in disgusting prisons, herded with derelicts and degenerates. That is their reward for years of toil whose product has gone to enrich the community. But, anguish of anguish, the almshouse prison with all its sordid surroundings is made infinitely worse by the separation of these old men and women. More to each other than any other human beings, more a thousand times than any bride and bridegroom, the old man is sent to one prison and the old woman sent to another. The world gives them but one choice—suicide by starvation or otherwise.

This is the picture which lies behind the very moderate case brought to our attention by the letter which we have quoted in this editorial. We are happy to say that this one old man is already provided for. Some kindly persons have undertaken to see that he will have a home for the rest of his days. But what about the great army of which he was but one, and in which he occupied a particularly favorable position? Is society to go on forever offering its aged poor as human sacrifices?

The methods of charity at best can never be anything but palliatives applied to a few isolated cases. What about the others? It is part of the great problem of social and industrial justice. Old age pensions is one answer. These as features of the comprehensive plan for a better and higher civilization founded on the eternal principles of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God will save our old people from "a tragedy as dark and deep as was ever woven from the warp and woof of human experience." That our aged correspondent's letter may help to hasten the day is the comfort that we offer him, now that his individual future is assured.—Philadelphia North American.

THE RELIGIOUS EXHORTER.

Many people have wondered why Gypsy Smith, Billy Sunday and other professional evangelists have so much advertising in the papers and also why they are paid about $1,000 per day by the business men of the city which they "clean up" morally. We must study up on the question of what morality consists of to find the answer.

Under the ancient tribal system, all wealth was owned collectively by the tribe.

The government of the tribe was by tribal council, which consisted of all grown up members of the tribe, both male and female. The elders were always listened to with great respect, because of their greater experience, but a majority always decided each question discussed.

The code of morals was intended to, and actually did, put the welfare of the whole tribe ahead of the selfish wishes of any individual member. "Good" was something that protected the tribe. "Bad" was something detrimental to the tribe.

Under the system of chattel slavery we find quite a different code of morals. What was "good" was what the master wanted done. "Bad" was what the master class did not want done. To make this more plain, it was "good" for the master to take the slave's product away from the slave. This was not stealing but was moral, legal, and was sanctified by all the gods kept by our heathen ancestors who maintained the institution of chattel slavery in Europe 2,000 years ago.

Should the slave, while hungry, take more food out of his own product than the master allowed him, this was "bad," immoral, illegal, irreligious and not only subjected the slave to punishment from the master, but the slave was threatened with hell after he died. The priests were more effective in keeping the slave in abject submission than the club of the master so priestcraft grew and prospered.

When the feudal system gradually took the place of the system of chattel slavery, we still find the moral code evolving to serve the new master class.

It was good if it was what the baron wanted done.

It was bad if the baron did not like it. When the capitalist class carried through their successful revolutions against feudalism and established the present capitalistic state, we find the moral code evolving again.

It is now good to do what the collective capitalists have decided is the right way for us to behave.

It is bad to break those rules. It is bad to steal food when you are hungry even if your family is starving for the lack of it.

It is good for the capitalist to hire the worker for a "living wage" and steal all the worker produces over that amount.

If you steal a railroad from the people they send you to the Senate, but if you steal a ride on the railroad you helped to build, they send you to jail.

The capitalists have, through their lawmakers, worked out an elaborate code of morals, made them law, employ through the state judges to enforce them, and privately they employ editors, teachers and subsidized ministers to drive them into our heads.

Every once in a while the workers show signs of waking up, then they employ a professional hypnotist to put them to sleep again.

They call these people evangelists. They are skilled in hypnotism and the business men get out a great crowd for them, through slever advertising, and the hypnotist drives the code of morals into them, then threatens them with hell fire if they break the code again.

Billy Sunday may not have saved many souls, but he has saved several hundred thousand dollars of the money given him by the business interests to keep their clerks and other working people "good."

When the working people wake out of this hypnotic sleep and realize that they outnumber the capitalists ten to one, we will be able to capture this country at the ballot and write new laws and a new code of morals.

The new code will, like the tribal code, stand for the material interests of the whole people.—H. H. Caldwell, in Oakland World.

PERSPICUOUS PASSAGES.

There are only two classes—the producers and the parasites.

Many of the parasites, the unemployed, for instance, would become producers if industry were socially organized.

The co-operative commonwealth is not "coming." We are now actually entering it.

The Socialist is the world's schoolmaster. He is teaching the world how to live. Anti-Sosh would merely have people exist.

Commonwealth means wealth for the use of all.

Organized labor is a menace, not to industry, but to the control of industry by organized capital.

When Liberty is attained, love and leisure will also come.

When the producers, rural and urban, are united, they will not be the tail of the kite.

The workers do everything, but get only enough to enable them to continue working.

The capitalists do nothing, get nearly everything, and the more they get the less capable they become of doing anything.

Once capitalists worked—as managers. But the rise of the joint stock company is permitting more and more capitalists to live without work—on dividends.

It can't be done? That was said of everything—before it was done. It was said of aerial navigation ten years ago.

To replace competitive chaos, in production and distribution, by scientific organization, is all that labor is trying to do.

Competition means waste, costliness and—failure. Co-operation means directed effort, cheapness, plenty and—success

It takes a lot of slaves to keep a few masters. And who, think you, are those slaves?

The survival of the fittest means that, under capitalism, the misers, money-grabbers, swindlers and sweaters are fittest, so they come out on top.

Establish social co-operation, and the fittest would be those performing the best social service. Greed and selfishness would then represent fitness —and handicaps.

Under capitalism the premier handicaps are truth, honesty and generosity.

The class struggle is such a hideous fact that the press denotes it in big black headlines, using such words as "murder," "crime," "tragedy," etc.

You know how much you've got. Now figure out how much you've made. The shortage is due to the fact that the producer doesn't get the value of the product.

As to compensation, it may be noted that capitalism, when it drives a competitor out of business, does not compensate him. Nor when it introduces labor-saving devices, does it compensate those thrown out of work.

All taxes, direct and indirect, are paid out of the products of labor. Whether the taxes are high or low does not concern the worker, for he has no say in the matter.

When the producer can claim the full value of his product, then taxation will concern him, for he will have to pay direct out of the value. The main thing now is to get the full value.

The King of England pays his agricultural workers on the Balmoral estate sixteen shillings a week. Which is the more important social service, producing a potato, or opening a bazaar?

The right to work simply means the right to live. No one can go to the capitalist and demand work and the right to live. For that reason society itself should control industry.

Society admits the right of a man to live. Indeed, it denies him the right to take his own life. This attitude will become rational only when society can offer a man work.

Socialism would destroy the home, would it?

Drunkenness, divorce, poverty, squalor, are fine preservatives of the home are they not?

Well, Socialism will abolish these.—Westralian Worker.

THE TRAIL OF MANKIND.

The great antiquity of mankind upon the earth has been conclusively established. It seems singular that the proofs should have been discovered as recently as within the last thirty years (written 1877), and that the present generation should be the first called upon to recognize so important a fact.

Mankind are now known to have existed in Europe in the glacial period, and even back of its commencement, with every probability of their origination in a prior geological age. They have survived many races of animals with whom they were contemporaneous, and passed through a process of development, in the several branches of the human family, as remarkable in its courses as in its progress.

Since the probable length of their career is connected with geological periods, a limited measure of time is excluded. One hundred or two hundred thousand years would be an unextravagant estimate of the period from the disappearance of the glaciers in the Northern hemisphere to the present time. Whatever doubts may attend any estimate of a period, the actual duration of which is unknown, the existence of mankind extends backward immeasurably, and loses itself in a vast and profound antiquity.

This knowledge changes materially the views which have prevailed respecting the relations of savages to barbarians, and of barbarians to civilized men. It can now be asserted upon convincing evidence that savagery preceded barbarism in all the tribes of mankind, as barbarism is known to have preceded civilization. The history of the human race is one in source, one in experience, and one in progress.

It is both a natural and propr desire to learn, if possible, how all these ages upon ages of past time have been expended by mankind; haw savages, advancing by slow, almost imperceptible steps, attained the higher condition of barbarism; how barbarism, by similar progressive advancement, finally attained to civilization; and why other tribes and nations have been left behind in the race of progress—some in civilization, some in barbarism, and others in savagery. It is not too much to expect that ultimately these several questions will be answered.

Inventions and discoveries stand in serial relations along the lines of human progress, and register its successive stages; while social and civil institutions, in virtue of their connection with perpetual human wants, have been developed from a few primary germs of thought. They exhibit a similar register of progress. These institutions, inventions and discoveries have embodied and preserved illustrative of their experience. When collated and compared they tend to show the unity or origin of mankind, the similarity of human wants in the same stage of advancement, and the uniformity of the operations of the human mind in similar conditions of society.

Throughout the latter part of the period of savagery, and the entire period of barbarism, mankind in general were organized in gentes, phratries and tribes. These organizations prevailed throughout the entire world upon all continents, and were the instruments by means of which ancient society was organized and held together. Their structure, and relations as members of an organic seris, and of the members of the phratry and tribe, illustrate the growth of the idea of government in the human mind. The principal institutions of mankind originated in savagery, were developed in barbarism, and are maturing in civilization.

In like manner, the family has passed through successive forms, and created great systems of consanguinity and affinity which have remained to the present time. These systems, which record the relationsbip existing in the family of the period, when each system respectively was formed, contain an instructive record of the experience of mankind while the family was advancing from the consanguine monogaman.

The idea of property has undergone a similar growth and development. Commencing at zero in savagery, the passion for the possession of property, as the representative of accumulated subsistence, has now become dominant over the human mind, in civilized races.—Lewis H. Morgan, in the preface to Ancient Society.

EAGLE RIVER REGION, SOUTHEASTERN ALASKA.

Important Gold-Bearing Territory Reported on by United States Geological Survey.

The first gold mining in Alaska was done in the so-called Juneau gold belt, where operations were begun over thirty years ago. The value of the gold produced in this region is more than $50,000,000. Most of this gold has been taken from the famous Treadwell and other mines near Juneau. The auriferous belt is, however, known to stretch for some fifty miles to the north and includes the Eagle River region, described in a report by Adolph Knopf, just issued by the United States Geological Survey as Bulletin 502. This report, unlike many others on mining districts in Alaska, which are of a reconnaissance character, treats of the region in detail. It is entitled "Geology and Mineral Resources of the Eagle River Region, Alaska," and is accompanied by a topographic map on a scale of a mile to the inch, with 100-foot contours, by J. W. Bagley, and a detailed geologic map on the same scale.

Gold-bearing lodes constitute the only mineral resource of the Eagle River region now under development. The ore bodies occur in certain geologic associations which are described in the report and elucidated by the map. This book will therefore be of great service to the prospector by guiding him to the most promising localities in which to search for ore bodies. A copy may be obtained on application to the Director of the Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

LEAD PRODUCTION IN 1912.

The final figures of the production of lead in the United States in 1912 have just been published by the United States Geological Survey. These figures have been compiled by C. E. Siebenthal of the Survey from reports of the output of each lead smelter and refinery in operation in this country in 1912. Two tables are given. The first one shows the lead smelted in this country from ore from each lead-producing state and from each foreign country furnishing ore for treatment. These figures include soft lead, lead content of bullion (that is, "work lead"), and antimonial lead and their total necessarily does not agree with the total refined lead output of the country, shown in the second table. The refined lead, however, can not be traced to its sources so exactly as the smelted lead, hence the figures for smelter production are used in the table showing production by states.

The total production of refined lead in 1912 was 480,894 short tons, which is 71tons less than the estimate given out by the Survey on January 2, 1913. This quantity is exclusive of 13,552 tons of antimonial lead. The total of refined lead is made up of 88,377 short tons of desilverized lead of foreign origin, 221,480 tons of desilverized lead from domestic ores, 141,248 tons of domestic soft lead, and 29,789 tons of desilverized domestic soft lead. The value of the whole quantity of refined lead was $43,280,460; of this the domestic lead was worth $35,326,530, calculated at 4.5 cents a pound, the average New York price for the year. The total refined lead output was less than that for 1911 by 6.085 short tons, a decrease of 1.2 per cent.

Among the states, Missouri had the greatest output—162,610 tons, a decrease of almost 20,000 tons from that of the previous year. Idaho had the next largest production—127,707 tons, a gain of 10,372 tons over the output of 1911.

In the absence of complete figures of domestic stocks, it is not possible to calculate consumption except for the lead of foreign origin. However, by taking into account domestic production and foreign imports, exports and stocks in bonded warehouse, it is possible to estimate the quantity of lead available for consumption from year to year. On this basis the lead available for consumption in 1912 was 410,953 tons, an increase of 11,766 tons, or 2.9 per cent. Whether this increase represents an increase in consumption or an increase in domestic stocks is not determinable from the information at hand.

The report includes a graphic chart showing the fluctuation of the price of lead at New York and London for the period 1906-1912, a list of lead smelters and refineries in the United States, a table of the lead production of the world by countries, and tables of imports of lead by countries and by classes, as shown by the records of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. The general imports of lead show a continued decline from 1909, when 225,090,312 pounds of lead was received to 1912, when the imports were 167,121,592 pounds. Of the 1912 imports, 159,455,664 pounds was received from Mexico in the form of ore or base bullion, 3,207,936 pounds of lead in ore from South America, and 3,309,356 pounds from other countries, mostly in ore from German East Africa.

A copy of the report may be obtained by addressing a request to the Director, United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

Your world is full of misery, and want, and sin, and hate;
Your thoughts are cold and brutish and selfish and sensate;
For other's woe and suffering you do not care a damn;
You do not wish to learn about the brotherhood of man.

"Survival of the Keenest" is the slogan of your camps,
The products of your policies are masters, slaves and tramps.
Emotions egotistic fill out your lives' short span,
No thought you give, however brief, to brotherhood of man.

Your morals are the rules of beasts—of beak, and fang, and claw;
The wrongs ye wreak defended by the statutes of the law;
With faltering, hypocritic cant, with all the power you can,
You cast reproach upon the cult of brotherhood of man.

The Church, too, lends her ready ears to your seductive wiles,
The senser swings, the prayer resounds within her venal aisles.
For Mammon's sake the Golden Rule is placed beneath her ban,
She disregards the Saviour's plea for brotherhood of man.

Your statesmen (?) seek with foul intent to vilify the new,
To glorify the ancient wrong, to vitiate the true;
With bold, mendacious art deceive and mystify the clan
Regarding altruism and the brotherhood of man.

What will you do, ye strong of earth, where will you hide, O priest,
When the reign of wrong is ended and the new light paints the East;
When martyr, saint and patriot declare that day began
With the rising sun of Socialism bringing brotherhood of man.

A. A. KAUTZ.

THE HOBO MINER.

(Tune—"Where the Silvery Colorado Wends Its Way.")

The hobo gayly wanders round the West to find a berth
That all miners love to call a cozy dump.
For there eats and better bunking put some substance to his girth
Anent the time he'll make another jump.
He will ramble in the spring time and his heart will know no pain;
He'll warble songs to smooth his rocky way,
And find sleep beneath the heavens till fresh and spruced again;
He'll defy the tasks ahead to dull his day.

REFRAIN.

He's a friend in every pinch,
Tho' his life affords no cinch
On the worldly goods that seldom come his way;
And when summer days are come
Around the West he floats a bum,
Where the weakling gad-abouts do never stray.

The fiercely burning deserts in his mind no fears arouse,
Tho' the thirsty heat doth sap his flesh away,
While he walks with bleeding paddles and with aches that vainly souse
With their dope the merry thoughts he won't betray.
He has tackled in the June time all the spooks that haunt the plains
For years and years he has braved their angry breath,
And has tapped the hills in places where the snow a reign maintains
With an icy avalanche that's tipp'd with death.

The ripping, roaring Teddy to the jungles went his way,
And the nation mark'd with awe his mighty deeds,
And yet blacks, a goodly number, made his hardships merely play;
With their guns and heavy loads they filled his needs.
But the hobo, if the same job with less pay, should come his way
Would gladly pitch his tents on Afric soil,
To win rest where lots of shooting would make a holiday,
For his mirthful soul that even throve on toil.

The winning merchant, smiling at his making of the dough
Is but jolly when his graft is going right,
For he frets and worries treble if he loses on a throw.
To be "safe and sane" his life must know no night;
But the miner on the hard hike is for aye the pard of cheer—
The grouchy thought is exiled from his skull.
Although Fate betrays his purpose, the future holds no fear
For the blooming optimist who's tried in full.

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

MINERS are urged to stay away from Vancouver, British Columbia. A strike is on at the Britannia mine.

PRESIDENT MOYER left Denver last week for Indianapolis to attend a convention of the Mining Department of the American Federation of Labor.

THE WIFE of a Chicago merchant recently paid $10,000 for a blooded dog.

The $10,000 that was paid for the dog made it necesary for underpaid women to solicit on the street.

AT THE RECENT CITY ELECTION held in Butte, Montana, the Socialists elected the mayor, treasurer, police judge and six of the nine members of the city council. The city council of Butte is now made up of seven Socialists, five Democrats and four Republicans.

PERSONALLY Morgan was almost unknown, but financially, he was known throughout the world.

As an industrial despot, he was peerless in his brutality, and as a pirate in finance, he knew no mercy and gave no quarter. Morgan left few to mourn his exit.

THE LABORING PEOPLE of Germany are holding mass meetings protesting against the high cost of living.

As the people of other nations are in rebellion against the cost of living, there is liable to be a world-wide mass meeting, that will ultimately result in the death of greed.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE is demanded in Belgium. A strike involving 400,000 has been declared as a means to acquire the right to cast an equal ballot. The strike is under the supervision of the Socialist party of Belgium and the children of the strikers are being sent to Germany, France and Holland to be cared for by the Socialists.

THE STREET-CAR MEN of Buffalo, New York, at this writing are on strike, and as usual, the brave "boys in blue" are aiding the railway magnates to suppress the strikers.

A number of those involved in the strike have already felt the prod of the bayonet while others have been taken to the hospitals in order that surgeons may probe for bullets.

MAX S. HAYES, editor of the Cleveland Citizen, has been required to drop his pen under the orders of a physician and take a vacation, Max is one of the ablest writers in labor journalism in America, and as a speaker, ranks with the most eloquent.

Thousands of men and women throughout the United States, will hope that a rest will result in his complete recovery.

AT MUNICH, GERMANY, organized labor has just completed a labor temple at a cost of $200,000.

The labor organizations and socialists will occupy the building as headquarters.

Munich boasts of a membership of 70,000 and these members erected a labor temple that is a creditable monument to unionism.

NEARLY SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT of our appropriations are expended for war purposes.

It is no wonder that millions of people in the United States are impoverished and that nearly a million women have sold their honor for the means of life.

Glorious civilization!

NOW all the building trades in Australia are discussing the proposition of amalgamating in one organization. The question may be put to a referendum almost any day. The same action is being considered by three national unions of workers employed in the retail trade. The spirit of industrial unionism is forging to the front in every country in the world just as if the meddlesome I. W. W. weren't on earth.—Cleveland Citizen.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT in Ontario, Canada, was thrown into the scrap-heap by the law makers who obey the orders of a master class. Organized labor of Ontario has been working for years to enact this measure into law, but so far have been defeated by combinations that are solidly arrayed against labor.

The labor movement of Ontario, however, is not discouraged and will continue the battle for a workmen's compensation law.

TEN YEARS AGO there were forty Socialist newspapers in the United States. Today there are 352, thirty of which are in foreign languages. Two years ago there were 1,050 Socialists elected to office. Last fall over 3,000 were elected. The percentage of Socialists who can read and write is much higher than with the Republicans and Democrats. At the election bribery cases of Ohio, of the 1,100 men who were charged with selling their votes, not one was a Socialist.—District Ledger, B. C.

THE FOLLOWING appeared in a press dispatch sent out from Douglas, Arizona:

The entire works of the Cananea Consolidated Company, owned by the Cole-Ryan interests of New York, shut down today at Cananea except the mine pumps. These, too, may have to close in a few days which will mean that the mines will flood and perhaps months pass before work can resume. There is danger of a famine among the nearly 3,000 employés, most of whom are destitute."

AT PERTH AMBOY, NEW JERSEY, the companies have increased wages. The American Smelting and Refining Company granted an increase of 2½ cents an hour and reduced the hours from ten to nine. The press of New Jersey has given credit to the Western Federation of Miners for improved conditions. At Wharton the strikers are standing as solid as a stone wall, and a Catholic priest named Ferguson has become the uncompromising champion of the miners. The strikers at Wharton feel confident of victory.

THE OLD DECLARATION so frequently made that "Socialism would destroy the home," is being relegated by those sanctimonious hypocrites who have been permitted to wear the livery of the church, while defending the interests of a master class. The fact, that Capitalism has destroyed the home is becoming so apparent, that even the most illiterate among the workers are beginning to detect the sophistry of a number of the clerical gentry, who have prostituted religion for "a mess of pottage."

Six millions of women have been driven from homes through poverty and are now slaves in the profit-pens of heartless bosses, whose greed has blinded them to every principle of justice.

Nearly 2,000,000 children have been snatched from the school and the play ground, to grind out profit for that merciless element of society, to whom dollars are more priceless than the health, purity and innocence of childhood. The courts are grinding out nearly 100,000 divorces annually and the "red-light" districts are becoming more densely populated with the scarlet women whose honor was sold for bread.

The grim joke that "Socialism would destroy the home," is a burlesque that should make despots laugh and angels weep.

ACCORDING to a special dispatch to the Rocky Mountain News of last week, the city officials of Grand Junction, Colorado, made an appropriation to supply a "hand out" to the revolutionists who drifted into that city on their way to Denver.

The special dispatch reads as follows.

Grand Junction, Colo., April 8.—The city commissioners today made an appropriation for the purchase of enough food for a 'Mulligan stew" for 200 Industrial Workers of the World, who started to arrive here yesterday. A vanguard of the I. W. W. army, numbering about thirty-five, is camped west of the city.

Soap box orations were delivered on the street corners tonight, and the campaign song, "Mr. Block," was rendered in chorus. The I. W. W. leader, P. McEvoy, waited on the city commissioners and promised that the band of 200 men would leave town as soon as possible. He declared the army will invade Denver for an open air speaking campaign

According to the above, Denver is to be invaded by the Trojans who sing "I'm A Bum" and "Mr. Block" to airs stolen from the Salvation Army. Denver in all probability will be called upon to make appropriations for "Mulligan stews" to that band of brave and fearless spartans, who have promised to redeem a world from the brutal bondage of capitalism.

When Denver responds with a "Mulligan stew" to the soldiers of the I. W. W. then the lung artists will be in physical condition to assault anything and everything that stands in the way of "free speech," "free soup" and "One Big Union."

A labor organization that is built on a donation of "Mulligan stew" is destined to tear from the limbs of labor the shackles of wage slavery and bequeath to humanity the heritage of economic liberty. Let us worship at the shrine of "Mulligan stew."

The "Bummery" Going on the "Bum"

THE TOLEDO UNION LEADER of Toledo, Ohio, in its issue of March 28th had the following, relative to the I. W. W. fiasco, at Akron, Ohio.

"The I. W. W. rubber strike at Akron is over. The affair flattened out last week and now all the "soap-boxers" have left the town, while 20,000 workers are back to work after listening for nine weeks to a steady stream of hot air and wild pledges of support by the imported windbags.

"The Wonder Workers failed because they couldn't support the strikers. The "beauty"' of low dues and no treasury was here shown. The Wonder Workers have always depended on A. F. of L. unionists to finance their strikes, but in this case they were fooled. They were allowed a free field to "deliver the goods"—to show the workers how their infallible cure works. Unionists who have been jeered, cursed and defiled kept out of the fight, even though the cause was worthy.

"Neither can the Wonder Workers charge the A. F. of L. with scabbing on them—a favorite statement of theirs.

"They were left on their resources. They were given a free hand for the wildest claims and most impossible assertions which were madly cheered by workers who didn't know any more about strikes than the man in Mars, but who believed the Wonder Workers with a simplicity almost childish. Every "big gun" among the Wonder Workers was swung into the fight to encourage solidarity. The plants were completely tied up for two weeks. But the employers knew that men can't subsist on wind, and as the strike was general all of them were in the same boat. So they just waited.

"While the Wonder Workers may try to defend themselves by citing the times A. F. of L. unions have lost strikes, it must be remembered the Wonder Workers have an INFALLIBLE system—they CAN'T lose. But Akron proved the contrary, and the incident will make hard picking for the bunch of professionals that have fattened of the working people. It will also cause a lot of well intentioned workers, now friendly to the I. W. .W., to think twice, as a crushing defeat like this will have a tendency to sober men up and cause them to think instead of rave and prance around with a red sash in the belief that they are alarming employers.

"The strikers return on the same conditions. They gained nothing but a lot of experience and knowledge of how a bunch of wandering Willies can slide into a town, make several good collections, and then quietly slide out again.

"The I. W. W.'s are entitled to the questionable "honor" of engineering one of the bitterest and most stinging defeats that have been administered to American workers in the last ten years.

"No American Federation of Labor union ever suffered such a quick, decisive and humiliating defeat as did the Akron rubber workers, led by Haywood, St. John and their crowd that looks on strikes as merely propaganda for the "revolution" that's a-comin' as sure as shootin'."

The rubber strike at Akron, Ohio is typical of the majority of strikes launched by the revenue promoters of the Workless Wanderers. Without a strike the wind artists are without pretexts to send out circulars appealing for financial assistance. In the news service of the American Federation of Labor, appeared the following significant comment on funds collected by the howling revolutionists:

"One feature has been injected into the state Senate probe committe's investigation of the Akron rubber strike that is likely to be very interesting. One of the so-called organizers of the I. W. W. was asked what had become of the $8,000 which had been collected in that city from the strikers and he refused to answer, saying that "all money would be accounted for after the strike was over." These I. W. W. organizers are now leaving Akron for the alleged purpose of going west to secure funds to assist the strikers. There have been expressions of suspicion from some quarters that the money collected by this aggregation is not devoted in very great part to the needs of the working people, but is entirely used to defray the expenses of the "traveling warriors," and that very little, if any, of the money contributed by workmen on strike to the I. W. W.'s is devoted to the strikers' needs. A public detailed report of receipts and expenses would be an interesting document and throw light on I. W. W. fiscal operations."

It has been openly charged by a number of men who were formerly members of the I. W. W. that the professionals were afflicted with the chronic habit of refusing to make any reports relative to funds collected or disbursed.

San Diego, Spokane, Lawrence, McKees Rocks and a few other places in which the Bummery declared strikes, netted handsome returns to the promoters, owing to the fact that men in the labor movement were unacquainted with the swindling tactics and methods utilized. And believing that the circular distributors were engaged in a laudable effort to better the conditions of the working class, parted with their money, but men who were once the victims of the swindlers have advertised the Bummery in its work of securing funds, very little of which reached the unfortunate dupes who responded to strike calls issued by the fund-raisers. The Socialist party and many of the local unions of the A. F. of L. have made it possible for this aggregation to continue its infamous work, but the work of the profesional beggars has been so raw and clumsy, that even the most sympathetic and thoughtless are showing a reluctance to make further contributions to the disruptors and vilifiers of the labor movement.

When the Socialist party and the local unions of the American Federation of Labor, refuse to be victimized by sweatless vagrants, the I. W. W. will go into the morgue.

The Public and the Boy Scouts

THE SECOND ANNUAL RALLY of the Boy Scouts of America recently took place in New York, and The Outlook, commenting upon it, says:

One was glad to note that certain day and boarding schools in which the scout manual is well adapted for use were represented, and one was quite as glad to note that there were also many factory boys in the number. But they were all Boy Scouts together. They were all obedient to a certain set of principles. They were all getting the same kind of instruction. The result was that race, color and education were forgotten.

This rally and the comment concerning it serve to remind us of the fact that very little has been heard here recently concerning the Boy Scouts. A year or two ago a great deal was being said about them. There were public discusions concerning the scouts, and frequent articles in the newspapers served to call attention to the importance of the scout movement. But after a little while the subject was dropped It was like so many other things that excite us for a time and then are forgotten. This is unfortunate. The scout movement is one that the people of this country cannot afford to let go by default. Any one who has taken the trouble to investigate the work which is being done by the scouts will at once appreciate the benefits the boys derive. Discipline, helpfulness, honesty, patriotism and an appreciation of nature are a few of the things that the scout is taught. There are many other things of first importance that come in the regular line of his work

Notwithstanding the lack of public interest in the matter the Boy Scout movement has not been permitted to come to a halt. Through the efforts of courageous and enthusiastic men the work of organizing new troops and keeping the old ones together has been going steadily forward. The Boy Scouts are stronger in this city and in this country today than they have ever been before. But it will be difficult for scout masters and scout commissioners to retain their enthusiasm if the public is going to be apathetic.—Chicago Record-Herald.

Thoughtful men will not waste time in denunciation of the Record-Herald in its attempt to arouse enthusiasm in favor of the Boy Scouts. The Record-Herald is class-conscious and knows that the Boy Scouts is being organized for no other purpose, except to provide in the near future a standing army to hold in subjection the victims of industrial despotism. It is but natural that a subsidized press should mask the real purposes of the Boy Scouts.

The professional libertine who sets his trap to ensnare his victim never ungloves his hand, nor will the promoters of the Boy Scouts or their allies, tear off the mask to expose the brutal purpose contemplated by preparing the boy to become a professional murderer.

Capitalism is interested in the development of the youth of this country, only so far as that development will result in benefit to a class of privilege, that is now realizing that the working class is awakening to the infamies of a system that enthrones the dollar and enslaves man.

The Boy Scouts is promoted by exploiters and it is their intent and purpose that the boy who is a scout shall become a trained man-killer to serve the interests of a master class.

Charity Balls and Banquets

Eugene V. Debs, in Terre Haute Post.

THIS IS THE SEASON for "charity" rehearsals. The "charity" ball and "charity" banquets are now all the rage.

The other day—or night, rather—a lot of high-toned women at Chicago, half-naked, and covered with ten million dollars' worth of diamonds, danced the "grizzly bear," the "turkey trot," and the "bunny hug" with their male escorts, at what was called the "charity" ball of the smart set."

This vulgar exhibition and others like it outrage every sentiment of true charity. The gang of parasites that cavorted about on this occasion were wholly absorbed in displaying their "charms" and outrivaling one another with blazoned jewels and crass ornamentations, and there was not a thought of charity nor a charitable impulse in the whole affair. They "licked-up" more champagne than the net proceeds amounted to.

Think of one set of human beings dancing with glee and filling themselves with champagne, wine and truffled tid-bits because another set of human beings is starving for the want of bread!

And this is "charity" from the point of view of the class who live out of the sweat and misery of the victims upon whom they bestow it.

Think of Jesus Christ, who "had no where to lay his head," looking upon such a scene! What would He say if told that the "grizzly bear" was being danced by half-nude women and the champagne guzzled in his name, and to feed his sheep? If he did not rebuke such mockery and scourge the bacchanalian revelers from the scene, he must have changed mightily from what he was in Jerusalem twenty centuries ago.

To give the proceeds of such an affair to the hungry and naked is not a charity. It is the extreme opposite of charity and is as discreditable to those who give as it is to those who receive.

Such perversion of charity follows the denial of justice. As long as one set of human beings own the means of life and another set of human beings depend upon them for a chance to get a living, one set will be sated and the other starved, and the more of this so-called "charity" that is dispensed the worse it will be for all concerned.

In thinking of the abuses to which this word is subjected, I feel moved to paraphrase Madame Roland:

"O, Charity, what crimes are committed in thy name!"

There is something radically wrong in a society in which the few have to dance periodically because the many are starving perpetually.

The relation that those who dance sustain to those who starve precludes all possibility of true charity.

I want no dude to dance in a dress coat that I may eat.

To be fed that way paralyzes the moral fiber and destroys self-respects.

What the poor need is that the rich shall get off their backs, and then they will not have to go to the trouble of dancing at "charity" balls to feed their victims. But that is exactly what the rich will not do, and, therefore, the poor, the wide world over, are preparing to unload.

And this is the significance of the labor movement and of the agitation of the working class in every nation on earth.

There is a mighty change impending, and when this change has taken place and society is rightly organized and social righteousness prevails "charity" balls and "charity" banquets will be unnecessary and unknown.

The Strikers Are Wiser Now

THE RUBBER STRIKE in Akron has collapsed, as did the strike in the same industry in Cleveland last week.

The cause of the failure in both instances is not far to seek. Financial embarrassment was the principal reason for the defeats in both cities.

It could not be otherwise. The employers are neither children or fools.

When an organization like this much-vaunted I. W. W. starts out with a grandiloquent declaration that there will be no high initiation fees, no high dues, no assessments, etc., the average capitalist knows in advance that all he will have to do is sit tight for a few weeks, until the few rainy day dollars of his workers are exhausted, and then hunger will drive the toilers back to the shop in droves.

It is all very fine for enthusiastic agitators to shout that it is only necessary for labor to "fold its arms" and then the capitalists will be starved into submission. The direct opposite is true.

The organizations of labor that have accumulated substantial defense funds and that can operate assessment machinery for long periods of time are the ones that usually gain victories or at least material concessions in strikes and lockouts.

And it frequently occurs that even under the most favorable circumstances extraordinary sacrifices are required by the strongest of labor organizations to secure improved conditions through strikes, because combinations of capitalists and the powers of government are against them. Hence efforts at conciliation of arbitration are made before strikes to gain advantages.

It is the part of wisdom for unorganized workers to learn from the experiences of others who are in unions that have required years to build up rather than to expect something for nothing.—Exchange.

The above report relative to the termination of the strikes at Cleveland and Akron, is what was expected by men in the labor movement who are becoming familiar with the tactics and methods utilized by the "Bummery."

The travelling jawsmiths, when learning of any dissatisfaction in any town or city between employers and employés, immediately "pull their freight" for such towns or city, and when arriving, add fuel to the flames, in order that the dissatisfied may be called out on strike, thus furnishing the professionals the necessary pretext to forward heartrending and pathetic circulars to every labor organization and local of the Socialist party in the country, urging that funds be forwarded at once to crush the oppressors and win victory for the starving strikers. There was a time when labor organizations and locals of the Socialist party responded generously, and as a result of such generosity, the professionals lived upon the fat of the land.

But the professionals while clever experts at painting pathetic pleas for funds for strikers, are not experts at keeping books or making reports of funds received and expended, and even the most sympathetic, have become dubious as to the sincerity of the circular writers, who have discovered that strikes furnish an income for chronic vagrants, who have become too strong to work.

Again, these professional beggars pauperize the English language to find scurrillous vituperation to hurl at the very labor organizations and the Socialist party, which organizations they have "bummed to death" in carrying on carnivals of lunacy.

The I. W. W. has about reached the end of its rope, for calumny, slander and villianous defamation, will no longer be met with generous responses from organizations that have been villified by the tramp aggregation.

The Proposed Eight Hour Law for Ontario, Canada

No. 83,

BILL.

An Act to amend The Mining Act of Ontario in respect to the Hours of Underground Employment.

IS MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, enacts as follows:—

1. The Mining Act of Ontario is amended by inserting therein the following section: (8 Edw. VII, c. 8, amended.)

Hours of Labor Underground.

159.—(1) No workman shall remain or be allowed to remain underground in any mine for more than eight hours in any consecutive twenty-four hours, which eight hours, where the employer obtains from the Inspector a cerificate that the means and methods in use at the mine of getting to and from the place of work in the mine are proper and satisfactory, shall be reckoned from the time of arriving at such place of work until the time of leaving such place, otherwise such eight hours shall be reckoned from the time of leaving the surface until the time of returning to the surface, or in such other way as the inspector may direct; provided, however, that

(a) Time taken for lunch, not exceeding one half hour, need not be reckoned as part of such eight hours;

(b) A Saturday shift may work longer hours for the purpose of avoiding work on Sunday or changing shift at the end of the week or giving any of the men a part holiday.

(c) The said limit of time shall not apply to shift bosses, pump men, or persons engaged solely in surveying or measuring, nor shall it apply in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger, or in any case of repair work, or to any mine where the number of men working in a shift does not exceed six.

Interpretation

(2) In this section

"Workman."

"Workman" means any person employed underground in a mine who is not the owner or agent or an official of the mine.

Shift.

"Shift" means any body of workmen whose hours for beginning and terminating work in the mine are the same or approximately the same.

Certificate of Inspection.

(3) Where any question or dispute arises as to the meaning or application of paragraph (c) of sub-section 1, or as to the meaning of "workman," "shift," or "underground," the certificate of the Inspector shall be conclusive.

Application of 8 Edw. VII. c 8, ss. 174, 175, 179-181.

(4) For greater certainty it is hereby declared that sections 174, 175, 179, 180 and 181 of this Act shall apply to contraventions of this section; provided, however, that a workman shall not be guilty of an offence for failure to return to the surface within the time limited by this section if he proves that without fault on his part he was prevented from returning owing to means not being available for the purpose.

Suspension of Operation of Section.

(5) In the event of great emergency or grave economic disturbance, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may suspend the operation of this section to such extent and for such period as he deems fit: or upon the Inspector certifying as regards any iron mine that the precautions, safeguards and arrangements for protecting the health, safety and comfort of the workmen employed therein are satisfactory and in compliance with this Act, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Minister, in like manner suspend the operation of this section in so far as such mine is concerned.

Commencement.

(6) This section shall come into effect on the first day of January, 1914.

WHAT WE ASKED FOR.

An act to regulate the hours of employment in mines, mills, smelters and co-relative industries:—

HIS MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, enacts as follows:—

I. This act may be cited as "THE EIGHT-HOUR ACT" for all employés of the Mining Industry of Ontario.

II. In this act, the words "Mining Industry" shall mean any opening or excavation in, or working of the ground for the purpose of winning, opening up or proving any mineral or mineral-bearing substance. And any ore body, mineral deposit, stratum, soil, rock bed of earth, clay gravel or cement or place where mining is or may be carried on, and all ways, works machinery, plant, buildings and premises below or above ground belonging to or used in connection with mines, and, also, any excavation or opening in the ground made for the purpose of searching for mineral, and any roast yard, smelting furnace, mill, work or place used for in connection with crushing, reducing smelting, refining or treating ore, mineral or mineral-bearing substance and shall include any mode or method of working whereby the soil or earth or any rock, stone or quartz may be disturbed, removed, washed, sifted, roasted, smelted, refined, crushed or dealt with for the purpose of obtaining any mineral therefrom, whether the same may have been previously disturbed or not.

III. It shall not be lawful to employ any person in or around the mines, mills, smelters and co-relative industries for more than eight (8) hours within any twenty-four (24) hours, and the act of decending to and ascending from the point or place of work underground shall be considered part of the employment therein and the time occupied in so descending to and ascending from such place of work shall be reckoned as a part of said eight (8) hours or work-day; Provided, however, that the period may be prolonged in case of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger but only during the continuance of such imminent danger.

IV. Every person, corporation, superintendent, manager, foreman, officer, employer or agent or representative of employer who shall employ, hire, contract with, command, persuade, cause or allow any person to work in contravention of any of the provisions of this act shall, on summary conviction thereof, incur and pay a fine of not less than twenty-five ($25.00) dollars and not more than two hundred and fifty ($250.00) dollars, with costs of prosecution and in default of immediate payment of such fine and costs, shall be imprisoned in the Common Jail of the County or District within which the offence was committed, for a period of not more than three months, and every day's violation of the provisions of this act shall constitute a separate offence.

V. On the trial of any proceeding under this act, the person opposing or defending or who is charged with any offence against or under any of the provisions of this act shall be competent and compellable to giving evidence in or with respect to such proceeding.

VI. All fines or penalties in money imposed or recovered in or under the provisions of this act shall be paid by the convicting justice or police magistrate, as the case may be, to the treasurer of the Province to and for the use of the Province.

VII. The following provisions shall have effect with respect to summary proceedings for offences and fines under this act:

1. The information shall be laid within two (2) months from the date of the alleged contravention of the act.

2. The description of an offence in the words of this act or in similar words shall be sufficient in law.

3. A conviction or order made in any matter arising under this act shall not be quashed for want of form.

4. All prosecutions under this act may be brought and heard before any two of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in or for the county or district where the penalty was incurred or the offence committed or wrong done. an in cities or towns where there is a police magistrate, before such police magistrate; and save where otherwise provided by this act, the proceedure shall be governed by the Ontario Summary Convictions Act.

1. In all cases of prosecution for any offense against the provisions of this act, the conviction or order of the justices or police magistrate, as the case may be, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be final and conclusive, and except as hereinafter mentioned, against such conviction or order there shall be no appeal.

2. An appeal shall lie to the judge of the county court in the county in which the conviction is made, sitting in chambers without a jury, providing notice of such appeal is given to the prosecutor or complainant within five (5) days after the date of the said conviction, or order.

XI. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

We, your committee appointed to draft the objections of this organization to the proposed eight-hour law, beg leave to report as follows:

First—While the act nominally provides for an eight-hour day, it specifically directs wherein the act may be violated and for the issuance of a permit for such violation, a certificate from the mining inspector enabling the operators to keep the men under ground for a longer period than eight hours.

Second—Not more than 30 per cent. of the men employed in mining and co-relative industries will be benefited by the provisions of the act. Whole classes of men are exempt. The iron miners, a large and growing class, are left to win by organization what this legislation should have given them. The surface workers, particularly the millmen and hoistmen, are wronged by their exclusion—the former exposed to dampness and cyanide fumes, the latter holding many lives in their hands, suffering an unusual strain. At present the majority work twelve hours per day, with an eighteen-hour shift on change days; should certainly appeal to the humanitarian instincts of any legislator. There is no class of workers, who, from the exhausting nature and unhealthy character of their occupation, are better entitled to an eight-hour day than the smelter workers. This is especially true of those engaged in reducing the arsenic-bearing nickel and cobalt ores from the Sudbury and Cobalt districts. Another class of labor that should be protected by eight-hour legislation, is the workers in the cement industries.

Third—Progressive legislation is tending toward the six day week with a half-holiday on Saturday. The proposed measure sanctions a longer workday on Saturday. Mining practice in other districts shows that it is unnecessary to work longer hours on Saturday, either for the purpose of avoiding Sunday work or changing shifts. Where two shifts are employed it is easy to put them in between 7 a. m. and 12 p. m.; in the case of three shifts, if the shifts end at midnight, there is no loss of time to the operator. In no case is there any loss of time in changing shifts under the eight-hour system.

Fourth—The lieutenant-governor may suspend the operations of the law in cases of grave economic disturbance. Why should the operation of a law be suspended solely for the benefit of the employer?

Fifth—Grave abuses are likely to arise in the practical operation of the act on account of the arbitrary authority reposed in the mining inspector.

Sixth—Any person should have the right to bring an action for the violation of the law.

Seventh—Experience has clearly proven that an eight-hour law benefits both parties in the mining industry. Why should the date of its enforcement be set so far in the future and to take effect at a time when the worker is less able than at any other to resist a cut in wages? Was the law aimed at the worker instead of for him? Was it intended to discourage the worker from asking anything from the government that he is expected to offer his life for in case of need?

Abolishing the Social Evil

BERNARD SHAW, in challenging the efficacy of the flogging act proposed by the British parliament to abate the social evil, contends that the cause lies deeper, and that social justice must precede the abolition of the social evil. He said:

"You may refused to be convinced of this, and say we shall soon see whether we cannot get rid of the rascals who live on the profits of prostitution by flogging them soundly under the new act. Do not deceive yourself; most of those who are living on the profits of prostitution will not be flogged; on the contrary, they are already among the most indignant advocates of flogging. They are ladies and gentlemen, clergymen, bishops, judges, members of parliament, highly connected peers and peeresses, and pillars of solid middle-class Puritanism.

"These people have shares in industrial enterprises which employ women and girls. Thousands of these women and girls get wages which are insufficient to support them, and are treated with less personal respect than any prostitute. If a woman applying for employment complains of the low wages and asks for more, she is told that if she will not take it others will. If she asks how she is to live on it she is told that others contrive to live on it. They manage to make it up somehow, she hears.

"Some women are saved from the streets by their husbands' or their fathers' wages, but there are always orphans and widows and girls from the country and abroad who have no husbands to support them.

"Thus the woman's strength and energy are maintained by what she earns in the streets, and used in making dividends for rich shareholders who clamor to have public attention distracted from their complicity by the flogging of a few bullies. But when these bullies take a house for their purposes and offer high rents, do they find any difficulty in getting one? And does anyone ever propose to flog the landlord?

"You, humble reader, who are neither a shareholder nor a landlord, do you thank God that you are guilty of this matter? Take care. The first man flogged under the act may turn on you and say, 'God shall smite thee, thou whited wall.'

"The wages of prostitution are stitched into the buttonholes and into your blouse, pasted into your match boxes and your boxes of pins, stuffed into your mattresses, mixed with the paint on your walls, and stuck between the joints of your water pipes. The very gaze on your basin and teacup has in it the lead poison that you offer to the decent woman as the reward of honest labor, whilst the procuress is offering chicken and champagne.

"Flog other people until you are black in the face and they are red in the back; you will not cheat the Recording Angel into putting down your debts to the wrong account.

"And please remark that every additional power you give to the policeman to harry these victims of yours increases the power of your organizer and exploiter of prostitution over the prostitute.

"When you are robbed and beaten and bullied you call the police: and they protect you. But the policeman himself may bully and beat the prostitute: he may tear her fine clothes to rags and drag her through the mud, and twist her arms almost out of their sockets, and then have her sent to prison on a charge of disorder or solicitation if she annoys him with appeals for protection and if she refuses to share her gains with him.

"In every police force in the world there are men who do this systematically; for though the policeman may be no worse than the rest of us, you cannot find 18,000 angels in London for 24s a week to exercise powers which we cut off the head of a king sooner than entrust to him.

"This is the secret of the terrible power of the white slave agent over his victim. Why does she cling to him in spite of all she suffers at his hands? Simply because he can always bring her to his knees by threatening to set the police on her.

"She is far more afraid of the policeman than of the couteneur, for a police magistrate might take her word against a couteneur's, and if she defends herself by main force against his violence he has only his own hands to help him, and may get the worst of it; but nobody will take her word against a policeman's, and to assault him is to have to face the whole forces of the state and its prisons."—Exchange.

Did Christ Look Like a Workingman?

A BOSTON ARTIST has committed an outrage for which he is being severely censured by the good people of that esthetic locality. He has painted a picture of Christ, as a brawny workingman, as liberally supplies with thews, muscles and sinews as a modern "white hope," as in another sense, to be sure, He may be regarded. The artist defends his work with the remark that, as Christ had been swinging axes and hammers for years in a carpenter's shop, He naturally must have developed a fairly powerful physique, considering that He had plenty of fresh air and exercise, enough to eat, and wasn't exploited and overworked like the modern factory wage slave. There were no Grand Rapids furniture factories in His day, and He was probably a sort of local handicraftsman doing odd jobs for the natives, and His own boss most of the time, for when working with His father it is not likely that Joseph either starved or overworked Him.

That idea of Christ being a workingman is all right, of course, in the conventional sense, only it mustn't be pushed too far. There should be moderation in such things. It is correct enough to say He was a workingman, but it is doubtful taste to represent Him as actually looking like one. Our "best people," who would scorn to be workingmen themselves, and who, if they ever were, would try to hide the fact as much as possible, naturally feel that it isn't good form to insist too much on the working class characteristics of Christ, especially as a manual laborer. It is a sort of disparaging reflection upon Him and them also. Of course, if He had started work in a bank or a broker's office and learned the business "from the bottom up," or even had put on the carpenter's overalls, when He didn't actually have to, for the sole purpose of showing the discontented proletariat of Galilee that He stood for the "dignity of labor," it would have been all right. Our best people are never ashamed of that sort of a "workingman," but when a fellow has to get out and hustle with hoi polloi out of sheer necessity, it isn't quite the same thing, of course. To be sure, the evangelists the good people send out specially to convert the workers always make a fairly strong point of the fact that He was a workingman, but they don't usually go so far as to draw an actual picture of a big, husky, muscular person sweating and perspiring while swinging a ten-pound broadax over a massive timber. Even with them Christ is a sort of etherealized workman.

Pictures of Christ at work, though few, nearly always represent Him as standing with a dreamy, far-away look in His eyes, and, though His delicate hand is on a jack-plane, He isn't keeping it going. A wage worker who attempted anything of that kind nowadays would be told to "get his time" so quick that it would make his head swim.

Ordinary conventional pictures of Christ nearly always represent Him as a delicate, anemic-looking person, enveloped in a mass of flowing drapery, which would certainly impede His locomotion quite as much as if He were trussed up in a hobble skirt. How He could ever perform the physical stunt of whipping a lot of money changers out of the temple and upsetting their gear, while handicapped with a frail constitution and twenty-five yards of immaculate-colored lingerie clinging around his unmanly form, is one of those mysteries, perhaps, which can only be explained by assuming it to be a miracle.

It is fairly certain He didn't tramp around the country for three years without shedding most of these superfluous habiliments, and is altogether likely that He Himself set an example to His apostles when He told them to go out soap-boxing and confine their wardrobe to one handy garment, so they could travel light and get around quickly.

It may be that being hunted from post to pillar for three years wore Him down somewhat physically, but it would hardly have the effect of making Him look delicate. It is on record that after having been slugged and whipped and pounded, much as Chief Long might beat up a Little Falls striker, He still had strength enough to carry his heavy cross to the last scene of His activities. It is true that He died on the cross some time before the thieves who were crucified with Him, but in all probability they were more than usually husky and hadn't been abused and weakened as He had been during the preliminaries.

Altogether, we like this working class picture of Christ much better than the other, and consider it comes much nearer a true representation of what the figure was actually like than the namby-pamby representation of a doubtful-appearing male who looks more like something specially designed to officiate at a pink tea or give instructions to a class in fancy embroidery than a man who could go out and do a day's work, and had both the physique and courage to tell the exploiters and hypocrites of His day just what He thought of them. We are quite inclined to agree with the revolutionary poet who demanded the elimination of this effeminate figure in the vigorous stanza:

Take away your paltry Christ;
Your "gentleman's" god!
We want the Carpenter's Son,
With His saw and His hod!

Possibly the Boston artist may have gone too far if he made his Christ a mere mountain of muscle, but sometimes it is necessary to deal with an evil by exaggerating the opposite impression. Even allowing for this, however, we are fairly sure that Christ wasn't at all what would be called a "nice person" by the "better element" of His day, either in language, dress, manners or personal appearance, and we are just as sure that if He came to earth today, the modern prototypes of that same "better element" would pass exactly the same judgment upon Him, before murdering Him. They have no more use for a genuine workingman now than they had then, except for purposes of exploitation, and there is nothing strange in the fact that the Boston artist has come by the cudgels for representing Him as looking like one. However that sort of Christ suits us, and the other doesn't. He was on our side in the class struggle of His day, and we are tolerably certain that He looked the part generally, quite as well as acted it.—New York Call.

There Will Be No More War

UNDER THE HEADING, "Amounts to Treason," the American Employer had the following comment on a resolution passed at a late convention of the United Mine Workers of Illinois:

"At the annual meeting just held at Peoria, Ill., says American Industries for March, 1913, the miners' union passed a resolution that should arouse the ire of every patriotic American. If any country, it provided, declares war upon America, the miners shall instantly declare a general strike. This was adopted as the sense of the miners of Illinois. Officials of the union said that this action was merely taken as a preventive measure in hopes of discouraging any proposition which might lead to the declaring of war either by or against the United States.

"The significance of the resolution cannot be disguised; it means plainly that the miners, by refusing to produce coal, would cripple the navy or army of the nation and make it easy for an attacking force to gain an easy and quick victory."

The American Employer is supported by exploiters, and no one who reads this publication will doubt for a moment its loyalty to its paymasters.

The promoters identified with the "American Employer" have discovered that any journal or magazine that is devoted to the interests of profit-mongers, as a general rule, reaps a rich harvest. In other words, the American Employer knows that employers have the money and that it pays to espouse the cause of those who are legalized to victimize the disinherited.

The caption, "Amounts to Treason," opens up a wide field for discussion, and the question naturally arises, treason to whom?

The United Mine Workers of Illinois passed a resolution of opposition to proclamations of war and declared that if war was proclaimed by or against the United States that the United Mine Workers of Illinois, as an organization, shall declare a strike as a protest against human slaughter. The United Mine Workers in that resolution has declared war against war, and for that reason the organ of an employers' association has brought in the charge of treason.

Who is it that is responsible for war? Are the countless millions of men of the nations of the world, who work in mines, mills, factories, railroads and all the other industrial and commercial institutions, responsible for the carnivals of slaughter that have taken place on land and sea?

No. But those responsible for war belong to that class of privilege that comparatively few who proclaim war and escape all the agonies and suffering that are endured by another class, who in the past have done all the fighting.

The United Mine Workers of Illinois, as an organization, has placed itself on record as against war and in favor of peace, and for this the subsidized mouthpiece of exploiters has brought in its verdict of treason.

The injunction of Scripture, "Thou shart not kill," has been thrown into the scrap heap by the American Employer, and the organization that stands for peace and against war, is indicted as a traitor.

The United Mine Workers of Illinois can well afford to be branded as treasonable by the scribbling chattel of combinations that coin dividends from sweat and tears in the industrial realm and mint profit from human blood on the field of battle.

For a workingman to use a weapon of murder in a strike against employer for humane conditions, is anarchy; but for that same workingman to shoulder a rifle and "shoot to kill" in the interests of capitalism is patriotic and worthy of all the disgusting adulation that flows from the mortgaged pens of the servile lickspittles of journalism.

The slave will soon cease to fight the battles of a master class, and when that time comes there will be no more war.

The Church Dominated by Wealth

DR. GEORGE CHALMERS RICHMOND delivered a sermon recently in Philadelphia, at St. John's Episcopal church, taking for his subject, "Christian Standards of Life."

During the course of his sermon, he referred to America's great financier who lately passed away in Rome, Italy, and likewise declared that Morgan practically molded the policy of the Episcopal church.

The following are extracts from Dr. Richmond's sermon:

"Mr. Morgan was a great financier, but not a great man. We shall never see a man just like him in our American life, and we ought to be glad of it. His death is providential in many ways.

"The wreck of the Titanic came with God's knowledge. The floods and tornadoes of the West are of God's intent, and we must learn the lessons involved. So God knew just when to take Mr. Morgan out of this present world and send him on into another state of existence.

"Mr. Morgan has not gone to heaven, for there is no such place as heaven. He would be very unhappy up among the angels, with all his art treasures down here. Our old idea of heaven has gone, never to return. Mr Morgan is now beginning a new life in a new world—perhaps in this other world he is a common day laborer. He will now see that God is of more importance than cash.

"He didn't lift his hand to help the American workingman. He helped to keep prices up. He was never in favor of higher wages for the man who toiled on his railroads. He helped to foment strikes by his lack of vital interest in the men who sweat for his money.

"In the Episcopal church Mr. Morgan controlled our house of bishops. For years he has prevented our church from declaring her position on the great social and industrial problems of our age, so that the Episcopal church is at the fag end of things. Our church will never progress till about twenty-five rich corporation officers and retired financiers and aristocratic gentlemen who at present control our church go to join Mr. Morgan up above the skies. The sooner they go the better."

The editor of the Miners' Magazine is not interested in the present whereabouts of that element in the spiritual make-up of the departed banker which religious scientists look upon as immortal. We care not whether Morgan is operating a bank in the Kingdom Come or whether he is a stoker in a more tropical clime.

But the editor is interested in the statement of this minister who has declared that Morgan controlled the bishops of the Episcopal church. If that statement is true, then the bishops of the Episcopal church can lay no more claim to being religious than the man who is charged with the fomenting of strikes through oppressive measures which he inposed upon "the men who sweated for his money."

Thousands of times during the past several years, preachers in their pulpits have asked why the laboring man stays away from the church, and the answer is found in the statement of Dr. Richmond of Philadelphia. If Morgan controlled the bishops of the Episcopal church, then other men powerful in finance and industry control the hierarchy of other churches, and the vision of the laboring man has discerned the fact that churches are being prostituted to serve the interests of a master class.

Morgan, in controlling the bishops of the Episcopal church, made that church a personal asset, and the time is almost here when other ministers of various denominations will be forced to make the same admissions as Dr. Richmond.

The International Miners' Congress

THE TWENTY-FOURTH CONVENTION of the International Miners' Congress will meet at Carlsbad, Bohemia, on Monday, July 21st, 1913.

As the Western Federation of Miners, in the last annual convention held at Victor, Colorado, elected Charles H. Moyer a delegate to the International Miners' Congress, the membership of the organization should feel interested in all matters that will be brought before a convention of delegates drawn from all the principal mining districts of the world.

The following is the program of the International Miners' Congress:

Program of Business.

Mr. Robt. Smillie, J. P., the British president, will preside over the congress the first day until the election of officials and committees for congress are completed.

President's opening remarks.

Response of nationalities.

Election of Officials and Committees for Congress.

1—Appointment of tellers.
2—Credentials committee.
3—Business committee.
4—Time of meeting and adjourning each day.
5—President for next day.
6—Vice presidents (one for each language).

Subjects for Discussion—Hours of Labor.

1.—We move that steps be taken to hasten the realization of an eight hours' working day from bank to bank for all workers underground; that an interval of sixteen hours be made obligatory between shifts; and that the maximum shifts to be worked must not exceed six in each week.—Great Britain and Belgium.

1a.—This congress is of opinion that the hours of labor of workmen employed in the mining industry should be legally fixed at a maximum of eight hours from bank to bank. At hot or wet places the hour sof labor must not exceed the maximum of six hours from bank to bank.—Germany, Austria, Holland.

Protective Mining Laws.

2.—In view of the numerous mining catastrophes that have happened these last few years, and in view of the continually increasing number of separate accidents in the mining industry, this congress demands again and urgently better protection for the life and limb of the miners. In order to bring about that better protection the appointment of miners' inspectors who are elected by the miners from their own ranks, by secret and direct ballot, and are paid by the state is held to be urgently necessary by this congress.—Germany, Austria, Holland.

2a.—This congress is of opinion that the laws should secure greater safety for the mining population in every respect.—Belgium.

Evictions.

3.—That labor members of Parliament in every nation press upon their government to pass a measure to prevent employers of labor evicting workmen from their houses during any trade disputes.—Great Britain.

4.—International committee's report on the question of the regulation of the output of coal.

5.—This conference demands that collective working agreements be introduced by the trade unions in the mining industry, either for the various districts or for the whole country.—Belgium.

Nationalization of Mines, Etc.

6.—That this congress is of opinion that all land, mines and railways should be nationalized in the interests of the community of the different countries.—Great Britain.

7.—We demand that a minimum wage be fixed for underground workers, either by law or by collective agreement.—Belgium.

8.—International committee's report of the question of a national or international clearance card.

9.—Annual Holidays.—This congress is in favor of an annual holiday for miners of a fortnight's duration, with payment of wages.—Belgium.

THOMAS ASHTON, Secretary,
Manchester, England.

P. S.—Great Britain proposed that the question of Peace vs. War should be discussed and drafted a resolution for that purpose. Committee decided not to put proposition on program, but that the president might deal with the question in his speech when opening congress

Notices.

The general secretary, treasurer, national secretaries and executive committee will be appointed on the last day of congress.

Each nationality will collect and verify its own credentials according to rule, but in case of an objection to any credential, the whole of the credential committee shall meet and decide the matter.

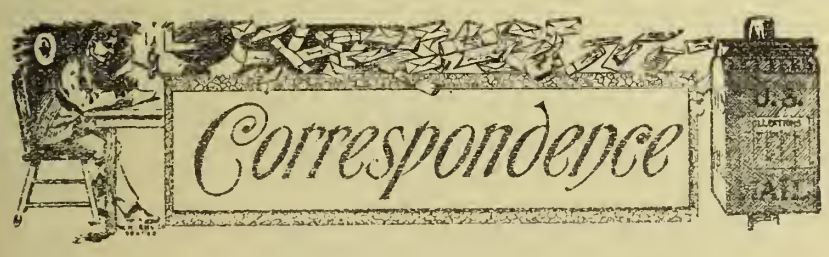
Each delegate to the congress must either be a miner or an official of a miners' union.

Each delegate to the congress, on application for ticket of admission, must pay the sum of 10s each.

Applications for cards of admission and programs of business must be made to the secretary.

In order to avoid controversy, the speakers shall be called upon as follows by the president of the day: The mover and seconder of those in charge of resolutions on the agenda; afterwards one speaker from each nationality, namely: Germany, Austria, France, Belgium, Holland, Great Britain, America. The mover or seconder of a resolution to be considered the speaker for his nationality.

THOMAS ASHTON, Secretary.



INFORMATION WANTED.

Information is wanted of the whereabouts of Bernhard Tilly, who came to America in the early part of the year 1870, and was then about 18 years of age. He came from Brakel, Hoxter county, Westphalen, Germany, and is now near 60 years old. When last heard from was in the year 1890, and was then working in a silver mine at Kingston, Sierra county, New Mexico. Anyone knowing his present address will confer a great favor by writing to Ferdinand Neusius, 494 Ninth avenue, New York, N. Y.

PROTECTION OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Berlin, March 7, 1913.

According to statistics gathered and published by the French Labor Bureau the worktime for children and youths is regulated by law in 21 countries, and also in most states of the North American Union, in the Swiss Cantons, and the British colonies. Under these laws children may not be employed in industries under the age of ten years in the Argentine (in Buenos Ayres not under the age of 12). Bulgaria (with exceptions) and Portugal. In the last case the law mentions boys only. The age for commencing work is fixed at 12 years in Austria (in offices and workshops without working power), Belgium, Bulgaria, Denmark, Great Britain, Hungary (as in Austria), Greece, Italy, Norway, Portugal (for girls), Rumania, Finland and Sweden. The age is fixed at 13 years in Germany (with the exception of states where school attendance is compulsory up to 14 years), France and Holland at 14 years in Austria and Hungary (factories), Servia, and Switzerland. In the United States of America the age varies between 10 and 15 years.

The maximum daily working time for children in the various countries is: Germany, from 13 to 14 years, 6 hours; 14 to 16 years, 10 hours. The Argentine, 8 hours (i. e., 48 hours per week up to 16 years); Austria, from 12 to 14 years, 8 hours, 14 to 16 years, 11 hours; Belgium, boys from 12 to 16 and girls from 12 to 21 years, 12 hours; Bulgaria, from 10 to 12 years, 6 hours, 12 to 15 years, 8 hours; Denmark, from 12 till the end of compulsory school attendance, 6 hours, then till 18 years, 10 hours; Spain, from 10 to 14 years, 6 hours in industries, 8 hours in commerce; United States of America, 8 to 12 hours; Great Britain, from 12 to 14 years, 30 hours per week, 15 to 18 years, 12 hours daily up to 60 hours per week (in textile trades only 55½ hours weekly); France, from 13 (in some cases from 12) to 18 years 10 hours; Hungary, from 12 to 14 years, 8 hours, 14 to 16 years, 10 hours; Greece from 12 to 14 years, 6 hours; 14 to 18 years, 10 hours (Saturday only 8 hours); Italy from 12 to 15 years, 11 hours; Japan, from 12 to 15 years (in exceptional cases from 10), 12 hours; Norway, from 12 to 15 years, 5 hours, 14 to 18 years, 10 hours; Holland, from 13 to 17 years, 10 hours; Portugal, from 10 to 12 years, 6 hours, boys from 12 to 16 and girls from 12 to 21 years, 10 hours; Rumania, from 12 to 15 years, 8 hours (in exceptional cases for boys from 13 to 15 years, 10 hours); Russia, from 12 to 15 years, 8 hours; Finland, from 12 to 15 years, 7 hours, 15 to 18 years, 14 hours; Servia, from 14 to 16 years, 8 hours; Sweden, from 12 to 13 years, 6 hours, 13 to 14 years, 8 hours, 14 to 18 years, 10 hours (six days a week); Switzerland, from 14 to 18 years, 11 hours (Saturday, 9 hours); special rest intervals are provided for). Night work is in principle prohibited. (General exceptions only exist in regard to continuous works and glass factories).

The legal working time of adult women varies between 10 and 12 hours daily. In Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Holland and Switzerland acts provide for shorter time on Sundays and holidays. In all states which up to now have ratified the Berne Convention, night work is forbidden in works employing more than 10 persons. The maximum daily work time for women is fixed in various lands as follows: Germany and Greece, 10 hours (Saturday and the day before a holiday, 8 hours); Austria, 11 hours. United States, 8 to 12 hours; Great Britain, 12 hours, not more than 60 per week (in textile trades 55½ hours weekly); Bulgaria, France, Holland and Rumania, 10 hours; Japan and Norway, 12 hours; Russia, 11½ hours; Switzerland, 11 hours (9 hours on Saturday); Servia, 10 hours (12 hours in commerce).

The working time for adult workers is only regulated in a few states, for instance: Austria and Switzerland, 11 hours daily; Russia, 11½ hours, and France, 12 hours daily.

Rumania's Trade Development.

About a quarter of a century ago national industry began to develop in Rumania. According to official statistics, there were in the year 1911, 536 large industrial businesses in the land, each having a fixed capital of 50,000 francs (franc—about 9¾d.), employing at least 25 workers and machinery. There were also 41,000 smaller workshops. The total number of working people employed in the larger industries and in the workshops amounted to 200,000. The agricultural workers total over 5,000,000. Yet in spite of this great number of workers no Rumanian government, until a very short time ago thought of legislation for their protection.

In the year 1888 a bill was introduced in Parliament for the control of industry, but it never came into force. The same fate befell a similar bill in 1901. But a law was passed in 1902 after the pattern of the Austrian law.

Some of the main points of the act may be given here. Apprentices may not enter dangerous and strenuous trades before the age of 14 years, and not before 12 in other trades. The working time for apprentices, inclusive of school hours, must not be more than 8 per day before 14 years, and not more than 10 between 14 and 16 years. Before the age of 16 no one may work at night—between 8 p. m. and 5 a. m.

There are numerous definitions in favor of adult workers. The work allotted to such shall not be over-strenuous, nor shall a worker be put to household labor except in the case of special understanding. When there is no contract a fortnight's notice must be given on either side. Should the employer act against the spirit of this law he shall pay the worker double wages for the period, and further should the employé suffer any loss the late employer and the new shall be jointly held responsible. As, however, this law in no way covers the industries and is merely for hand-crafts, its importance is not great.

Previous to this law there had been others dealing with the employment of women and children, and Sunday rest. In 1910 the law was altered to make the entire Sunday free.

The workers have fought hard against the conditions obtaining and at last the government, at the beginning of this year, brought in a bill which is a little advance in the matter of the protection of workers. The bill consists of two parts, insurance and trade. The first part was supported by the workers, but the second was boycotted and thrown out.

The insurance act consists of three parts: Insurance against sickness, accident and invalidity. Many classes of the workers are excluded, such as shop assistants, pressers, servants and a large number of peasants. Sick benefits are paid, after six weeks' membership, for 16 weeks. The contributions, 2 per cent. of wages, are paid by the employés.

In case of accident during working hours the employer is held responsible, but two weeks after the accident the employé receives support from the money he himself paid for insurance. For complete invalidity the worker receives benefit at a rate of two-thirds of his wage, while for partial invalidity definite compensation has not been set down. A widow receives one-fifth of the wage, and children, not more than two, also one-fifth each.

As regards pensions the worker, state, and employer contribute each 2d. and pensions are allowed after 24 years, at the age of 65, which in Roumania is much too late, for official statistics show that only 500 out of 200,000 workers reach this age. The pension of 150 francs means about 3d daily, though one would imagine that with an annual budget of over 500,000,000 francs (about £20,833,300) more than 1,250,000 francs. (about £52,080) could be spared for the insurance of 200,000 workers. At the same time 1,000,000 francs are paid 1,000 official alone.

So long as the support remains so low the law will bring no relief and will tend to rouse the spirit of discontent among the workers.

Builders' Union.—The building employers of Leipsig, Germany, have formed a union for the furtherance of common interests. A meeting of representatives of various branches of the trade decided to form an association including builders, sculptors and plasterers, tilers, woodworkers, stoneworkers, tinsmiths and fitters, glaziers, painters, decorators, etc.

WORKERS' WAR IN SPAIN.

The secretary of the Spanish Railway Employés Union, Comrade Ramon Cordancillo, writes the following letter from Madrid: The Spanish working classes have, after a long slumber, at last thrown off their lethargy. As they show new strength and new spirit they can now commence the fight which the reactionary employers force upon them. The masters, who will not negociate with the workers' organizations, are trying by all ways and means, to provoke the men. It is comprehensive that the struggle between capital and labor in such a land as Spain, where the power of the state and church is very great, and absolutely at the service of the employers, is an unequal struggle; yet the workers accept the challenge with spirit. The government goes so far in its inconsiderate partisanship that leaders of the movement, especially in times of strikes, are simply arrested, in the hope of disorganizing the workers. But the employers have experienced how strongly disciplined and well organized are the workers—when the masters' organization of the building trades locked out all organized workers. For nine months the 10,000 men affected held out in spite of terrible privations and when their own means gave out other trade unions offered the whole of their funds for the support of those engaged in the struggle. This bitter fight ended with the renewal of work on the same conditions as held good before the lock-out, after the employers officially promised to raise wages without delay. This promise has since been fulfilled, of course only after energetic reminders from the trades unions. Our opponents thought to destroy the trades unions, but in this they were disappointed. Also their hope that the organization would be crippled for some time did not materialize. The organized workers are today preparing to celebrate at the end of the year their achievements in the way of securing increased wages and to demonstrate that they are stronger than ever.

Soon after the termination of this fight the employers began, under the protection of the government to lock out other organizations in the building trades. And so one after another the painters, tile layers, glaziers, plasterers, floor layers, iron workers, etc., were shut out. They all faced the attack bravely before they were compelled to give way. How gallantly these groups defended themselves, the iron workers give an example. As there appeared no possibllity of coming to an arrangement they decided after 19 weeks fight to emigrate rather than submit. And so they are now leaving thel fatherland in small and large bands, freeing themselves from the greed of the employers and the terror of the ruling classes. The best workers, the most qualified artisans, are emigrating, leaving their little ones in the guardianship of colleagues in other trades, to protect from adversity and an uncertain future. So the other trades are standing by to help in these troublous times.

This sacrifice and renunciation has not moved the employers in the least; on the contrary they are so indignant that they have at this moment locked out 30,000 workers in all building trades. Again the oppressed and half-starved workers begin a heroic fight against hard-necked employers and a despotic government, who at every opportunity attack the Labor party. They will have to answer for the consequences. The Spanish working classes breathe the air of freedom today they demand social equality, and will, despite all opposition, march forward and upward on their way to social justice.

The Employers' Desire.—In his official report on a journey through Canada, arranged by the Board of Trade, the British Trade Commissioner recommends a law for the prevention of strikes after the example of Canada. In the Dominion there has been since 1907 a law for the investigation of strikes. The principle of this law is that all differences between employers and men must be dealt with by representatives of both parties and the government before the stoppage of work. As a matter of fact, their decision is not binding on either party. Any alteration in wages and working conditions must be advised at least 30 days in advance. The government is very content with the working of the law as it prevents sudden strikes. In the previous year the British Trade Union Congress rejected a similiar proposal. But the employers would like such an act in force.

From the German Building Workers' Union.

The German Building Workers' Union held its National Congress in January, at which 351 delegates, 36 district organizers, 11 representatives of the national committee, the auditors and editors took part. The representatives of the General Commission and neighboring German trade unions were present, and also those of the sister unions of Denmark, Norway, Sweden, France, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland. The present building workers' union was formed from the amalgamation of the unions of bricklayers, laborers, steam-fitters and plasterers. At the end of 1912 the union had 348,413 members, of whom 197,066 were bricklayers, 2,223 tile layers and terra cotta workers, 2,746 plasterers, 10,748 stucco workers, 5,131 cement and concrete workers, 1,319 fitters, etc., 117,046 laborers and 12,098 navvies. The funds of the union, since the amalgamation, have risen from about £250,000 to £600,000 (last year). The tariff or recognized union rate of wages per hour has risen from the beginning of 1910 to the end of 1912, for 183,887 bricklayers in 1,171 districts, about 5/4½; for 111,245 laborers in 617 districts, about 5/6¾. The collective agreements of the bricklayers cover 17,048 places and those of the laborers 9,831.

The most important matter on the agenda was the question of the present wages and tariff movement. According to the complications of the committee there are about 289,345 bricklayers and laborers, members of the union, working under tariff conditions. About 17,790 members from the bricklayers and laborers trades work without tariffs, but will probably also be involved in the present movement. The number affected by the movement is estimated at about 191,500 bricklayers, and 115,500 laborers, altogether 307,000 persons.

The tariff negotiations have already begun. On the side of the workers' organizations a common move is secured by the three chief organizations involved. These are the Carpenters' Union, the Central Union of the "Christian" Building Workers, and the German Building Workers' Union. In regard to the demands and also the policy to be pursued there is unanimity, and the decision has been renewed that only the National Congress can give final judgment as to the acceptation or rejection of offers.

With 301 votes to 97 the Congress adopted the principle of the introduction of unemployment benefit, but the final arrangements for this new feature will be made at a special general meeting after the conclusion of the wages movement. Contributions in the future shall be from 40-90 pfennigs (8 pfgs—one penny) there being four different rates. To attract and educate youths, juvenile branches shall be inaugurated everywhere.

Paeplow was elected president and Winnig was appointed chief officer of the new literary and statistical department to be established at the union's headquarters.

American Federation of Musicians.—We have received a letter from the secretary of the American Federation of Musicians, Owen Miller, in which he refers to the value of the newly inaugurated News Letter, promising to publish it in the official journal which has a circulation of over 60,000.

As to the most important matter in view for musicians in America, he mentions the bill before Congress for the prohibition of competition by naval and military bands. There is already an act to this effect, but astute officers permit their bands to "volunteer their services" not for remuneration, buf for a "donation to the mess funds." Thus the letter of the law has been evaded.

The passage of the present bill will prohibit everything but military duties and to avoid the evasion of the law by the marine band on the plea of being neither military nor naval—as they successfully plead today—the words "Marine Corps," are to be inserted. The bill should pass into law within a few months.

The suburb of Charlottenburg, Berlin, has initiated a scheme of compensation in case of accident to "Honorable' officials of the town. Officials rendered unfit for duty will be compensated according to fixed rates. While the town recognizes no legal compulsion in the case of death following a mishap the family of the deceased will be indemnified.

FRENCH FURNITURE WORKERS' FEDERATION.

At the beginning of this year an "Encyclopedic du Mouvement Syndikaliste" was published by two French syndicalists, Jouhaux and Griffuekhes, of the Confédération Générale du Travail. All that is of interest as affecting the furniture workers' movement has been extracted by comrade Toussaint, and included in a history of the birth and development of the Furniture Workers' Federation. The following paragraphs contain a few of the main points of the work.

According to our comrade to write a history of the furniture workers is to give a review of the French revolutions. The development of the furniture trade to a great industry has been affected at the expense of art and personal initiative; while the development from handworkmanship to great companies has smothered individual technical worth and has as a result hindered the movement for the improvement of conditions. The industry is spread over all France and there are 56,845 furniture workers throughout the various provinces.

As regards the organizations of these workers, the first union was inaugurated in 1760. It lived till 1840. Then again in the year of the Second Empire (1851-1870) many groups sprang into existence. In 1864 a joiners' union was founded, and then other unions for wood carvers, joiners, turners, etc. In the provinces a union of chairmakers was formed in Bordeaux in 1848, which was dissolved through the coup d'état of 1851 and refounded in 1865. In 1871 this union took the title of syndicate. The workers in Marseilles effected the same in 1878. When in 1884 the law relative to trade unions was passed there were 18 organizations in the furniture trades. A Congress in 1903 recommended the incorporation of organizations under the law.

The cradle of the present Federation of Paris. A meeting in the capital in 1868 dealt with the union of all oganizations of furniture workers in the Seine department. A scheme for this purpose put forward in July of the same year fell through. The Paris joiners attacked the subject again in 1880, and a set of rules was published in 1884. The Federation began to move in this year and various organizations joined it. But many things hindered advance till the years of the World's Exhibition, 1888-1889, when a great national Congress was held in Paris, and 1900 when the Congress, at which 41 representatives from 21 towns were present, decided to affiliate to the National Center, and to issue a journal. From then the movement went slowly forward and last year 79 syndicates or unions were members of the Federation.

Since the first conflict in 1831, when the joiners were for destroying the cutting machines, the furniture workers have engaged in many fights. The war of 1870 and then the wholesale massacre, imprisonment and deportation of the Commune, and the flight of those who escaped the worser fate, decimated the ranks of the workers. Yet in the struggles of 1880 and 1881 they proved to have regained much lost ground.

The movements of modern years may begin with the strike of the joiners in 1906, for the 8-hour day and a forty per cent increase of wages, which was quite spoilt by the dismnity of the workers. An important strike of joiners in St. Loup-fur-Semouse in 1908, lasting four months, affected the Federation considerably. Another strike in Paris two years later was lost owing to the employment of "yellow" or blackleg labor. The Federation had determined to have a 9-hour day and to obtain it by direct action. The workers were ordered to leave the shops and factories at 5 o'clock every day. The masters discharged all who did so but in the long run the 9-hour day was obtained in many branches of the industry in Paris.

The 1911 Congress dealt with the apprentice question and decided that apprentices should work but 8 hours per day and attend a course for 2 hours; that at the end of his term the apprentice should be examined and if found wanting in trade knowledge the employer should be liable to pay compensation.

The review also deals with the development in style since Leon de Sellhac, and the status of the workers. The war with Italy had a great effect in the revival of French art. Italian artists were brought to France by Charles VIII. and his successor. Schools were founded but only to be destroyed by the religious war. Henry IV. sent workers abroad to learn and that was the birth of the so-called Boulle inlaid furniture. The revolutionary period gave the art furniture industry a set back and new machinery and imitation have the same effect today.

The Trade Unions Label.

The trade unions' label, proving goods bearing such to be produced by organized labor is not a new institution, but it has not grown to such importance in the old world as in the new. However, there are indications of the idea spreading in Europe and, indeed, at the last Scottish Trade Unions Congress it was decided to recommend the label for manufactures produced under trade union conditions. In the United States of America the label has great importance, but it must not be overlooked that in that country no co-operative movement exists. The co-operative movement in European countries helps the worker to avoid the produce of sweated industries.

In England, the shoemakers organization employs the label with success and lately the Belgian cigar makers introduced a trade union mark for affixing to cigar boxes. In the United States, where all trade unions employ the label, paper must have the water-mark of the paper makers and typographers, while the label on the packing must bear the water-mark and also the label of the printers. All attempts to introduce a uniform label have been, up to now, unavailing, no doubt because of the extraordinary specializing in American trades. How the trade unions stand up for the label the following instance will show. On a new building lately the workers noticed that the ready-made doors and window-frames were unlabeled. They immediately stopped work and would not resume until the employers had the doors taken to pieces and put together again by organized workers of the respective trades. Ofttimes the employers in such a case have to pay a fine which goes to the trade union funds or is used for charities.

Eventually a use of the label was made by young trade unions as protection against depression in wages caused by the employment of negroes and Chinese, and other immigrants from backward countries. The cigarmakers of California were the first, in 1874, to introduce the white label, as they were threatened by the competition of cheaper labor and the mass of immigrating Chinese. One after another similar labels were brought into use by other cigarmakers' trade unions. In 1885 the hatters and ironfounders, and in 1891 the garment workers and printers followed the example. Since then almost all North American trade unions have followed suit. In the National Trade Unions Centre (American Federation of Labor), also in every town, are special "label committees," which publish many periodicals for the propagation of the different labels.

According to a complication of the "label department" of the American Federation of Labor, the use of the label in the two past years by workers' organizations was as follows:

	1911.	1912.
United Brewery Workmen, International Union	41,836,850	44,239,850
American Wire Weavers' Protective Association	6,000	26,000
Stove Mounters' International Union	20,000	22,000
United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers' Union	4,015,000	5,305,000
Tobacco Workers' International Union	383,900,000	408,925,000
Glove Workers' International Union	1,841,500	1,874,500
United Garment Workers' Union	42,384,000	45,430,000
Bakery and Confectionery Workers' Union	548,210,590	555,439,000
United Textile Workers of America	240,000	400,000
Travelers' Goods and Leather Novelty Workers	11,000	47,000
Journeymen Tailors' Union	511,000	529,681
International Molders' Union	.....	.....
International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers	.....	.....
Cigarmakers' International Union	28,315,000	28,600,000
American Federation of Labor	9,308,000	9,423,000
United Hatters of North America	16,660,000	16,473,833

The Federation of Labor has also a small general label for the lesser trade unions, and almost 10,000,000 of these are used yearly. Many trade unions have their own label factories, which are very profitable, as the employers, in most cases, have to purchase the labels from the trade unions.

The International Typographers' Secretariat (Stuttgart, Germany) to which at the beginning of 1912, eighteen national organizations were affiliated 131,602 members, had an income of over 9,000,000 francs yearly and funds amounting to nearly 18,000,000 francs (about £720,000).

Continuation of the War Drama.

From Sofia, Comrade Dimitroff, the secretary of the Bulgarian Trade Unions, writes to us as follows: "Since the beginning of February the hostilities have been renewed, and there has been a strong bombardment of Adrianople. From the first there was no prospect of the fight round Adrianople being restricted. One can say positively that the war is prosecuted with greater brutality and ruthlessness than ever. The slaughter will be more horrible than in scarcely any previous war. The authorities have issued an order that all wounded soldiers must leave the hospitals and go to their homes. And today we were the witnesses of a heartrending scene: We saw hundreds of wounded soldiers, who were not healed of their injuries, lame and with bullets still in their bodies, thrown out to make room for further victims of the war. The greater number of the poor, unfortunate workers have no means at their disposal for the healing or alleviation of their injuries. Many of them will be compelled to procure their daily bread by begging. How cruelly our military authorities treat patriots may be seen from the following facts: Today, after the order of the authority, a building worker who has become quite blind, had to leave the hospital with other wounded soldiers. He was set down in the street without means. Had our organization not appeared on the scene and taken care of him a tragic death would have been the end. We hope to send him to his home in Macedonia some day.

"The renewal of the war has rendered the conditions of the workers still worse. The money granted by town authorities is already expended and further support is not forthcoming. These grants were but a drop of water on a hot stone. In all the sum granted for support by the various authorities, according to official reports, amounted to 1,556,900 francs. Divide this sum amongst the urban populations living in the deepest misery, computed at 700,000, and it comes to only two francs each for four months!

"Furthermore several undertakings and workshops which were re-opened in the hope of a speedy termination of the war, will probably soon close again. This will make unemployment more extensive and pressing. To this deplorable state must be added the anxiety of families whose breadwinners are at the front. We have also the greatest fear for the fate of our best organizers who are at the seat of war, but till now have not suffered from the deadly fire of opponents. Under these conditions the resumption of hostilities meets with the general disregard and barefaced opposition of the people. The wrath of the lower classes against this slaughter and their contempt of the originators grows stronger and stronger. If the indignation does not show itself in revolt it is only because of the extraordinarily barbarous military rule and military censor which prevails.

Brief Notes From the Workers' International.

Great Britain.—The three railway organizations which recently amalgamated total 188,000 members. Their funds amount to about £500,000. . . . The large Carpenters and Joiners' Union has decided not to take part in any further meetings for amalgamation with other organizations in the wood industry. . . . During the deliberations on the Trade Unions' Bill in the House of Lords a clause was introduced to render impossible the use of trade union funds for political papers. If such a clause were inserted in the act not only would the present daily papers of the Labor party be destroyed but it would be impossible to establish labor papers for a long time to come. . . . The Trade Unions' National Centre, which has already 200,000 members in the insurance section, is making arrangements with the co-operative bank whereby all benefits shall be paid by the checks of this bank. These checks are to be redeemable at all co-operative stores. . . . The Daily Citizen, the daily paper of the Labor party, appears to be fighting with great financial difficulties. On its establishment a joint stock company was formed with a nominal capital of £150,000; of this amount about £85,000 has been paid up. A conference has been called for the early days of this month to attempt to establish the paper on a sound and permanent basis. . . . Following the example of other towns, the Sheffield town authorities, on representations from the workers, have decided to build public wash houses, where townsfolk may do their washing. . . . Because he would not drive a train the number of wagons of which was more than the brake-power, according to the regulations allowed for, an engine driver on the Midland railway has been dismissed. The railway workers energetically demand the reinstatement of the driver or a general strike to enforce this. . . . The lockout of 3,000 printers in Scotland, which the employers threatened, was prevented in the last moment. The parties have decided to discuss the present demands further. . . . The London bakers decided at an overflowing meeting to come out should the employers not agree to the demand for a minimum wage of 30s for a sixty-hour week. Up to now the employers' organization has rejected these demands absolutely.

Russia.—With the year 1913 a new epoch begins for the Russian labor movement. To all appearances the proletariat have overcome the terror of the revolution repression and to have regained their old fighting spirit. After the revolution the strike movement gradually sank till the year 1910. In this year there were 222 strikes affecting 46,000 work people (the official statistics deal only with those businesses coming under factory inspection). In 1911 there were 466 strikes, 105,000 persons involved, but in 1912 the number rose to 1,918 strikes, with 683,000 involved. Sixty-four per cent of the strikes, with 75 per cent of the strikers are of political character, i. e., protest strikes against the brutal massacre of the Lena gold miners and against the death penalty, May 1, etc. In 1910 there were eight political strikes, with 4,000 strikers. . . . With improvement in the economical position, the number of economical strikes in the three years mentioned above has risen greatly (214,442 and 702, respectively); the number of strikers has increased also (42,000, 97,000 and 172,000). Of all economic strikes, 80 per cent were for improvement in wages, 5 per cent were against the lengthening of work time, 10 per cent ended in victory for the workers, and more than 30 per cent were compromised; 40 per cent of the strikes lasted longer than three days. The lost time amounted to 2,000,000 days.

Germany.—The Berlin magistrates answer to the petition of the Domestic Servants' Union for special technical classes for servants was favorable. . . . In 1911 there were in Germany 135 cement works, employing 27,116 workers. . . . There were in Prussia in 1911, 193,602 inns and public houses in which intoxicating liquors were sold, as against 193,979 in the previous year. The number of houses where only non-alcoholic drinks were sold rose in the same year from 8,659 to 9,130. The average works out at one inn or public house to 193 persons (173 in 1906). . . . The "Co-operative Stores Peoples' Paper" of the Central Union of the German Co-operative movement is now to be published fortnightly, with a circulation of 500,000 to members of the Co-operative organization. . . . An energetic fight against the prayer book manufacturers in Keveloer, who will not recognize the workers' right to combine, was brought to a successful conclusion by the Christian Union of Bookbinders in a short time. The employers are particularly indignant at the boycott which the workers declared on prayer books coming from that town. . . . The Leather Workers' Union increased its membership in one year by 600 to 15,893 at the beginning of this year. The union was able, last year, to secure a shortening of work time averaging two hours a week for 2,980 persons, and to raise wages for 4,132 persons by one-sixth weekly. . . . An extraordinary congress of the Painters' Union agreed by 37,000 votes to 13,000 to arbitration by which the tariff movement, which at first threatened to be an earnest struggle, will be ended. According to the arbitrators who dealt with matters affecting 64,409 workers, wages shall be raised 2 to 7 pfgs. per hour, but work time has been shortened only in various places where they work ten hours daily. The agreement was reached on the ground of the introduction of an imperial tariff which shall provide for employment bureaus under joint control. . . . In the tailoring trades also the tariff movement was ended by the Arbitration Court.

Austria.—The Third International Congress of the Bakers and Confectioners will take place in Vienna in 1914. The organizations of most countries in which modern trade unions of the bakers and confectioners are established have already notified their intention to be present. . . . The Union of Agricultural and Forest Workers, which was founded a year ago by the amalgamation of three small organizations with several hundred members numbers now 1,815 members in eighty-eight districts. Last year a number of wages movements were successfully carried through. . . . According to official statistics, sixty-three collective agreements were concluded in the wood industry in 1910. Under these agreements the daily work time was eight and three-quarters hours for 850 workers, nine hours for 3,255, nine and one-quarter hours for 190, nine and one-half hours for 1,408, nine and three-quarters hours for 116, ten hours for 1,137, more than ten hours for fourteen workers. . . . In a number of places in Lower Austria the doctors gave up their positions on the sick insurance scheme on February 1st in order to enforce the granting of higher fees. . . . The Union of Printers in Bohemia has withdrawn from the Czoch-Slav Trade Union Commission in Prague, giving as reason that the workers of a country should not congregate into nationalities, but rather should all belong to one central organization covering the whole land and all nationalities therein.

Hungary.—The statistics issued by the Printers' Union show that in Hungary there are 1,195 printeries in 387 places. These printeries employ 5,520 compositors, 1,233 machine minders and printers, 881 helpers, 40 feeders and 2,207 females and 1,874 apprentices. The average weekly wage of printers was, in 1912, 35.32 kronen (about 30s) as against 33.65 kronen in the previous year; helpers, 19.42 kronen; females, 14.05 kronen. This union also compiles statistics relative to dwellings, and shows that while in the last twelve years rent for one room has increased 47.20 per cent and for two rooms 47.30 per cent, wages have only advanced 34.60 per cent, and this after bitter struggles.

Croatia.—The Union of Lithographers, Plate Printers and Assistants in Agram has concluded a new collective agreement with the employers. This will in particular improve conditions for assistants. On Saturdays the working time shall be shortened by one-half hour; the hours for lithographers shall be eight daily and for plate printers eight and one-half daily; after two years' service four days holiday must be granted and after three years, one week, with payment. The minimum wage for assistants is to be raised to 16 kronen (kronen equals 10d.), and after one year's work 18 kronen, for female feeders, 10 and 12 kronen, respectively; for printers themselves the minimum wage shall be for the first year after apprenticeship, 22 to 24 kronen, and afterwards 27 kronen. All workers are to be engaged through the employment agency of the men's unions.

Switzerland.—The official and trade unions' statistics in regard to the ten-hour day show how dependent the various classes of workers are on the trade unions' organizations for shorter work time. In 1908-9 the percentage of workers in the various industries with a work day of over ten hours was: Textile industries, 54.3; provision and foodstuffs trade, 40.8; metal and machine, 32.6; salt, earth and stone, 42.2; leather, 29.0; chemical, 26.9; watch and jewelry, 17.8; woodworkers, 16.6; printing, 15.0. . . . In Zurich it has been decided, on a referendum of the inhabitants, to introduce the proportional election system for municipal elections. . . . The aldermen of Zurich have been in communication with other town authorities with a view to general action on the principle of compulsory citizenship for foreigners born in Switzerland. The workers support this demand strongly. . . . The Swiss Federal Parliament has decided to call a conference for international workers' protection to deal with the question of the abolition of night work for youth and the introduction of a legal ten-hour day for females and youths.

Spain.—In Jerez de la Frontera the organized agricultural workers have decided to take the initiative for the founding of a general agricultural workers' union. . . . The printers of Barcelona intend to start a movement for the eight-hour day; at present the nine-hour day is a rarity among them, and a minimum wage of 5 pesetas per day. . . . The printers are at present eagerly re-organizing the trade union. They have had a national union since 1882, this being founded after the amalgamation in Madrid and Barcelona. But still many groups remain outside this union. Within these non-affiliated trade unions there is no exchange of cards. On account of this so many unbearable conditions have developed during the year that it is very probable that a general organization will be initiated at the coming general congress of printers. The draft of the rules places strike, unemployment, old age, death benefits, etc., to the fore.

France.—In the well-known automobile factory of Renault, Paris, a strike has practically stopped all work; the strike has been brought about by the introduction of the Faylor speeding-up system which has made the conditions for workers almost unbearable. . . . At the end of 1912 there were 198 municipal employment bureaus in 180 towns. . . . In Paris 2,500 workers employed on public buildings have been locked out on account of wage differences.

Belgium.—Several of the local trades unions not affiliated to the National Centre will hold a Congress in Liege to consider the foundation of a Syndicalist Trade Unions' Federation. . . . According to the co-operative yearbook, the 205 Socialist co-operative societies in the country had in 1911 a turnover of £1,900,000, as against £1,780,000 in the previous year. The total membership was 170,748, which with families amounts to about 10 per cent of the total population of Belgium. . . . The Workers' Secretariat, following the example of its namesake in Germany, was founded by several trade unions in Liege. It has been active since the middle of 1912, and according to their reports just published, has already had great success in representing the workers in accident and other actions for compensation. These useful organizations will also soon be in existence in other places. . . . The Christian Trade Unions are trying to induce the workers, by leaflet and placard, to refrain from participating in the general strike arranged by the Labor party and Independent Trade Unions for the 14th of April. Naturally, in this action they have the full support of the government and other reactionaries. . . . In spite of a serious breach of contract by the employers in the cartwrights' trade, the union has advised the men, having in view the coming general strike, to avoid all trade movements and instead to prepare for the general fight. . . . The committee of preparation for the general strike has taken full precautions for the avoidance of disturbances. In Brussels, for instance, it has been decided that during the strike all Socialist meeting places shall be closed before nightfall, and in the evening no meetings shall take place. No alcoholic drinks may be sold. A special arrangement has been made to prevent all disturbances and in case of need to render help to the police. Great preparations have also been made for placing the children of strikers in safety abroad. The Socialist party in Holland had appointed committees for this purpose in sixty-one places and has placed upon them the responsibility of protecting 2,000 children for the duration of the strike. . . . In Liege 800 woodworkers have been locked out by the employers' organization on account of a small strike.

Holland.—One of the most interesting of trade unions is that of the under-seamen of the Dutch navy, which has sections on almost all warships. Its influence is very strong and already the admiralty has had to grant many of its demands. It has striven hard in collections for strikes and in political demonstrations, for instance, universal suffrage. According to the Clerical party, the union carries on a strong anti-militarist agitation, and the marine minister has had to promise the clericals in Parliament that he would proceed against the trade union on war vessels. . . . The organization of the sea fishers' "Vrede en Welvaart" has decided to join the organization of the seamen, "Volharding." . . . At the present moment there are 3,700 workers in the cigar industry engaged in strikes and lock-outs.

Brazil.—In view of the continual attempts to direct emigrants to Brazil it is necessary that the abominable conditions existing here in economical and political affairs be pointed out. The workers' paper in San Paolo publishes again an appeal to the European press to inform intending emigrants of what they may expect in Brazil. The arbitrary authority of the police is especially directed against foreign workmen who are without rights in Brazil, and heretofore absolutely dependent on the employers. Wages quarrels occur every day. But the foreign worker always gets the worst of the bargains, as he need only be pointed out to the police as an agitator and disturber of the peace to be persecuted and brutally treated. How little right the workers have, particularly the foreigners, is shown by the unpretentious demands they are now putting forward, viz., equal working rights for native and foreign workers, security of wages for all workers, right of combination, protection of the lives of workers by compulsory accident insurance, regulation of women and children's work in industries.

Porto Rico.—The governor in his address to the Legislature has suggested the introduction of income tax for the upbuilding of the school system, as of 390,000 children of school age only 125,000 at present are able to attend schools regularly. Further, he suggested, among other things, a bill for accident compensation, prohibition of work for children during school hours and also in unhealthy trades, sale of public land to workers and an easy gradual payment system for the building of their own homes, etc. This, compared with present conditions, means a great advance. The revolution is due to the trade unions belonging to the American Federation of Labor, which in Porto Rico have 30,000 members and own several papers.

United States of America.—The Union of Ore Miners was able to procure last year an average increase of wages of $98 per man per year for 34,890 members, and decrease in work time of more than an hour a day for 8,174. . . . The strike of journeymen tailors in San Francisco has been settled with a minimum wage of $22 per week for bushelmen and pressers. . . . The American Federation of Labor has decided to exhibit in the World's Exposition in 1915 in San Francisco. . . . The Intercollegiate Socialist Society, a union of Socialists of the American university and college students, is at present composed of seventy chapels, of which eleven take only graduates. . . . The American Federation of Labor is engaged in a great agitation for the organization of non-organized trades, and particularly the manual laborers. Special agitators of different nationalities have been appointed for this purpose. Half a million of the first pamphlet printed in thirteen different languages have been issued. . . . The strike in the clothing industry in New York caused a stoppage of work in other towns, such as Rochester, Boston, etc. . . . The New York Socialist paper, The Call, has been informed by the postal authorities that they will not be allowed to send the paper through the post if a series of articles on sexual matters, "What Every Young Girl Should Know," which appeared in the Sunday supplement, were not withdrawn. . . .According to official statistics covering the year ending June 30, 1912, the total number of casualties on railroads was 180,123; 10,585 were killed and 169,538 injured. . . . The fire brigade commissioner of Boston determinedly opposes the affiliation of the Fire Brigade Union with the trade unions. He is following in the footsteps of the Berlin (Germany) police president, who forbade firemen joining their own neutral union. . . . The recent law which the trades unions achieved for the eight-hour day for all government works has been rendered illusory to some extent, owing to the decision of the federal commissioner to the effect that contractors have the right to keep their employés engaged after the eight-hour period on work which is not governmental. . . . The Bakers' Union states that soon nearly a half of the whole bread production of the land will be controlled by three bakery companies which work with a share capital of about £10,000,000.

Australasia.—A conference of representatives of the various states the Plasterers' Unions decided to submit a scheme of federation to members. . . .The threatened strike of Auckland bakers was avoided by the employers granting the demands of the men for abolition of night work, or double pay for such. . . . Had the employers dared to enforce the recent award of the Court of Industrial Appeals (South Australia), whereby the molders were reduced to 60s. a week, there would have been trouble, for the men were determined to leave the state rather than submit. . . . The Woodworkers' Union of Victoria, which has had to pay out over £2,000 in four years for accidents to members, has begun agitating for the accident compensation act which governments have all along promised but not granted. . . . The second congress of the Australian branches of the I. W. W. passed a resolution discountenancing "direct action," a method only advocated by "irresponsible persons with anarchistic tendencies."

Japan.—In the state printing works the employés work 359 days a year. What must it be like in private industries?

South Africa.—The minister of railways has received a deputation of the locomotive drivers and boilersmiths' representatives and parliamentary members of the Labor party which placed before him the complaints of the railway men against the new working conditions which introduce piecework rates in the Transvaal and reduce the daily way in Natal by 2s. per day. The minister promised to give the matter his attention. The workers have threatened to go on strike if they are not given justice in the matter.

WILL SOCIALISM BE INJURED BY OPPOSING BURNING OF NEGROES?

By R. A. Dague.

Among the stack of letters received referring to my recently published contributions in which I protested against the growing practice of burning negroes at the stake by frenzied and drunken mobs, denying the accused person a court investigation, are two epistles in which the writers say that my writings will injure Socialism in the South.

One correspondent, after applying various epithets to me, says:

"This subject of burning negroes in no wise concerns Socialism,
"and had better be left out of our party papers. It is no more Social"istic than is the subject of religion, but is entirely a racial question.
"Furthermore, it involves nothing that pertains to any particular doc"trine of any party, and is bigger than any party in existence. . . .
"R. A. Dague's articles will do Socialism a great deal of harm in Mis"sissippi, for a great many people will accept his view of Socialism
"when the question (burning negroes) does not concern the party at "all."

The writer of the above claims to be a Socialist. Now, I am not disposed at this time to argue the question further, except to say that my Mississippi comrade is in error when he says that the burning of negroes alive at the stake by a mob, refusing the accused a fair trial by jury, in a country in which are courts and laws, is a subject that in no way concerns the Socialist party—a party that announces as one of its fundamental principles a universal brotherhood. Lawless mobbing of human beings and burning them alive, denying them a fair court trail and a universal brotherhood do not harmonize. They do not go well together. I think that such lawless, anarchistic lynchings do concern the Socialists. I feel sure that Socialism has much to do about such matters.

I am glad that of two dozen or more Socialists who have expressed to me their opinion as to the merits of my articles alluded to, only two favor the burning of negroes alive. To offset those two I have selected out of the others two letters, copies of which I give below. I believe that "Gene" Debs and Jack London know more as to what Socialism stands for than my two comrades who have criticised me, and who think that I am injuring the Socialist party by opposing the burning of "niggers" at the stake.

Here are copies of the two letters:

"Terre Haute, Indiana, March 18, 1913.

"R. A. Dague:

"Dear Comrade—We have read and commented on your reply to the Oklahoma editor published in the Miners' Magazine on burning negroes at the stake. Brother 'Gene' and I read it with the greatest appreciation. . . . You may be sure that we are thoroughly with you in your stand on this question and that we also believe with you that the Socialist party should espouse the cause of the weak of all colors and take a progressive stand on all such propositions. Hoping you may be spared many more years to carry on your useful and humane work, I remain, Yours fraternally,

"THEODORE DEBS."

"Glen Ellen California, March 30, 1913.

"Dear Comrade Dague—I write you to say that if opposing the burning of negroes at the stake is harmful to Socialism, then Socialism does not amount to much and ought to be harmed—ought to be destroyed. There is no place in the world today, nor in any creed or theory of human society for such a barbarism as negro-burning. I am with you, dear Comrade Dague in your opposition to negro-burning with all my heart and all my soul. Go on with the good work.

"With the hand of love to you and your dear wife stretched across the continent, I am ever, Yours for Socialism,

"JACK LONDON."

THE SPIRIT OF IGNORANCE.

Ye pray to heaven for freedom,
Ask a God to right a wrong
And to break the iron fetters
Which have shackled you so long,
And never a sign is given;
No wrong is ever suppressed,
While His earthly shepherds tell you:
"Be patient," for God knows best.

And I smile as you live and suffer;
I thrive on your foolish fears,
And I bind and yoke you closer,
And am blind to your scalding tears.
Ye are prey to old superstition
And are taught to fear "God's wrath,"
And blindly walk into the snare
That I have spread in your path.

"Ye have eyes and yet ye see not;"
Ye have ears that are deaf to truth,
And feet that walk in darkness,
And ye follow the blind, forsooth.
But so long as ye are complacent
And accept the minister's creed
Ye can never escape my thralldom,
From my shackles ne'er be freed.

Where Reason reigns I vanish;
I obey its law supreme.
I cannot live nor flourish
Where men think instead of dream.
My field is the many churches;
What I sow is the narrow creed,
And I gather a bountiful harvest
That sates the minister's greed.

Ye can break my mighty power
That many nations link,
If ye light the lamp of reason—
Be just to yourself— and think.
And the darkness of night will vanish
And the specter of Doubt will flee;
Ye will enter the Kingdom of Daylight
From my baneful power be free.

April 15th. W. E. HANSON.

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM JOPLIN, MISSOURI.

The Miners' Magazine:

The mining industry in the Joplin district has undergone a wonderful change during the last dozen years. When the writer came to this district back in 1894—the year made memorable by the great Colorado strike—the prospecting outfit was much in evidence and the small operator with the hand jig "plant" could be seen in every direction. Land was held in small tracts by local interests, and anyone who wished to try his luck at prospecting might secure a lease at low royalty. Many of the now wealthiest citizens in the zinc district owe their success in the financial world to the fact that they came to Joplin at a time when opportunities were open to men of small means. In that day the operator mingled with the employés on terms of absolute social equality, not infrequently working side by side with them down in the mine. When the day's work ended and they met at the club or some down-town corner, you could not for the life of you distinguish the operator from the miner. When the operator prospered, his employés shared his prosperity through an increase in wages; and it sometimes happened that under reverses all suffered. That was indeed a day when the interests of the operator and the miner were identical.

But that day is gone—gone never to return. The man with the prospecting outfit has disappeared; on the site formerly occupied by the hand jig layout now stands the massive power-driven plant, the Guggenheim interests are rapidly absorbing the valuable mineral lands in the district and the small operator of other days has been supplanted by the arrogant dictator that disdains to recognize the miner on the streets.

The miner has failed to keep pace with these changes. He knows that the prosperity of the operator of today is not shared by him. He knows that the price the operator gets for his ore has nothing to do with determining the wage he is paid for his labor. He has seen the mines closed down by the operators when ore was selling at a good price, throwing thousands of workingmen out of employment without consulting their interests, but somehow he has still clung to the delusion that there is somewhere or other an identity of interests existing between himself and the operator.

Of late, however, the miners of the Joplin district are showing signs of an awakening. That this is true is shown by numerous small strikes which have recently taken place at various points in the district. The Western Federation of Miners, which has heretofore been unable to organize here, now has several healthy local unions with a strong membership scattered over the district. The smeltermen, though unorganized, are out on a strike against a reduction in wages, and Brother Richard Bunny, who is here from Lead, South Dakota, and Brother Marion Cope, the local organizer, will no doubt succeed in organizing them. The workers are beginning to see there is nothing to gain by catering to the boss. A spineless, weak-kneed fellow who has not the courage to join the union is thrown out of employment as readily as the man who has the nerve to stand up for his rights. And the boys are beginning to see it.

W. J. EDENS,

Joplin, Missouri, April 4, 1913. Member Joplin Union No. 217, W. F. M.

THE PRODIGAL GIRL.

Sweet poets have sung of the beauties of home,
Its comforts, its love and its joy;
How back to the peace of its sheltering dome
Is welcomed the prodigal boy.
They picture his father with pardoning smile,
And the glittering robes to unfurl;
But none of the poets have thought it worth while
To sing of the prodigal girl.

The prodigal son can resume his old place
As leader of fashion's mad whirl,
With never a hint of his former disgrace—
Not so for the prodigal girl.
The girl may come back to the home she has left,
But nothing is ever the same;
The shadow still lingers o'er dear ones bereft—
Society scoffs at her name.

Perhaps that is why when a prodigal girl
Gets lost on life's devious track
She thinks of the lips that will scornfully curl,
And hasn't the heart to come back.
Yes, welcome the prodigal son to his place;
Be merciful, gracious and just;
But shut not the door in his frail sister's face—
Remember, she, too, is but dust.

—Miss Harriet Bradley.

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

In the Fifth Division Court of the District of Sudbury—"Rex vs. William Holowaskawe."

Mr. A. G. Slaght for Appellant.

Mr. T. C. Robinette, K. C., and Mr. John Godfrey, for Respondent.

This is an appeal from the conviction made by Mr. Thomas Torrance, police magistrate, on the 21st of January, 1913, under which the defendant was convicted under section 60 of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act 1907, and being Chapter 20 of 6-7 Edward VII., for inciting to strike contrary to the provisions of the act. By this is meant, according to section 56, a strike which is unlawful by reason of an employé going on strike "on account of any dispute prior to or during a reference of such dispute to a Board of Conciliation and Investigation under the provisions of this act."

There is a lengthy clause, section 2, sub-section (e), which defines the meaning of the word "dispute," the effect of which is that it means "any dispute or difference between an employer and one or more of his employés" as to certain things therein generally stated or as to any other things therein specifically mentioned, such as wages, hours of employment, materials, supplied and alleged to be bad, unfit or unsuitable, established custom or usage, interpretation of agreement, and other matter.

It was not proved before me, nor was it necessary to prove, that there was any reference to a Board of Conciliation or that there was any request for the same. Rex vs. McGuire 16, O. L. R. 522.

The evidence showed that the first sign of dispute was the strike itself, or rather the inciting by the defendant of the strikers. The strike followed this inciting. As the prosecutor stated, the strike came to him with so much surprise that it was like a thunder-clap. It appears that there was no demand for increased wages, shorter hours of labor or anything of any kind until the defendant called upon the men to strike. This call was the very beginning of the dispute. There cannot be a dispute or difference unless there are two parties who dispute or differ with one another. It may be and without doubt must have been the case here that the strike was pre-concerted among the men, though there is no evidence that this was so. But stating it as strongly for the prosecution as possible and allowing that the strike was the result of a previous understanding between the men, still matters did not reach a stage where there was a demand by the men for better terms and a refusal by the employer, the Hollinger Mines Co., of what the men asked. When such a demand and a refusal were not made, can it be said that there was any "dispute" until the strike itself created the dispute? If the answer be that there was no dispute until the strike itself, then will come the necessity of answering another question. Did the men go on strike "on account of any dispute," to quote the words of section 56?

In my opinion, the defendant is not brought within the act as an offender under sections 56 and 61, for the reason that the strike was not on account of a dispute. To hold otherwise would be to eliminate the words "on account of any dispute" from section 56. If these five words were not in the section, then it would be clear that the defendant, by his inciting, was guilty of an offense.

The act when framed might have been so framed with or without these words. One cannot assume that they were placed in the section without it being intended that they were to have a meaning and perhaps were intended for a purpose. Possibly it was considered that when a strike comes like a bolt out of the blue instead of like a storm which there is premonition, there is not the danger to the peace of the community that would be engendered by the antecedent mutterings.

Another consideration is that penal statutes must receive a strict construction.

The conviction is quashed, with costs to be paid by the prosecutor to the defendant, which costs I fix at $50.

Rex. vs. E. Croft.

The reasons in the Holowaskawe case apply to this case, with costs to be paid by the prosecutor to the defendant, which costs I fix at $50.

Rex vs. Peter Cleary.

There is a difference in the circumstances of this case from those in the Holowaskawe case. The inciting was done after the strike had started. I confirm the conviction. The costs of the appeal, which I fix at $50, are to be paid by the defendant to the prosecutor.

BOURKE COCKRAN SMASHES SOCIALISM.

On Sunday, March 16th, at St. Ambrose hall, DeKalb and Tompkins avenues, the Hon. W. Bourke Cockran delivered an oration on "Socialism" before the Brooklyn diocesan branch of the American Federation of Catholic Societies.

In his usual rhetorical style the far-famed orator proceeded to "smash Socialism," and I append a few of his gems.

He obligingly admitted the Socialistic axiom that "all wealth, save that of wild nature itself, is produced by labor applied to the earth." The houses we live in, the food we eat, the clothes we wear, are all the product of labor. That being so, the Socialist contends that as all these things are produced by labor they belong to those who produce them.

But not so for the Hon. Bourke. Pointing to a table on the platform, he continued: "Supposing this table is worth $10, and a carpenter makes twenty in a week. These tables would be worth $200. The carpenter receives two of these tables for wages, or say, $20. The other eighteen tables, or say $180, goes to the capitalist who employs him. The Socialist claims that the carpenter should receive the whole twenty tables, or $200, and makes no allowance for the capitalist who employs him, the lumberman who cuts down the trees, the sawyer who cuts the planks, the railroads which transport the materials, and all the other incidentals which must be attended to before the carpenter can finally make his tables."

Of course, the Cockran gentleman knows that the Socialist claims nothing of the kind, but his intelligent (?) audience fell for it and applauded vociferously. Any one acquainted with the rudiments of Socialism knows that when a Socialist speaks of labor he includes all useful and necessary workers, both hand and brain. Thus, if he were describing the making of the aforementioned tables, he would include as useful and necessary workers the lumberman, the sawyer, the engineer, the railroad builder, the superintendents, the active manager, the designer of the tables, the carpenter, and all who had contributed useful and necessary labor toward the construction of the tables.

But he would exclude as entirely unnecessary the land and timber thieves who have robbed the nation of its heritage; the railroad financiers who have gouged the nation of so much of its land and pumped so much water into their railroad stocks that the bottom is falling out of most of them; the corporation lawyers, who gain exorbitant fees by teaching these same financiers how to cheat the nation, and, finally, he would protest that eighteen out of twenty tables were entirely too much to give the good, kind capitalist for the cost of materials and the reward of management, although that is just what the capitalist class is receiving.

Continuing to smash Socialism some more, Mr. Cockran described it as "the glorification of the office holder." He meant that as a knock, and his audience was tickled to death. In reality it was a knock at his own glorious system, of which he is so proud. The present day Tammany or Republican office holder is most certainly an object of derision and contempt, even to his own supporters. The average politician, from the top ones who pay lickspittle homage to Charley Murphy or Boss Barnes, down to the coal scuttle Tammany watcher, or the wretched unfortunate who lines up once a year to get a pair of shoes from Tim Sullivan—these are the foundation stones of capitalist politics.

But the Socialistic idea of an office holder is somewhat different to that. When a Socialist thinks of an office holder he has in mind a person who is really worth his salary to the community, such as a fireman or letter carrier. Or, going further up the scale of ability, he would regard a man like Col. Goethals, the engineer of the Panama canal, as "the glorification of the office holder." Here is a man doing a magnificent work for the community for a modest salary and with his heart in his work, sticking to his duty after others have quit in despair. Compare him with the Tammany outfit! We don't care what his political or religious opinions are. He is serving the nation well and faithfully, and that is all we ask. "The glorification of the office holder!" We thank you for that phrase, Comrade Cockran; it fits us as if we were measured for it.

Incidentally, while speaking of the Panama canal, if a Socialist administration were in power, every national navy yard would be busy—not building monstrous murder machines, which will be relegated to the scrap heap in ten years, but building a splendid merchant marine to take over the coastwise trade, and put the canal to the best possible national use. This would also settle the foolish argument with England about tolls, for no matter what tolls were charged, it would be our own money back.

With many melodramatic gestures and trembling inflections of his voice (which passes for profound oratory with his many admirers) Mr. Cockran wound up his peroration by expatiating on the glory of the church, which had freed the slave, and proclaimed the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

But a church, like an individual or a nation, must be judged not by what its ancestors did, but by what it is doing in our own times. While the annals of our country shine with the glory of great abolitionists and emancipators like William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips and Abraham Lincoln, all unorthodox in their religion, we shall search in vain for any great champion of emancipation among the orthodox clergy, so far have the orthodox churches receded from the ideal of the Master, and but for the arrogance of the slave power in its endeavor to disrupt the Union, thus uniting all classes and creeds against its treason, the negro slaves would be slaves yet for all the assistance they would have received from the reactionary clergy. And now that the modern slave power, more arrogant than the southern slave holders, is reaching its slimy tentacles into every legislature of the Union, one of the chief bulwarks of defense is the church, proud of its conservatism.

Truly, it admonishes the rich to practice the Christian virtues, and pay their slaves a little more. But when even her own rich pay no heed to her admonitions, what probability is there that the Guggenheims, the "divine right" Baers, the Christian coal owners of West Virginia, the steel slave owners of Pittsburg, or the sweaters of New York will listen to her vain preachment? What does human life count for beside their sacred property? As well preach to tigers and wolves. The church may anathematize and interdict with bell, book and candle, capitalist governments may gag every Socialist and burn every Socialist publication, and, in spite of all, Socialism would rise phœnix-like from the ashes. For it is not Socialism that makes the condition, but the condition that makes for Socialism, and makes it inevitable.—Fabian in New York Call.

IS A PANIC DUE?

The industrial situation in Vancouver at the present time is one which even the most conservative—meaning thereby those with money enough in the bank to tide over the bad time—consider as very unsatisfactory. To those who have to depend upon being able to sell their labor daily in return for bread for themselves and their families it is nothing short of tragedy. Not since the terrible winter of 1907-1908, when the financial panic struck this continent, have things been so bad at this time of the year as they are now. Business firms and financial houses of the "boom" variety are going into the bankruptcy court, real estate offices by the dozen are vacant, money is what is termed "tight," and workmen by the hundreds are looking for jobs. This is particularly so in the building trade, and when the building trade in Vancouver is really slack it means more than it might do in a city which had other industries of any size or extent. Take the people out of this city who are directly or indirectly dependent for their living upon the building industry and a large hole would be made in the population. Up to now Vancouver has been practically dependent on building and real estate speculation for its main industries, and its citizens have made their living by much the same methods as taking in each others washing. The citys commercial standing is a big boom bubble blown up by money from outside sources. Land sharks have speculated in land until prices have soared far above the wealth-producing capacities of the city's industrial equipment and wealth is not being produced to balance the money invested in land. The actual land itself has no use unless there is a population of workers upon it who by their labor are producing wealth, which goes to the owners of the land. The shrewd investor knows that, but the average workman either can't see it, or will not try to. It is a curious state of things to the individual who has not sufficient knowledge of economics to know what is the matter. Carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, plumbers and other mechanics by the hundred are at their wits' end to know where they are going to get "the next payment" from on the house and lot which they have bought on the instalment plan. These men find themselves in the peculiar position of being in danger of losing house and home, not because they are not able to build them and not because they have not built enough of them, but, strangely enough, because they have built too many and the boss says they must take a lay-off for a while. Shrewd people are asking if another "panic" is due. We know from the experience of 1907 that if such is the case in the United States, then this country will be in the same box, because there is no 49th parallel of latitude between the industrial condition of Canada and the United States. The walk-over which the Democrats were permitted to have by the money kings of the states when Wilson was elected president is looked upon by some as evidence of the fact that another panic is due, and that the whole scheme has been arranged to discredit the Democratic party, which really needs no further condemnation than the fact that it is the Democratic party. Things are looking as though the workers had reached the end of the meal, except for the dessert—which will be lemons.—B. C. Federationist.

WANTS NOTHING BUT WORK.

The following advertisement and reply appeared recently in one of the Indianapolis dailies

"Wanted—Man to serve as night engineer and electrician, with such working knowledge of steamfitting, plumbing and wiring as to make repairs. Must understand boilers, stackers, pumps, engines and electric generators and board, and have some knowledge of refrigeration. Good, all-around man wanted; middle-aged preferred, who is strictly temperate and steady habits. Written recommendations required, if employed, from the present employer. Address Box ——, giving age, experience, name, address, whether married or single, and wages expected, with or without room, board and laundry, which will be given if desired. Permanent year-round position. City."

REPLY.

The appended letter was written by J. E. Twyman, a prominent member of the Stereotypers' union:

"In answer to your ad. in last night's paper, will state that I am just the man you are looking for. If there is anything I like, it is WORK. I am now making $30 per week, but would take a job for less if I could get plenty of work to do. You don't say anything about carrying out ashes, but of course you expect me to do that, together with cleaning the windows and hiring me out to the neighbors. I am now pushing freight cars up a hill at the stock yards, but it is too easy.

"You don't need to give me a room. I am not afraid of my work, and can sleep alongside of it. I never eat as long as I am thinking of work; my lanudry can be looked after while the boilers are being washed. Monkey-Wrench Bill can help me out in case of fire.

"Thanking you in advance for all the work you can give me, I am

"Yours with respect, A LOVER OF WORK."

"P. S.—You can expect me to quit during the summer months unless you can find me some work to do to take the place of shoveling snow and thawing out all the frozen pipes in the block."

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

WHEN LABORING MEN get wiser, they will put the parasites to work

IN THIS AGE of greed when the dollar is God, merit without money, finds itself in the junk-pile.

PRESIDENT MOYER returned to headquarters last week, after attending the convention of the Mining Department at Indianapolis.

THE STRIKE is still on at the Queen mine and Silver Dollar at Sheep Creek, British Columbia. All miners are urged to remain away until this strike is settled.

INDUSTRIAL UNIONISM scored a victory at Buffalo, New York, and the unionism that forced railway magnates to recognize labor does not bear the brand of I. W. W. "Nuf Ced."

VICE PRESIDENT MAHONEY who has been in Michigan for the past few months supervising the work of organization, returned to headquarters last week and reports that Michigan is being organized rapidly.

ACCORDING to the latest information based on statistics there are 4,500,000 jobless in the United States.

Prosperity must be in the hospital.

THE SECRETARY of Bisbee Miners' Union No. 106, W. F. M., desires it to be known that George Gibson has lost his card. All secretaries are requested to be on the lookout for such card.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR has almost reacheed the two million mark. If the statements made by the "I Wont Works" are true, that the A. F. L. is a scab organization and an ally of capitalism, then there are about 2,000,000 fools in the labor movement of America.

AT THIS WRITING Belgium is confronted with a strike that involves 300,000.

The strike has been declared for manhood suffrage. In other words the workers of Belgium are demanding that labor shall have an equal voice at the ballot box with the capitalist.

THE STREET CAR MEN of Buffalo, New York, have won their strike, regardless of the fact that the state militia was called out to awe and intimidate with weapons of violence and murder. The street car men were backed by organized labor of Buffalo to such an extent that every industry of that city would have been paralyzed were it not for the capitulation of the company

THE FOURTEENTH CONGRESS of the Socialists of Denmark, held at Copenhagen recently, denounced Syndicalism and declared that adhesion to a syndicalist organization is not consistent with membership in the Socialist party.

The Danish Socialists have had some experience with syndicalists and know that their propaganda is but the freakish lunacy of fanactics, suffering from intellectual barrenness or mental sterility.

WE SHALL NOW HEAR of the raft of manufacturers going to Europe, just as if there were not many of them there now. We shall have much hot air as to protecting American labor, when the importations of labor now aggregate over 12,000 per day from European countries. The Payne-Aldrich tariff has created millionaires and paupers to an extent unparalleled in history. We prate about pauper labor and pay young girls the princely sum of $4 per week. We work children of tender years in coal mines and factories and men and women long hours to show our gratitude for a protection that at best has been but a crime against toil.—Durango Democrat.

OUR INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM which is upheld by press and pulpit, has produced the "Scarlet Scourge" and every city of magnitude in the United States is infected with the moral malaria that is bred from the profit system.

Reformers in almost every city of America are becoming aroused to the social evil, but none of those reformers show any inclination to permit their vision to rest upon the cause that robs woman of her purity

War upon "red-light" districts will not abolish prostitution. Crusades against the unfortunate wretches who are inmates of dens of shame will not raise the moral standard of womanhood.

Until Capitalism is overthrown and labor is emancipated, the social evil will be here to menace the honor of that elemtn of the gentler sex, whose poverty makes life a living hell.

IT IS CLAIMED that Morgan was the head of combinations that controlled $40,000,000,000 of the industrial capital of the United States. Morgan has passed away, but the industries are in operation.

The claim that the Capitalist is needed or industries would become paralyzed; is exploded in the death of Morgan. There are millions of workingmen who are inoculated with the fallacy that without Capitalists there would be no jobs. How many jobs did Morgan take away with him when he crossed the Great Divide?

THE MERCHANTS' AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION of Los Angeles, California, permitted Ortie McManigal to enjoy a vacation, and as a result of such a permit, the professional tool of Big Business went on a fishing trip. McManigal, the Judas has loyally served a master class in its assault upon the labor movement, and for his truckling exploiters, his cell is open and he is granted a leave of absence to enjoy himself at a fishing resort.

"Equal before the law," is the most ludicrous joke of the twentieth century.

JOSEPH McDONALD who made a reputation in the Coeur d' Alenes in the early and palmy days of that famed mining district of Idaho, has been brought back from Mexico to answer the charge of murder, which crime it is alleged he committed at Treadwell, Alaska.

It is claimed that McDonald killed an evangelist, named N. C. Jones at Treadwell in May, 1902.

There are many miners throughout the Rocky Mountains and Pacific slope, who are intimately acquainted with the reputation of McDonald and few will shed tears should a jury in Alaska find him guilty.

A PIN-HEAD in a legislative body in Ohio introduced a bill providing that a commission be appointed by the Governor, clothed with the authority to prescribe the kind of attire that women shall wear.

If the immortal Jefferson could break the barriers of his tomb and breathe again the breath of life, he would certainly bow in reverence to the peerless wisdom of the Buckeye statesman, from whose mental garret came the bill, authorizing the Chief Magistrate of a state to appoint a commission to regulate the attire of women. It is no wonder there was a flood in Ohio.

ORGANIZER MARION COPE and Organizer Bunny of the Western Federation of Miners are working hard to build up the different miners' unions of the district. Organizer Bunny recently arrived from Lead, S. D., and is well versed in the manner of organizing miners' organizations. He expects to remain in the Joplin district for some time.

Another good meeting was held at Webb City, Monday night. Over three hundred applications have been received during the last sixty days for memberships in the Western Federation of Miners' locals. The locals continue to take in new members and are away behind on acting on applications.—Missouri Trades Unionist, Joplin.

F. L. ALSTROM, the Secretary of Douglas Island Miners' Union No. 109, W. F. M. in writing to headquarters, states that "the eight hour bill is having a stormy passage nd it is hard to say what it will look like before they get through with it. It passed the Senate but got badly disfigured, and now they are giving it h——l in the House."

The Secretary in his letter pays an eloquent and glowing tribute to Representative Gaffney who has been tireless in his efforts to enact laws that would give some protection to labor.

Gafney is looked upon as the ablest man in the Legislature of Alaska and he has used his ability to promote the interests of the working class.

THE SUPREME COURT of the State of Arizona has handed down some decisions that will scarcely be appreciated by Brother Capital.

Brother Capital in Arizona went into the august presence of the highest court of Arizona and asked that the miners' eight-hour law, the eight hour law for women, the full crew law for railroads, the headlight law and the three-cent fare law for railways be declared unconstitutional.

But the Supreme Court of Arizona failed to look through the same glasses as Brother Capital, and refused to use the judicial dagger on those laws that labor pushed through a legislative body. Arizona has the Recall, and this weapon of democracy will be used by the people whenever it becomes evident that a man on the bench has become blind to justice.

IN THE STREET CAR STRIKE of Buffalo, New York, the railway magnates invaded the Supreme Court of the state and asked protection. Heretofore, the courts have generally granted an injunction restraining strikers from doing anything save breathing during a conflict with employers. But Justice Brown of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, instead of granting an injunction, issued an order calling out the State Militia to do service for the street car company. When did a Justice of the Supreme Court become commander-in-chief of the armed forces of the State of New York?

It has often been said that we are living under a government by the judiciary, and the official mandate of Justice Brown, furnishes the absolute proof, which confirms the often repeated statement that the courts are the governing power. The Recall should appeal strongly to the laboring millions of the Empire state.

THE LAWRENCE STRIKE could not have been won had not the workers of America given financial support to the strikers during their fierce struggle. The financial support was furnished as follows: $60,000 by the Socialists, $18,000 by the local unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. and $7,000 by the I. W. W. The I. W. W. claims that they won the victory. What did they do? They did not furnish the money nor the publicity. It seems that their chief aid was to send a lot of cheap organizers there to help eat up what was sent in by sympathizers and then go around bragging about what "they" had accomplished. There is an old story about the old woman killing the bear and the man who had climbed a tree climbed down and said, "We did it." Not so with the I. W. W. They are not that generous. They let the Socialists and the A. F. of L. furnish the sinews of war and then they go all over the country saying that the Socialist party is a reactionary machine and the A. F. of L. is a tool of the labor exploiters and point with pride to what "the I. W. W. did at Lawrence." The serious part of it is that many of us are suckers enough to believe them. —Dallas Laborer.

THE PRINCIPAL OBJECTION raised by ministers of the gospel against Socialism is that Socialism is based on materialism.

We are inclined to believe from evidence that is convincing, that the vast majority of men who are expounders of the Scriptures, are moved by the "loaves and fishes" that come to those who occupy the pulpit.

Abolish the salaries or revenues that ease the itching palm and it can be safely assumed that the pulpits will be empty.

Take away the dollars and cents that flow into the coffers of religious institutions, and God will be neglected.

Almost everything in the world is based upon materialism, that to which our most sanctified prelates of the church object even the Lord's prayer is based on materialism, when it says: "Give us this day our daily bread."

The preachers will soon cease protesting against Socialism on account of its materialism, for they will soon discover that the workers will take but little stock in deceptive arguments that disappear before the logic of common sense.

THAT FEDERAL JUDGE Daniel Thew Wright, of the District of Columbia Supreme Court, is improperly participating in the activities of litigants in his court, is charged by the National Socialist, of Washington. Judge Wright has gained considerable notoriety for his active efforts to punish for alleged contempt President Samuel Gompers, Vice President John Mitchell and Secretary Frank Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor. The complaint against Wright is that he permitted James M. Baker and Charles A. Douglas, former counsel for the Washington Railway & Electric Co., to serve as endorsers on several notes and renewals of promisory notes held by the United States Savings Bank, a corporation of which Judge Wright was also a director and vice president, and which corporation is the subject of litigation growing out of an effort by James M. Baker, assisted by Justice Wright, to get control of the majority of the corporation's stock Baker has been named by the Democratic caucus of the Senate for secretary of the Senate. It is probable that the charges made by the Washington paper will be brought to the attention of Congress and an investigation demanded.—Cleveland Citizen.

NEARLY all the legislatures of the various states have adjourned and the lawmakers have returned to their homes. So far as the working people are concerned, they have been thrown a few crumbs and bones in compensation for the ballots they confiscated in behalf of "the friends of labor."

When these lawmakers who have returned to their constituency were making their campaign for election, they were profuse in promises to the laboring people, but promises and pledges are the means utilized by "the friends of labor" to delude the voters with callous hands. It would not be so pathetic, if the working class profited by being deluded and reached the conclusion that "the friend of labor" is more dangerous to the interests of the working class than the avowed enemy of labor who stands out in the open and fights labor in broad daylight.

"The friend of labor" wears a mask and the vast majority fail to discern the treachery of the smooth and sauve trickster who conceals his treason by being diplomatic.

The diplomats who have flim-flammed labor will be on the rostrum pleading for reelection two years hence, and labor will again send them to a Legislative body to repeat their duplicity. The few honest men of Legislative bodies who labored faithfully to render some service to the working class, will remain at home as a reward for their failure to be "friends of labor."

THE SUPREME COURT of the United States has declared the Wisconsin pure food law to be unconstitutional.

The palladium of our liberties has brought comfort and profit to the swindler and the poisoner.

Let us not be hasty in our condemnation of the august tribunal. The same court—the very same justices—decided that the white slave traffic was entitled to have placed upon it the mantle of the constitution's protection as it had protected the owner of the negro slave when the federal judiciary's chief function was to assist in the capture of fugitive slaves and preserve the "peculiar institution" from legislative encroachments.

We repeat, let us not be hasty. Judges are lawyers and lawyers are poor mortals that find their inspiration in the sepulchres of the dead. The Supreme Court could not be expected to decide in consonance with the spirit of the age in its first endeavor. It gave free license to the white slaver, but it reversed itself, after the justices heard from their wives and read the newspapers.

Give 'em time and fresh air and they'll come through all right. They are old and are hard of hearing.—Milwaukee Leader.

AN EXCHANGE, under the heading, "Babies Bought and Sold in Oakland," had the following to say editorially:

"A bill has been introduced in the Legislature of Sacramento to regulate and control the management of 'maternity hospitals' in California.

"The prostitute capitalist press is shocked at the revelations made by some of the officials of organized charity who are urging the passage of this bill. It is shown by these officials that babies are being sold to any one who wishes to buy at prices ranging from the minimum hospital charge for a confinement case to several hundred dollars, and no questions are asked of the purchaser as to the purpose so long as the price is paid. This illustrates one of the most hideous monstrosities of capitalist society.

"The false standards of morality prevailing under our present society impel women to conceal the mother instinct which has preserved the human race through all other forms of society, and hide the crowning glory of motherhood in a maternity hospital and leave their offspring in the hands of these commercial institutions to be sold to any one who will pay the hospital charges and an additional profit to the proprietor of the hospital.

"Capitalism not only dooms many new-born babes to the fate of being sold as merchandise, but it also dooms millions of larger children of tender years to be sold on the instalment plan by their helpless parents into child slavery in the mills, factories and other industrial hells that their child lives may be blighted and their labor coined into profits for the great trusts which own and operate the industrial plants where children are employed for the profit of trust magnates."

When reading the above, the subsidized press and the mortgaged preachers, should again proclaim in chorus, that "Socialism would destroy the home."

PATSY O'RANG in the Citizen of Los Angeles, paid the following tribute to the "Rip Roaring Revolution" and Joe Ettor, who was billed to speak at San Diego:

"Rip, Roaring Revolution!

"Tremendous, towering turbulence!

"Heroic, howling hell-raising!

"That's the way to begin this story about Joe Ettor, Sabotist, Syndicalist and fearless I. W .W. With a red, flowing tie, with fire in his eye and fight in his backbone, the I Wobbily-Wobbily organizer and chief candle bearer for the Put-Flies-in-the-Raisins type of social reformer is traveling the country delivering his message.

"Wherever and whenever the opportunity presents itself, the fearless and unshrinking "General" of the Army of the Rebellion, presents himself as the apostle of the philosophy that the capitalist system will be abolished if only the workers would place some molasses in Nellie's switch, smear some arsenic on Tillie's powder puff and puncture the tire of Rockefeller's machine.

"But—yes, it is sad to confess—there is a "but" in this story. A great, overwhelming, aggravating "but" must show itself.

"The fearless Ettor was scheduled to deliver a lecture on Syndicalism at San Diego—the city that made the vigilante famous and made Old Gineral Otis jealous. They sold 1,400 tickets for the great speech; a tremendous crowd was assured.

But—here's the "but"—Joe Ettor got as far as Los Angeles when he got cold feet. He was afraid to go to San Diego because of the possibility of police interference, so he sent a telegram that read like this:

" 'Fellow Workers: Call off my meeting in San Diego for I understand the police are liable to break up the meeting.' "

"And so, the Sabotist and Syndicalist didn't show up at San Diego. Thus goes the sad story of this hero of the Social Revolution."

THE FOLLOWING is taken from the Irish Review and needs no editorial comment:

"At the urgent request of President Taft, Father Vaughn, a Catholic priest in England, remarkable for his oratorical powers, came to this country last year to fight the spread of Socialism among Catholic workingmen. The good priest's mission was a complete failure. Every anti-Socialist lecture given by him was a defense of the money power and the prevailing iniquitous economic system fathered by Wall street and protected by the powers that be. We observed that in every city visited by Father Vaughn on his lecturing tour the Socialist vote more than doubled itself at the November election, a fact that speaks volumes for the priest's "persuasive powers" to hold labor under the galling lash of tyranny. The number of American Catholics who have joined the ranks of the noble Debs, of Berger, of Seidel of our own Rudolph Pfeiffer, is so large as to cause alarm and anxiety among the Catholic hierarchy. Despite the fact that Socialism is denounced from the pulpit of every diocese in America under the control of the Catholic church, yet the church is unable to check her children from recognizing the humane desirable tenets embodied in the Socialist doctrine.

"The Roman Catholic and Protestant human policies, unified, would be unable to eradicate Socialism from the United States. They might as well attempt to make the sun rise in the west instead of the east, to raise the Titanic from its grave in the Atlantic ocean by means of an ordinary derrick, to correctly count the grains of sand on the various sea shores. Any or all of the foregoing human impossibilities could be accomplished more easily than the crushing of Socialism in this country. The Socialist party is waging no war against the Catholic church, but it is waging an honorable fight to free millions of Catholic and Protestant wage earners from the bonds of slavery, placed about their limbs by heartless capitalists who know the average preacher's ethics are dollar-marked and that his high endorsement of their swindling can be purchased by an occasional liberal contribution.

AN EXCHANGE paints the following picture of the detractor: "He works in the dark. God's sunshine never penetrates the atmosphere of his machinations. He shuns the light with as much aversion as a white slaver shuns publicity.

"He feeds prejudice, nurtures jealousy and breathes poison into the ears of the unthinking and gullible. From his depraved mind emanates the slander that slurs the motive and sears the soul of those who are endeavoring to make the world better. His warped mental apparatus precludes broadness and makes him measure others by his own standard. Suspicion hatches in his cerebral cavity like flies on a scavenger dump.

"He rends the home, obliterates affection, and robs the child of parental love—its natural heritage. Through his treacherous slander impulsive men take the gun route and weak women find solace in carbolic. He resurrects the corpse of yesterday and hurls it into the path of tomorrow. Devoid of conscience, he assails character as ruthlessly as a holdup man robs his victim.

"He infests every group of society. Honor and truth are words foreign to his vocabulary. No woman is true to her trust or man decent, according to his distorted imagination. In garden of roses he sees only the thorns and transforms it into a thistle path.

"In a labor union his prey is the earnest men who are active in the cause. No officer is honest in the mind of the detractor; no motive good. Graft is his whisper to the inexperienced, and graft is re-echoed with mechanical precision from mouths governed by phonographic craniums."

The above protrait of the detractor is couched in strong and vigorous language, and yet, the language used is reasonably mild when applied to the soulless creature who coolly and deliberately conspires to wreck the character of another. The detractor does not know the meaning of the word honor and never felt the slightest respect for truth. The detractor is conscienceless and has no character that can be injured. The detractor is the foulest and most debauched creature in human shape, and when discovered as the unclean thing that he is, should be shunned as a leper.

A SHORT TIME AGO a number of labor publications announced the acquittal of "Mother" Jones and some of the strikers who were held for trial by the military authorities of West Virginia. But it seems that "Mother" Jones is still held by the soldiers who have become the hirelings of the coal corporations. The following in the editorial columns of the Cleveland Citizen shows that "the Angel of the Miners" is still an inmate of the military bull-pen.

"Mother Jones is still incarcerated in West Virginia, near Charleston, and heavily guarded by soldiers, although she has passed 80 years and would hardly be able to escape even if she attempted it, which is highly improbable. No newspaper reporters are permitted to see her and there is an opinion growing that at least one big press association has adopted a policy of suppressing all information regarding strike conditions in West Virginia. Mother Jones declares, in letters to union officials, that she does not intend to retire from the West Virginia strike no matter what brutal methods are employed by the mine owners and their political lapdogs to force her to quit. It is an infamous condition that prevails in West Virginia, where a white-haired old woman languishes in prison with charges of murder, treason and other crimes hanging over her head, and for no other reason than that she dared to fight the plutocratic cannibals of that state for the right of the workers to organize and to be treated like human beings. And it will be noted that those distinguished saviors of society, Woodrow Wilson, W. J. Bryan and other talksmiths at Washington, are deaf, dumb and blind regarding the foul conditions that stink to high heaven in West Virginia."

When giant combinations such as the coal corporations of West Virginia, insist that a woman eighty years of age shall be held on the framed-up charges of murder and treason, it shows conclusively that capitalism is far more cowardly than a yellow dog, and that in the calloused soul of the money power there is less mercy than in the heart of a hyena.

Woodrow Wilson and the "Peerless Billy of the Platte" will not permit their vision to scan the Russianized domain of West Virginia. To raise their voice for human freedom or to demand that justice shall prevail, would be offensive to the dollar, and the dollar is still God at Washington.

Capitalizing the Death-Rattle

A COMPANY has just been organized for the avowed purpose of exploiting the terrible "white scourge," tuberculosis. The germ-laden nickel, wrenched from the trembling fingers of those afar down the path to the Valley of the Shadow of Death is none the less sweet to the profit-mongers on that account.

What if it does mean added privations to those already sore-pressed? What if it does mean the precious bread and the blessed milk, torn from the lips of the suffering? What if it does mean death to the populace in companies, regiments and brigades? Does it not mean PROFITS also?

According to the capitalist newspapers, who hide the naked truth as best they can, lest an outraged working class rise in their might and wreck its vengeance on these vultures, "a syndicate has been formed for the purpose of buying up the rights to the serum for the treatment of tuberculosis, discovered by Dr. Friedmann. It is proposed to give free treatment to those who cannot afford to pay for it!"

And thus the ghouls of capitalism would hide their purpose, as usual when it is unusually base, under the hypocritical cloak of "charity."

The working class knows what it means, this ghastly joke about "free treatment for those who cannot afford to pay for it." It means the same thing as "free" anything else to those who cannot afford to pay, pay into the yawning depths of the capitalist strong-box! It means the same thing as the twaddle about the Salvation Army's "free" Christmas dinner, simply advertising the business!

Whether Dr. Friedmann has truly discovered a serum which will save society from this awful scourge, we know not; but we do not hesitate to say that the capitalization of his claims offers another golden opportunity to squeeze still further the wretched victims of capitalist mismanagement which has made every American city a breeding place for tuberculosis germs.

Already, patent medicine fakirs are fattening by the score upon the quivering bodies of these hundreds of thousands of helpless gasping creatures, aggravating their agonies a thousand fold with their seductive siren song: "A cure, a cure,—pay, pay, pay!" The dread hectic faces of the despairing meet our eyes in every path and by-way. We know that there is no hope for them, save in the overthrow of capitalism, and yet we let precious days pass by without spurring our fellow-workers to unite; we waste our golden moments when with our friends in bootless gossip of this and that, when the only message worth while is still to some unsaid, "Workers of the world unite. You have nothing to lose but your chains."

And in the meantime, capitalism hurls into our teeth the taunt that it may capitalize the very dying gasp of those of our class whom it has robbed of health.—Buffalo Socialist.

A Line on Him

WE COPY the following from our valuable contemporary, the Miners' Magazine, official organ of the Western Federation of Miners:

"A reader of the Miners' Magazine residing at Belleville, Ill., has written us a letter, in which he makes the statement that Peter Collins delivered a lecture in Belleville against Socialism recently and in the course of his remarks declared that the Western Federation of Miners had scabbed on the United Mine Workers whenever and wherever the opportunity presented itself.

"For the benefit of the reader of the Magazine who has written us this letter setting forth this charge made by Peter Collins, we must use the ugly word so often uttered by our friend Theodore, and brand Peter, the lickspittle and puppet of capitalism, as a brazen and shameless liar.

"The Western Federation of Miners and the United Mine Workers have amalgamated into a mining department, and if the W. F. of M. scabbed on the U. M. W. of A., it is not probable that these two organizations would be found welded together through a mining department.

"Such lies as Collins indulges in are, however, typical of prostitutes who sell themselves to prolong the reign of a hellish system that enslaves humanity."

We wish to add our testimony to the above, that not only has the Western Federation of Miners not scabbed on us, but that we have received valuable assistance from its membership, moral and financial, and from its officials, in times of stress.

Nevertheless, we wish to thank Mr. Collins for making this palpably untruthful statement. By doing so he has given the membership of the two organizations a hint as to his true mission on the lecture platform. Evidently, it is to cause suspicion and division in the ranks of the working class.

No doubt, if addressing an audience of metal miners, he would make the same assertion against our people.

All we need ask ourselves then is, "Who would be benefited by division in the ranks of the workers?" and we can get an idea as to who is furnishing this alleged trade unionist with the necessary funds to carry on his destructive campaign.

The United Mine Workers are proud to be associated with the splendid body of alert, militant, able union men who comprise the Western Federation of Miners, and will keep a suspicious eye on any fakir who attempts to create dissension between the two sister organizations.—United Mine Workers' Journal.

Forcible Feeding vs. Enforced Starvation

IF THERE IS ONE THING more than another that brings out to the full the folly, insanity and brutality of our present industrial and political system, it is the question of the forcible feeding of the "suffragettes" in prison, which are now agitating England.

There are some 12,000,000 people in the country, men, women and children, who live in a state of chronic hunger, who hardly ever know what it is to be comfortably fed, and who suffer all sorts of disease and physical injury and deterioration merely from lack of regular and sufficient food, just as the suffragettes' health is injured by having food forced upon them. There has been no speculation as to the views of these hungry 12,000,000 on forcible feeding, or how it appears to them. They do not constitute "public opinion" in the tight little island, and what they think, if they think at all, is a matter of no consequence, though it is certain that feeding of any kind would have no great terror for them.

The situation reduces itself to this ludicrous position. The law says that certain people who can eat and won't eat should be made to eat, by force if necessary, and other certain people who can eat and will eat, should not be allowed to eat, and should be prevented from eating, by force if necessary.

The starving man who steals a loaf to appease his hunger is as much a criminal as the suffragette whose jaws have to be pried open and food poured into her stomach through a rubber tube. If he, inside the jail, went on a "hunger strike," he, too, would be forcibly fed. That is to say, when he displays willingness to eat outside the jail, and will even steal food to prove his sincerity, he is a criminal that must be prevented from eating, and when he displays unwillingness to eat inside the jail, he also becomes a criminal who must be prevented from starving. To eat, or not to eat, that is the question, and under certain circumstances both acts become crimes.

From which the conclusion is apparent that those who want to eat should go to jail, as they will be permitted to starve themselves outside, while those who don't want to eat should stay out of jail, as they will not be permitted to starve themselves inside.

It is a matter of regret that the 12,000,000 hungry ones cannot analyze the situation in this manner. If they could, and acted upon it by "throwing themselves on the rates," as George Bernard Shaw once suggested they would settle a whole series of "social problems" much more intricate and important perhaps, than woman suffrage. But the masses lack imagination in these matters, and cannot easily picture to themselves what would happen to the entire system if the millions of them insisted upon being legally and regularly fed and housed at the expense of the propertied classes, either in the jails or workhouses or both. They would give no trouble about the question of feeding, and the use of force would not be necessary. The trouble would come in another form, a matter for the propertied classes to worry over.

The pride of the hungry worker, however, is the salvation of the full-fed capitalist. It prevents him from voluntarily entering the workhouse or jail, and also prevents him from figuring out the results if he and the rest of the hungry millions stormed those institutions en masse clamoring for admission and insisting on being housed and fed. It is unfortunate, surely, that chronic hunger weakens the mental as well as the bodily functions, or there would certainly be something doing in England much more serious than is involved in the question of forcibly feeding a handful of determined woman suffragists.

Forcible feeding, to be sure, is brutal, irrational and in every way reprehensible, but not one whit more so than enforced starvation. If it, however, in any tends to bring up the latter question and exposes the utter insanity and irrationality of the system, which finds both necessary, it may be considered as a factor in social progress not altogether confined to merely securing "votes for women," important as that may be, for the question of food, no matter in what aspect it may be presented, is much more fundamental and strikes more directly at basic causes in our industrial system.—New York Call.

A Far Reaching Decision

THE CHIEF JUSTICE of the Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals, Judge Henry M. Furman, has just rendered a decision in which the action of the lower court in quashing indictments against prominent citizens who had violated the State anti-trust laws is reversed. The opinion of Judge Furman clears the way to prosecute violators of the State anti-trust laws. The Oklahoma anti-trust laws exempt labor unions from the operation of these laws, and, according to the opinion rendered, this fact does not invalidate the laws. This has been the contention of the American Federation of Labor, and it will be recalled that former President Taft, in the closing hours of his administration, vetoed the sundry civil service bill because it was provided in that measure that the money appropriated to prosecute illegal combinations in restraint of trade should not be used to harass and prosecute labor unions. Judge Furman was one of the foremost criminal lawyers of the South, having formerly lived in Texas, also having practiced in Colorado. His reputation as a lawyer and a judge is of the highest, and, therefore, the opinion just rendered has a significance out of the ordinary. The opinion follows:

"To sustain the contentions of counsel for the appellees," said Judge Furman, "would be in effect to decide that in the State of Oklahoma trusts and monopolies are practically above and superior to the law and that they may at their pleasure, through their combinations and conspirators, grind the people like grain beneath the upper and nether stones, take from the mouth of labor the bread which it has earned, and divert the stream of wealth it has produced by hard and honest toil from its rightful channels and pour it into the undeserved and already overflowing coffers of the few.

General Definitions.

"It would doubtless have been very gratifying to those persons engaged in such unlawful undertakings if the Legislature had attempted to give fixed definitions of trusts and monopolies, for then their able attorneys could point out how the same purposes could be accomplished by a slight variation in the methods used, and thereby, they could do as they wished and escape the penalty of the law prescribed for a violation of the fixed definitions.

"If a fixed definition of a trust and of a monopoly had been given, then they would have so shaped their business as to place it outside of this fixed definition, and under their favorite doctrine of a strict construction of penal statutes, they would have been allowed to defy the law and rob the people at pleasure. The only way in which they can be reached is by general definitions and the doctrines of a liberal construction of penal statutes, and that is just what we have in Oklahoma, hence the law is going to be enforced and those gentlemen must either abstain from their illegal conduct or suffer the consequences. We think that the definitions contained in the statutes are as certain as the nature of the evils at which they are aimed will admit.

Capital and Labor.

"If all the capital in the world were destroyed, a great injury would thereby be inflicted upon the entire human race, but the bright minds, the brave hearts and strong arms of labor would in time create new capital, and thus the injury would be ultimately cured. If all of the labor on earth were destroyed capital would lose its value and become absolutely worthless.

"Labor is natural, capital is artificial. Labor was made by God, capital is made by man. Labor is not only blood and bone, but it also has a mind and a soul and is animated by sympathy, hope and love. Capital is inanimate, soulless matter. Labor is the creator, capital is the creation.

"A single drop of sweat upon the brow of honest labor shines more brightly and is more precious in the eyes of God and is of more benefit to the human race than all the diamonds that ever sparkled in the crown of any king. If the State did not protect the farmers of Oklahoma against such conspirators as these, the law would be a miserable, contemptible farce, a snare, a mockery, a burden, and a delusion.

"The contention of counsel for appellees is that if the law protects combinations of labor or of any class of citizens of the State, it must also protect combinations of capital, otherwise a class of citizens who are not afforded this protection are discriminated against, and deprived of that equal protection of the law which the constitution of the United States guarantees to every citizen of the United States. A careful consideration of this matter will show that the contention of counsel for appellees is not tenable. It must be conceded that the Legislature has the right and power to make reasonable classifications with reference to any proper subject of legislation.

"The assumption of counsel for appellees is that the rights of capital are equal to the rights of labor. Good morals do not sustain this assumption. While labor and capital are both entitled to the protection of the law it is not true that the abstract rights of capital are equal to those of labor and that they both stand upon an equal footing before the law. But if we concede that the assumption of counsel for appellees is well founded, and if we arbitrarily and in disregard of good morals place capital and labor upon an absolute equality before the law, another difficulty confronts them. Capital organizes to accomplish its purposes. Then, according to their own logic, it would be a denial of equal rights to labor to deny to it the right to organize and not without a breach of the peace, to meet the aggression of capital."

A CORRECTION.

Phoenix, Ariz., April 15, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

Having just seen an issue of the Magazine wherein you gave the record of the anti-injunction law that finally passed both the House and the Senate, willl say, that the report that you received from the Daily Record of Globe is not correct. The correct record of the bill is, it passed the Senate with one dissenting vote, Senator Pace of Graham county, voting in the negative. You will find herewith the vote by which it passed the House, taken from the galley of march 27th.

I am writing you this so that those who supported the bill in the House may not be misquoted. If you wish to publish the corrected vote in the latter issue you may do so.

So far we have done fairly well for our class in this Legislature, and were, I consider, fortunate, in having a man revise the code who, to say the least, was in sympathy with us. It was mainly due to the efforts of the Code Commissioner that inserted the anti-injunction measure in the code, because I am sure it would not have passed had it been a separate bill.

I sent you a copy of the Arizona Democrat this morning, so that you would realize the result of his effort.

Hoping to hear from you, any old time, I remain, yours fraternally,

J. TOM LEWIS,

The following is the vote as corrected by J. Tom Lewis:

Ayes: Babbitt, Ball, Bradner, Brooks, Cocke, Craig, Crofoot, Ellis, Graham, Hall, Irvine, Jacobson, Johnson, Jones, Kelton, Kerr, Lewis, Lynch, Moore of Yavapai, Murphy, Saxon, Whipple, Wren and Mr. Speaker—24.

Nays: Buchanan, Curry, Duncan, Gonzales, Kane, Maddock, Mattox and Moore of Pima—8.

Absent: Jacobs—1.

BOSSED BY BIG BUSINESS.

Morgan Did Not Go to Heaven, Says Rector.

The Denver Daily Post of April 7th contained the following special:

Philadelphia, April 7.—Dr. George Chalmers Richmond, in a sermon on "Christian Standards in Life," at St. John's Episcopal church, declared yesterday that J. Pierpont Morgan has not gone to heaven. Dr. Richmond said, in part:

"Mr. Morgan was a great financier, but not a great man. We shall never see a man just like him in our American life, and we ought to be glad of it. His death is providential in many ways.

"The wreck of the Titanic came with God's knowledge. The floods and tornadoes of the West are of God's intent, and we must learn the lessons involved. So God knew just when to take Mr. Morgan out of this present world and send him on into another state of existence.

Didn't Go to Heaven.

"Mr. Morgan has not gone to heaven, for there is no such place as heaven. He would be very unhappy up among the angels, with all his art treasures down here. Our old idea of heaven has gone, never to return. Mr. Morgan is now beginning a new life in a new world—perhaps in this other world he is a common day laborer. He will now see that God is of more importance than cash.

"He didn't lift his hand to help the American workingman. He helped to keep prices up. He was never in favor of higher wages for the man who toiled on his railroads. He helped to foment strikes by his lack of vital interest in the men who sweat for his money.

Money Controls Church.

"In the Episcopal church Mr. Morgan controlled our house of bishops. For years he has prevented our church from declaring her position on the great social and industrial problems of our age, so that the Episcopal church is at the fag end of things. Our church will never progress till about twenty-five rich corporation officers and retired financiers and aristocratic gentlemen who at present control our church go to join Mr. Morgan up above the skies. The sooner they go the better."

Now, Mr. Editor, I rise to inquire if these preachers of the present day keep on knocking the old religious beliefs, what are we aged Christians going to do? It looks like we might have to take to the woods. Here is a distinguished Episcopal doctor of divinity, who says God sent the late floods and tornadoes, that the old heaven has been abolished, that the late J. Pierpont Morgan is somewhere now in the spirit world learning a trade. Maybe he is a section hand on a spirit railroad, or carrying brick and mortar to build a mansion in the skies, or shoveling coal in the furnaces in the basement. Bishop Richmond boldly declares that it would be better for his church if about twenty-five aristocratic members should join Brother Morgan, and "the sooner the better."

Well! Well! Well! God sinking ships with sixteen hundred passengers of men, women and children, sending destructive floods and tornadoes, took Brother Morgan away and put him to work; old-style heaven gone, a big bunch of aristocratic Christians ought to be taken and set to work—all this from a distinguished clergyman. "Surely the world do move."

CONFESSIONS OF A DRONE.

Joseph Medill Patterson Tells the Truth About the Rich Man's Value to Society.

The Independent has asked me for a short economic autobiography I comply on the understanding that I am talking about myself the type of the idle rich young man, not myself the individual.

I have an income of between ten and twenty thousand dollars a year. I spend all of it. I produce nothing—am doing no work. I (the type) can keep on doing this all my life unless the present social system is changed.

My income doesn't descend upon me like manna from heaven. It can be traced. Some of it comes from the profits of a daily newspaper; some of it from Chicago real estate; some from the profits made by the Pennsylvania and other railroads; some from the profits of the United States Steel Corporation; some from the profits of the American Tobacco Company.

As to the Chicago real estate, I didn't put it there. Some of it I have never seen. It came into possession of my family some years ago, when it was cheaper. People came to Chicago to work, and in proportion as their numbers increased the value of this real estate rose automatically. The people who came to Chicago to work caused the increase in value—but I get the benefit of it. There are people who are willing to work on this land. I am not willing to do so. Thus we arrange that they shall work there and pay me an annual tribute for my permission.

I know nothing whatever about railroads, except how to read a timetable and to bless heaven for the eighteen-hour train. Yet I get an annual income from railroads.

I have never been inside a steel mill, and I know about tobacco only as a consumer. Yet the makers and users of steel and tobacco send me their little checks twice a year. I never have to dun them.

The work of the working people, and nothing else, produces the wealth which by some hocus-pocus arrangement is transferred to me, leaving them bare. While they support me in splendid style, what do I do for them? Let the candid upholder of the present order answer, for I am not aware of doing anything for them. And the funny thing about it is that these workingmen and farmers work hard all year around, while I don't work at all.

I have better food, better clothes and a better house than the workers who supply me with money to spend. I can travel oftener, to more interesting places, on faster trains and in more comfortable steamship cabins. I have horses to ride and drive, domestic servants to minister to my wants, the best physicians in case of sickness.

That my life is so much completer than the lives of the workers who support me has been excused on the ground that they are less "cultivated" and therefore less fitted to enjoy things which please me. But that seems a little like begging the question. Many of them are not as well educated, because they had to go to work as boys in the fields, the glass factories, the mines, the mills, while I was pursuing my leisurely, gentlemanly way through boarding school and university. I don't think it was entirely natural aptitude that marked me out for a university education, since I remember that frequently I had to pay money to tutors to drill into my head information of a remarkably simple character. I was fond of a good time—and that I had. Of course it took money, which was obligingly supplied, via my family by the pressmen, the switchmen, the cigaretts girls, the rolling-mill men, etc. . . . As a reporter on a newspaper I was a worker; as a member of a stock-holding family I was an idler.

If a man produces $2,000 worth of wealth a year and consumes $10,000 worth a year, he is overpaid. If he is overpaid some must be underpaid.

Socialism urges the underpaid to unite and insist on receiving the full amount of the wealth they produce.

THE MAGNANIMITY OF SOME TRUSTS—FROM A BULL MOOSER'S STANDPOINT.

By Burke McCarty.

I would call the attention of all the near-Socialists and other hopeful reformers who fell for the rosy promises held out by the Bull Moose and his party to get-quick-reforms by voting the Progressive ticket, to the Munsey Magazine for February, which features an article by Frank Munsey, entitled, "A Possible Scheme for Amalgamating the Progressive and Republican Parties, That Should Be Acceptable to Each."

That ought to hold you for a while. After perusal of this overture from one of Mr. Roosevelt's political and financial backers, kindly turn to page 800 in same issue to the editorial, "Monopoly—Some of Its Other Aspects."

The mental attitude toward the working class by the Bull Moosers and all other so-called "Progressives" is reflected in this little editorial like polished steel.

The value of the article lies in the unconscious admissions which it contains.

It reveals the true mission and utility of the "Welfare" committees and other parings of capitalism.

It clearly marks the class distinctions and gives a glimpse of what is to be accomplished by working class solidarity on the political and industrial fields.

It tells of a poor misunderstood and downtrodden trust down in New Jersey that had announced recently that upon the recommendation of its Welfare committee it had established a minimum wage for its women employés of $9 per week!

This, the writer apologetically admits, may not seem a princely sum, "but an enormous number of women work for less"!

The directors of this poor, berated trust named $9 for the minimum, we are assured, because they found upon investigation that it was the "lowest wage upon which a woman could support herself in decent comfort."

Here we see a good trust deliberately employing a group of men (paradoxically dubbed "A Welfare Committee") hired to find out what, from their standpoint, is the lowest possible figure that a working woman can live on.

What would happen, do you suppose, if Woodrow Wilson's wife and daughters or the "Princess" Alice were condemned to live on $9 a week in decent comfort?

Now how absurd! How could Mrs. Longworth be expected to make $9 per week cover such comforts as Turkish cigarettes and two pet monkeys? Perish the thought!

Then the writer of the editorial gurgles on and tells us about what has been done by other perfectly lovely trusts.

One voted a general increase of $5,000,000 a year to its "lower grade" employés; but the writer carelessly omitted to state the number of the workers it was to be divided among.

Another trust has established a pension for its employés, but again the article does not tell us how much the toilers themselves were taxed for this pension.

Then the Munsey quill-pusher closes by trying to make us believe that these specific trusts at least have made "important voluntary concessions" and that their managers were "imbued with a realization of their liability to public sentiment that makes them anxious to be well thought of." Isn't that a scream!

As a matter of fact we know the rapid organization and solidarity of the workers on the industrial field, coupled with their gigantic battering ram—the Socialist press and the resultant marvelous increase of the Socialist party vote all over the country—these are things which are compelling the trusts' "Nursie" to hand out pacifiers, soothing syrup and other substitutes for the real thing.

And to sum it all up, here we have millionaire Munsey, the owner of the biggest string of capitalistic papers in the United States (barring, of course, Wandering Willie Hearst's), this same capitalist Munsey, who was the major domo of the Bull Moose convention and who, together with Perkins, Wall Street cadet, and Harvester Trust McCormick, footed the bills of the Chicago Progressive roundup. This Munsey, I say, is the same Munsey who has taken it upon himself to advance a scheme to "reunite" the Republican and Progressive parties (as if they were ever really divided) and to reunite them on the basis of these "voluntary concessions."

Kindly notice that the basis on which they are to unite is "good" trusts! You remember that is a real Rooseveltian coinage—"good trusts!" It is a revelation of the real views and purposes of these slightly progressive gentlemen.

Of course, it is foolish to get peeved about Munsey's scheme. If Mr. Munsey of the newspaper trust, Perkins of the money trust and McCormick of the harvester trust see fit to pay the piper, they certainly have a right to call the tune; and if it wasn't for about one million of hard-headed Socialists who weren't afraid of "throwing our votes away"—you fellows wouldn't even have any soothing syrup or pacifiers given you! See?

THE PERSECUTION OF MOTHER JONES.

Creston, Iowa, April 11, 1913.

Mother Mary Jones, in Jail at Charleston, West Virginia:

Dear Mother Jones—Notwithstanding I am a hopeless invalid and have to be propped up in bed to write this, yet I have summoned strength enough to enclose an article given below, which I hope may reach you, and to say, all hail to you, the steadfast opponent of tyranny and injustice and the life-long friend and defender of the homeless, the friendless, the poor! Scores of thousands are now sending you loving thoughts and millions will bless you in years to come. You will yet be honored all over the world as you are now honored and beloved in all parts of America. Future historians will write of your great services and unselfish devotion to the poor, and generations not yet born will read of you as one of the good and heroic souls of this age of greed, injustice and brutality.

I send you my congratulations and blessings, and my prayer is that you may be sustained by divine and angelic powers to continue for many years in the unselfish, heroic and sorely-needed work for the upliftment and betterment of the submerged, exploited men, women and children of this savage, transitional capitalistic age.

Your admiring comrade and "boy," R. A. DAGUE.

Treatment of Mother Jones—Hon. R. A. Dague, Who Knows Her Well, Writes of Defense of the Gray-Haired Women—Her Brutal Treatment—Being Tried in a Military Court Without a Jury. This Old Lady Fights for Her Life.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

I was glad to read in your paper on the 4th, inst., a denunciation of the infamous treatment of Mother Jones recently in West Virginia for being found counseling with the half-starved coal miners of that state now on a strike and making speeches to them. She is guilty of no offense except a motherly sympathy for those slaves, and yet the coal barons had her arrested, thrown into jail, denied her a trial in the state courts, and dragged her into what they called their military court and treated her as though she were a desperate criminal. Mother Jones is known and beloved from ocean to ocean for her unselfish devotion to the poor. She is 80 years old; her hair is white as snow; she is gentle, refined, intellectual and tender-hearted. Tens of thousands of miners call her "mother" and she calls them "her boys." Forty or more years of her later life have been devoted to visiting the poor miners, and like a good angel that she is, nursing their sick, burying their dead, ministering to them, counseling them, mourning with them, and dividing her last dollar with them.

Ten years ago I knew her personally. I have sat in one of the largest auditoriums in San Francisco crowded to the doors, and listened to this grand old woman tell of the sufferings of the poor miners. Gently, modestly and yet sometimes energetically and with thrilling eloquence the silver-white-haired old grandmother portrayed the awful conditions under which the white slaves of West Virginia were compelled to work by the brutal owners of those coal mines. I saw strong men shed tears at her recital of those wrongs, and I am not ashamed to say that I too sobbed like a baby.

And this is the same dear old gentle soul, who, ten years later, is dragged into a trumped up military court, so they might imprison her by a court martial in which she would be deprived of a jury trial in a civil court. The dispatches say she was so shocked at the brutal treatment that she fainted several times and had to be carried from the room.

Emma F. Langdon, in a late issue of the "St. Louis Labor," says the Associated Press have carefully suppressed accounts of the infamous treatment of this old friend of the oppressed. She says:

> Mother Jones has stood in the vanguard for forty years; her labors have covered a continent and reached every class of workers. Her speech is a summons to action. Patience with wrong is a crime with her. She can "touch the hearts of men as the storm god touches the ocean's keys." No sorrow of humanity is alien to her.
> The labor press has spoken of her as the "the Angel of the Miners." She is all of that and more—the workers' refuge and inspiration. "Mother" is the cry when, overawed by corporation hirelings, they seek to join hands in a common struggle, and again when the troops, re-enforced by hunger, are beating them into earth.
> The exploiters of the poor and helpless fear and hate her as no other one individual, and well they may. I am sure they would murder her—would have done so years ago—if they had dared. Well, they may be afraid; it is true they dare most anything to keep the workers in servitude, but even yet there are some things they dare not do, and one of them is murder Mother Jones. If Americans have any of the spirit of their forefathers, blood will flow freely if they dare harm a hair of her head! Woe be unto the "blue-bloods" of the proud state of West Virginia if any harm comes to this snow-crowned "Mother" of the poor!

Mr. Editor: Knowing Mother Jones personally, being well informed of her grand work for humanity, hearing of the outrageous treatment she has received, my heart throbs in profound sympathy for the grand old soul, and I have a struggle with my better nature to keep me from uttering bitter maledictions upon the brutal men who are thus inhumanly treating her. I know, however, that the fierce age of competition—"the system"—is the cause of brutalizing men. In a later and kindlier age of the world historians will place the name of "Mother" Mary Jones at the very top of the list of earth's best and greatest women.

A little more than half a century ago the rich and powerful of Virginia choked to death on a scaffold a white-haired old man because he opposed negro slavery. A great war ensued that cost a million of lives and destruction of billions of property, and the wiping out of a system of industry that brutalized the men who murdered the old man. Today John Brown's soul goes marching on. He is one of the world's honored martyrs, while the names of his murderers have been forgotten, or if remembered, are despised—execrated. Will now the rich and powerful of West Virginia repeat history by killing kind-hearted, white-haired old Grandmother Jones because she has opposed white slavery?

We shall see.

REPORT FROM JAMES CUTHBERTSON.

To the Officers and Members of District Association, No. 6, W. F. M.

Brothers:—

As delegate to the third annual convention of the B. C. Provincial Federation of Labor, held at Victoria, B. C., herewith submit my report.

The convention was called to order on Monday, January 13th, 1913, at 10 a. m., by Delegate Sheen, president of Victoria Trades and Labor Council, who, after addressing a few words of welcome to the delegates, 78 in number, handed the gavel to President J. W. Wilkinson. President Wilkinson's report followed, and it proved an interesting one, laden with food for thought on the problems confronting organized labor in this province.

Of all the matters touched upon the president's report, perhaps the most vital is the attitude shown by the present government towards the needs and requirements of labor, as presented by the B. C. P. of Labor convention last year. A commission has been appointed by the government to go over the province for the alleged purpose of inquiring into the needs of labor. I fail to see the necessity of such a step in view of the fact that labor brings its needs from all parts of the province and presents them to the government from year to year. This action on the part of the government would indicate either that they do not credit us with intelligence enough to know our requirements or, that it is a graceful way of side-stepping the whole matter and at the same time giving fat jobs to a few friends; if the latter be true, then the wage workers must cease voting for those who when in office take no notice of said wage workers or their interests. The question of united political action for the workers is, unfortunately, one on which we are somewhat divided at present, but we have reached the stage in the organized labor movement when we must unite on the political field; then and not until then, shall we get what we are now demanding. And, there is need of much legislation for the protection of the workers; the maimed and crippled victims of industrial life point out this need. If we have the welfare of these men at heart we must elect men of our own class to the law making bodies.

Mr. J. H. Wallace addressed the convention as a fraternal delegate from the Washington State Federation of Labor. He explained the workings of the Washington insurance act, which is one of the best in the world. Under this act the injured workers receive as compensation the sum of $700, where $100 previous to the act coming into force was received, and the state federation is now demanding legislation to make the industries pay for the hospital and medical treatment of all wage workers of the state. This should be of interest to the wage workers of British Columbia, as our present compensation act is altogether inadequate in providing for the wants of the dependants of the deceased, with the result that homes are broken up perhaps never to be reunited. Th greatest benefit is received indirectly by the workers as the act encourages the companies to be more careful with the lives of their workmen. Taking into consideration the deficiencies of the present act, it is my opinion, that we should try for a new act similar to the Washington state act, rather than seek to patch up our old one.

An important step taken by the convention was to secure a one-half interest in the B. C. Federationist. This paper has been fighting our battles and expressing our political views and it was considered only right that we should give it all the support possible, which was done by shouldering one-half of its burdens.

Mr. Parker Williams addressed the convention, and it was indeed refreshing to listen to him. British Columbia, he says, is dominated by a certain financial group who are more greedy that a horse leech, and more hungry than the devil; and yet the majority of workers line up an election day with such sharks. Is it any wonder that the premier takes no notice of our resolutions?

About one hundred resolutions were brought before the convention, all of which were given space in the Federationist; all of the resolutions forwarded from District No. 6, were passed and those calling for provincial legislation were presented to the premier.

President Wilkinson and Vice Presidents McVety, Grant and Pettipiece refused to stand for re-election. This is much to be regretted as we have no more able men than these in the labor movement.

The new officers are:

President, C. Sivertz, Victoria, B. C.; Sec-Treas., V. R. Midgley, Victoria.

Vice Presidents: J. Kavanaugh, Vancouver; J. J. Taylor, Ladysmith; J. Gray, Fernie; Ferris and Burns, Victoria; A. Watchman, Vancouver, J. Cuthbertson, Greenwood.

The Unionists of the coast are pretty well satisfied that the miners of the interior form the backbone of the B. C. Provincial Federation of Labor at the present time.

A strong and determined effort should be made to have the railroad workers affiliate with the federation, particularly in view of the fact that their support would lend much weight to any efforts made to secure a new insurance for the benefit of all workers in the province. Only through the united efforts of the workers can we accomplish that which we are aiming for—the right of the worker to the full product of his toil.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES CUTHBERTSON.

PHOSSY JAW.

Agnes Thecla Fair.

Working girls get this terrible disease who work in match factories. Ever see a case of phossy jaw? If not, why not. It's your sisters who get it in Rockefeller's Diamond match factory at Chico, California, and to get a job and a terrible disease girls are recruited from the ranks of toilers.

No, Beva Rockefeller does not work in her father's factory; she is busy at Sunday school teaching the young to be good slaves, that father can be three times more a billionaire.

No, Should Grow Wilson is not going to stop phossy jaw spreading among the daughters of workingmen. It's up to you.

That you may think phossy jaw is not contagious, remember, a sack of pus is drawn from the jaw or breast of the girl affected and leaves her a cripple for life, as some bones must be removed also, lest the entire body rot away; and this for the princely wage of 90 cents a day.

Life for us female wage slaves is a serious proposition; but we must have cheap matches and cheap labor. By all means, let's have cheap labor sings California.

Phosphorus is one of the most deadly poisons known, and no one can work in this industry without getting blood poison, and blood diseases are terribly contagious.

What are you going to do about phossy jaw? These crippled girls are asking you.

HIS FATHER'S HAIR.

One of the first things noticed about the "little stranger" is the color of its hair. The color of baby's hair depends to a great extent upon the color of the hair of its parents.

Here is one rule which very rarely has an exception If you are red-headed and you marry a lady whose hair is of the same cheerful hue, then it is a hundred chances to one that every one of your children will be nicknamed "Ginger" at school.

It is the same with light-haired or dark-haired people marrying. As a rule, their children will all be fair or dark. When a dark-haired man marries a woman with light hair, then the majority of his children will be dark-haired, the minority taking after their mother.

That the color and texture of the hair is strongly hereditary is easily shown. Certain tribes, which have never intermarried with other tribes, will be found to have exactly the same type of hair, man, woman and child. The Eskimos are an instance of this. All of them have the same straight, black hair.

The hair of a baby at birth is not always the same color as it will be when it grows up, unless it is born with red hair. Once red-headed, always red-headed.

As a rule, a baby's hair is lighter than it will be in the long run Baby's eyebrows will generally tell you what color the hair on its head is going to be. The eyebrows are usually darker than the rest of the hair at birth. Hair, as a rule, turns darker and darker until middle age arrives, and then gray hairs begin to show.—Exchange.

MORGAN'S DEATH.

By Frederick Monroe.

Some days ago, across the water, in the city of Rome, died an old man, surrounded by relatives and friends, who mourned his passing just as do all who lose one near and dear. His name was John Pierpont Morgan. It was a name extolled and reviled; reverenced and hated; feared and despised. He was in turn the wizard of finance or the robber of the poor. He was to his friends a captain of finance, a constructive builder of national credit; to some of his enemies he appeared to be the exploiter of the helpless; the ruthless crusher of competitors.

In fact, he was none of these things. He was simply a cog in the wheel of the great system called by various names—Big Business, Frenzied Finance, The System, The Octopus. The system is Capitalism.

Morgan is dead. But the firm of J. P. Morgan & Company lives. So do the hundreds of banks, trust companies, railroads, mines, factories, workshops, industrial and manufacturing corporations of every kind and description, of which Morgan & Company, or the Morgan Company, with two, three, a dozen, or a hundred affiliated groups, hold the controlling interest

The passing of Morgan means nothing to the hundreds of thousands of those who paid toll to the system which he typified. The system goes on unmindful of his passing. The system was not built on Morgan or any other man. Morgan and every other capitalist are creatures of the system. They are just as much a product of the system as are the slaves of the steel mills. The production of the Morgans is as inevitable under the system of Capitalism as is the production of paupers. The same cause produces both effects. Capitalism lives on the production of surplus values. Of the total produce produced by the workers, the worker receives a portion, called wages. The balance—the surplus value—goes to capital. As the share of the one increases, the share of the other necessarily decreases. If labor takes more, capital necessarily gets less, and if capital gets more, labor necessarily gets less. Morgan happened simply to be born into the class which got more—not less.

His passing illustrates more graphically than anything else the fallacy of attacking men instead of the system. There be those among us—of whom our President, Mr. Wilson, is one—who believe that the jailing of a few trust officials would have some kind of effect in stopping the exploitation of the many by the few. Morgan was not jailed—but he was actually removed from the earth. Yet no man is simple enough to predict that exploitation will cease with the passing of Morgan. So it was with Harriman. So it will be with George F. Baker, Henry P. Davison. J. P. Morgan, Jr. Men count for nothing; the system is everything. These men play the game according to the rules laid down—WHICH WE PERMIT TO BE LAID DOWN. It is foolish to blame these men because they win under the rules, while we lose.

The passing of Morgan, with all that it does and DOES NOT signify, should act as a lesson to us who hold in our hands the power TO CHANGE THE RULES!—National Socialist.

ECHO OF THE AKRON RUBBER STRIKE.

In the last issue of "The People," official newspaper of the Akron Central Labor Union, is found the real facts of the recent rubber strike. The paper remained neutral during the trouble, as did the Akron labor movement. The paper now shows how the working class politicians who donated their hall for the strikers' first meeting, refused to allow the Central Labor Union officials to address the meeting, and how the strike was then handed over to the Wonder Workers through this trick.

The story of the I. W. W.'s miserable failure, despite their bluster and noise, is as follows:

> The big strike in the rubber factories of Akron has been declared at an end. This action was taken at a meeting held last Sunday, which was attended by a remnant of the strikers and addressed by two of the prominent I. W. W. leaders.
> The strike at one time involved between 12,000 and 16,000 men and women employed in the rubber factories of Akron, and was one of the series of spasmodic strikes that marks the social unrest of wageworkers whose wages are continually being lowered and who are being subjected to a speeding-up system that soon saps their life and throws them on the scrap pile.
> The rubber employers have successfully fought every effort to organize their employés, and it is well known that they maintain an elaborate spy system in order to keep the men in mortal fear of the loss of their jobs. But the men in the labor movement knew that it was only a question of time until there would be a revolt of such proportions as to bring consternation to the employers and result in an organization.
> It was unfortunate that at the time this last protest was made and the men decided to organize that they were misled into casting their lot with the I. W. W.
> Representatives of the Central Labor Union were present at the first meeting of the strikers, but those in charge, and who had extended the strikers the courtesy of their hall, did not permit the local union men to speak or to take part.

Hence the fatal mistake of the men not acquainted with the great labor movement under the direction of the American Federation of Labor.

A. F. of L. organizers arrived here as soon as possible for them to leave the work of organizing in the Pennsylvania steel centers, but as this was after the I. W. W. leaders had their campaign thoroughly under way, the only course left was to await the final collapse of the strike, which was inevitable.

As stated above, the strike now is a matter of history, and all strikers whom the companies will accept have returned to work. But there are at least two lessons that the strike has taught—one to the workers: that to make a protest and get results you must be organized in a bona fide labor union that has the backing of the labor organizations of the world, and not tie to a discredited band of alleged leaders who, in many cases, have been expelled from the legitimate labor movement. To the employers the lesson teaches that they are never secure in the steady operation of their plants without organization.—Toledo Union Leader.

LABOR.

The greatest of all the forces of human progress, culture, and civilization is labor.

Labor, mental and manual, has transformed into gardens, and made the bowels of the earth yield fuel and light, which enable a man to overcome the terrors of frost and the fears of the night; it has made the savage a civilized man, and man the master of the forces of nature.

But notwithstanding the leading part labor has taken in the shaping of our social world, the laboring man has always been regarded as an inferior being, as a mere beast of burden in human form, incapable of any higher intellectual and moral efforts, with but little sensibility, a very second rate citizen at his best. In spite of his importance as the creator of culture and the producer of the essential material elements of our civilization, the worker has never been permitted to occupy a position in society commensurable to the importance of his work. And however rich the harvest of his toil—he has never had a chance to enjoy in full measure the fruits of his labor.

Engrossing all his time, his work had prevented him from thinking seriously about the relations existing between himself and society, and from taking an active part in the framing and directing of social institutions and policies, until he came to recognize the formidable power of organization. But by organizing with his brothers in misery, he found the key to the door of social influence as well as the means of emancipation from his ignorance. He has become a power proportionately to the growth of his organizations, and whatever he may be able to accomplish in the future, his organizations will be the means by which it will be done.

The workers will come into their own by collective action only, for the individual man, be he ever so intelligent and noble and brave, does not count in the arena where the gigantic class struggle of our times is fought. —Buffalo Socialist.

THE KIND HE WANTED.

A man went into a clothing store in Topeka a few days ago to buy an overcoat. He had the money to buy it, and of course he was welcomed and was extended the glad hand. They had plenty of overcoats—all colors, all styles and all prices. Their line of overcoats was their special pride, so the clerk said.

The customer examined several garments, but each time completed the inspection with a shake of the head. They didn't suit. The salesman began to show nervousness. He evidently was puzzled.

"If you will tell me what kind of a coat you want," he ventured at last, "I will try to accommodate you. We have all kinds.

"No, you haven't my kind," was the reply. "My first test of an overcoat is to look at the inside pocket."

"Oh, I see," says the clerk, brightening up, "you are looking for the union label. Why didn't you say so? We have lots of 'em."

So the search began. The main floor was ransacked, then the basement, and finally a pile of left-overs from last season's stock. Still no label.

"Is it absolutely necessary that you should have the label in your coat?" the perspiring salesman at last blurted out in despair.

"Absolutely necessary," replied the man grimly. And there was a twinkle in his eye as he murmured ironically, "Lots of 'em."

Then the unhappy clerk grew bolder and started to give a little lecture: "Of course, it's all right to stick to principle," he began, "but it seems to me that you—"

"Never mind that," broke in the would-be customer, with a wave of his hand. "You are losing ground now. Just look once more. Perhaps you can find a coat with the label in it, after all."

And so he did. Just one lonesome Benjamin with the label in the inside pocket. It was a little bit large, to be sure, and the pattern didn't quite suit, but the man took it, and he left this behind him as he started for the door:

"Just one garment in your store that represents living wages; among the hundreds of overcoats on your shelves, just one that stands for the elevation of labor; just one protest against unsanitary workshops; only one that bears the stamp which means the abolition of child labor and the sweat shop, and the protection of the home and the uplifting of citizenship. And now you haven't any," he shot back as he bowed himself out.—Topeka Capital.

A SINGLE TAXER'S LAMENT.

By William Marion Reedy.

Every time I vote in the county I'm amused as I think of all the hullabaloo that is raised about crooked elections in the city. Say! If the country elections don't "outcrook" the city affairs, you can shoot me. There's no registration of voters in the country. Anybody can step in and vote in his turn. The country politician isn't above having the judges and clerks "right." And the counting—why, if we had city elections as unguarded as they are in the country, the "gang" would never lose. Human nature is much the same in city and country. Moreover, country elections are not watched. The honest farmer—did you ever trade with him, on his own stamping-ground? We've seen what he could do in the way of crooked elections in rural counties in Ohio and West Virginia and Illinois. Whenever I think of the honest farmer I think of a recent joke in Life that ran thus: "Boswer: There is honor among thieves. Towser: Oh. I don't know. Thieves, after all, are just like other people." There's the farmer and the single tax. He's against it because it is dishonest. But the honest farmer doesn't kick against being taxed at as low as 20 per cent. on his value, while the city man is taxed upon a 65 per cent. valuation. The guileless, the oppressed farmer! In my eye. He has the politicians in all parties, the preachers, the press, the country merchant, the country doctor and lawyer and dentist bluffed to a fare-you-well. Everybody is catering to him. And he's a fine proscriptionist, too. He won't let you talk if he's not with you. He talks tar-and-feathers, and eggs, and riding on rails, and even ropes. Those are his arguments—at least in bourbon Missouri. The only way to get along in the country is to conform—oh, not religiously. The farmer has about as much religion left as the rest of us. But you must conform to him on economics or you're in danger. He's a hot reformer when it somes to getting after banks and railroads and grain brokers and insurance companies and such. Soak 'em, Louie! But let any reform touch him; then there's trouble. His special interest is sacred. He must not be touched. He must be protected. And if you favor anything he doesn't like, you're an anarchist, a Socialist, a moral leper, an agent of the St. Louis breweries. As Senator Charles F. Krone said at Columbia, Mo., some weeks ago, "The farmer has been called 'honest' so long, he actually believes it." And yet when you come to think about it, the farmer is no worse than the rest of us—no more class conscious than bankers, brokers, shoe manufacturers, real estate men, brewers, trades unionists. None of us is tolerant of economic heretics who threaten our particular graft under the system under which we live. We are all ready in degree to proscribe and to boycott when our toes are in danger of being trampled.

Well, I stood at the polls and talked to the farmers and a few railroad and ice-plant workers. They were smart fellows, too. What did they talk? They talked good times. They talked anti-single tax. Don't tell me there's any danger to our institutions in the initiative, referendum and recall. There is not a bit. The people are not radical. They are afraid of radicalism. They don't believe in "dividing up property." They are conservatives to the marrow of their bones. They are for nothing but prosperity. They are for nothing that will raise taxes, yet they want a lot of things which cannot be paid for save with money raised by taxes. They are afraid of names. Socialism throws them in a fit. Single tax on the land! It gives them hydrophobia to think of it. The land! Their very worship of it proves the contention that the land should belong to everybody. Still, I don't know that they are any more demented as to the sanctity of stocks and bonds. They are pretty good folks, like the rest of us, when you let them have their own way. Like the rest of us, they are always ready to reform and to tax the other fellow.—St. Louis Mirror.

LAST WHEEL TURNED IN THE MERCUR MINE.

With the passing of Sunday, March 30, ends the largest and most historic of the gold producing mines of the state of Utah, for early yesterday morning the Consolidated Mercur Gold Mines Company of the Mercur district turned the last wheel. With a simple yet deeply significant ceremony this famous old dividend payer closed its career of usefulness much after the fashion of a successful man, yielding to the demands of nature after a long and well spent life.

Sunday morning, guided by the hand of the oldest miner in the employ of the company, the last car was lowered into the mine, filled and again brought to the surface. Old Glory was hoisted to the topmost point of the flagpole, and the whistle that had called the thousands to and from their work during the many years of operation was tied down and for one hour filled the ears of Mercur for the last time.

End Expected.

When a mine, like a man, lives to a ripe old age the end comes not unexpected, but in each case there is regret, despite the knowledge that nothing remains to be done by either. The closing of the old Consolidated Mercur mine is especially unfortunate, as it was the remaining big labor employer of the camp. Its miners and mill men in numerous instances have been on the payroll of the company for years. They have comfortable homes there, and their children, young men and women, born and reared in the camp, know no other home. In Mercur are their homes, their churches and all the connections of a lifetime, which must be broken, and while the camp will remain, it can never be the same without the Consolidated Mercur with its payrolls carrying hundreds of men.

Produces Many Millions.

The properties within the Consolidated Mercur boundaries have produced many millions of gold ore, and several millions have been paid out in the form of dividends. The property has been one of the most famous of schools for metallurgists, the ores being especially refractory and hard to reduce to bullion. With passing years the problems multiplied, but with each new and intricate problem presented there was the talent at hand to solve it, and not the least of the problems have been faced and solved by General Manager George H. Dern, who was forced to pound dividend money from continually decreasing gold values. For several years past the ores of the property have carried less than $5 per ton in the yellow metal, and the lower in value the ore the more refractory it became until the final stages developed into as close a proposition as the world holds.

End Was Forecast.

The end of this producer was forecast in the annual report of President John Dern for 1911. He emphasized the fact that the property was near its last hour in his 1912 report, and the shareholders during 1912 were asked to authorize the directors to dispose of the machinery and other assets as they saw fit. This authorization was granted, and it is likely that the Consolidated Mercur equipment soon will be distributed all over the country.

General Manager George H. Dern stated last night that it would take two weeks or more to clean up around the mill, gathering together the metal that has suceeeded in escaping the keen eye of the managemnt during the many years of concentration, from which time the company will cease as a producing proposition, and Utah will lose one of its most important sources of gold.

For many months past the company has been reducing its forces, working down from 600 or 700 to 200 men, who were released by the company yesterday. A great many have left Mercur for other fields, and a great many of the men released Sunday will find other places to work, but it is doubtful if any of the old men will ever run across any place that will suit them better than the old camp which has been for so long their home.—Exchange.

WHAT IS COAL LAND?

United States Geological Survey Outlines Manner in Which Coal Deposits Occur and Shows Why Land May Be Classified as "Coal Land" When No Coal Is to Be Seen for Many Miles.

It is so often the unpleasant duty of the United States Geological Survey to refuse to reclassify as noncoal land areas that have been classified as coal land, because the evidence and affidavits submitted for reclassification are inadequate, that a word of explanation on what is considered "adequate" may make clearer the position of the Survey in the matter.

It is a widespread popular impression that if coal is found outcropping on a tract, the land is coal land, and that if no coal is to be found outcropping the land is noncoal land. If this were true probably more than one-half of the coal produced in the country (in some states more than 95 per cent) would be coming from mines not on coal land.

As an illustration, 196 mines in Indiana in 1908 produced 11,997,304 tons of coal. Of these 196 mines, 15 were working the coal from the outcrop and produced 400,733 tons, or a little over 3 per cent of the total. The rest was mined from land, the surface of which showed no coal. In Illinois the percentage is still less, and in both states the average production of the mines working on the outcrop is small, compared with the average of all the mines. The percentage of coal worked from the outcrop is greater in Pennsylvania, West Virginia and the southern Appalachian states than in the two just cited, but not much if any greater in the Michigan field, the western interior field, or some others of the large fields of the country. It is true that in many of the fields when first exploited mines were mostly driven in on the outcrop, but for two reasons that condition has greatly changed. First, the coal close to the outcrop has been mined out; and second, after a time it has been found to be cheaper to mine the coal from shafts sunk to the bed from a point some distance back from the outcrop than to haul the coal, water and waste up the slope of the bed as it pitches into the ground.

If, therefore, any producing coal field is examined there will usually be found a belt of outcrop in which the coal-bearing rocks rise to the surface of the ground, and outside of that belt an area, which may amount to thousands of square miles, where the coals are all below the surface and the surface rocks may even be of entirely different age and perhaps not coal bearing at all. In Indiana shafts have been sunk to coal beds at a depth of 250 feet without any preliminary drilling where the coal bed did not outcrop nearer than 15 miles, and many of the mines of Illinois are 25 to 50 miles from the nearest outcrop of the coal they are working.

In classifying land as to its coal character a few general principles are involved:

1. If the land is known to be underlain only by groups of rocks known nowhere to contain coal, the land is assumed not to be underlain by coal and to be noncoal land.

2. If land is known to be underlain by one or more groups of rocks known to contain workable beds of coal, and a study of the dips shows that those groups are not too deep for the coals they contain to be worked, the land may be presumed to be coal land.

In nearly all cases where public lands have been withdrawn pending examination and classification it is known or believed that the land is underlain by groups of rocks known elsewhere to contain workable beds of coal. In probably a majority of cases it is also known or later examination demonstrates that coal does not outcrop on most of the land withdrawn but underlies it, perhaps at a considerable depth.

The evidence obtained by the Survey consists of observed outcrops and measured sections, properly located and described on the spot, and analyses made in the government laboratories from coal samples collected in a definite prescribed way, supplemented when necessary by such second-hand data as appear to be accurate and reliable and to be in accord with the personal observations of the field men.

OPPORTUNITY RESTORED.

Woodrow Wilson has fixed the date upon which the Democratic party will enter into the shadow and valley of death.

In a statement to the press, Mr. Wilson says:

"I shall call Congress together in extraordinary session not later than April 15. I shall do this only because I think the pledges of the party ought to be redeemed as promptly as possible, but also because I know it to be in the interest of business that all uncertainty as to what the particular items of tariff revision are to be, should be removed as soon as possible."

The Democratic party is pledged to a tariff for revenue only. It has condemned protective duties as robbery of the consumer in defiance of the constitution.

If the Democratic party shall keep its pledges to the people, if it shall meet the hopes and expectations of its supporters, it will wipe out every trace and vestige of protectionism.

Protectionism—what a vile and odious thing it has been to Democratic orators. "The communism of pelf," the tribute wrung from the pockets of the poor to fatten the swollen purses of privilege. Tariff bandits, Pittsburgh pirates, thieves, corruptionists, knaves and ballot box stuffers, and vote bribers—the beneficiaries of the tariff swindle—have been the seven devils that have possessed the American people and brought them to the very verge of destitution and despair.

The Democrats now have the tariff bandits on the hip. They have them at their mercy, as they did when Cleveland, with Watterson croaking at his heels, marched through a bloody slaughter house to an open grave.

Cleveland was elected on the issue that protection is robbery. He was pledged to free the people from the burden of legalized loot and wrench the republic from the clutches of greed.

When in office Cleveland turned aside to slay the menace and peril of free silver. The Sherman silver-purchase act was repealed and with Morgan's assistance the credit of the nation was kept from falling below par.

The Democratic party saved the nation's credit and lost its opportunity to rout the tariff bandits. A year after Cleveland's inauguration, a Democratic Congress turned its attention to the protective infamy.

The Wilson-Gorman act was born and the Democratic party all but died

Profiting from the experience of Grover Cleveland, whom he so closely resembles, Woodrow Wilson purposes to descend upon the den of forty thieves and rout them, bag and baggage, before they have time to recover from their surprise. He will not give them a year in which to prepare to meet the attacks of an unterrified Democracy.

There is in retirement at Sheboygan Falls, a Democratic statesman, the Hon. Charles Weisse. Mr. Weisse expresses the fear that Wilson and the Democratic party will bring disapointment to the American people. The people, he complains, expect too much from the coming administration. They expect the Democratic party to keep its promises, fulfill its pledges and make good.

If protectionism shall not be destroyed, if the trusts shall not be rooted out, if opportunity shall not be restored and the cost of living reduced, the people will set up a cry that they have been buncoed and demand their money back.

If, by some unforeseen and impossible circumstance the Democratic party should keep its pledges, if it should turn a deaf ear to Morgan and Ryan and Belmont and Rockefeller, if it should destroy the trusts, dismember the great railway systems, put a premium on the stage coach and beckon the ox-cart to come forth from its seclusion, if it should extinguish the tariff and free the people from the exactions and tributes of privilege, what would the harvest be?

The Democratic party's opportunity has been restored, but unfortunately—for if the condition which it faces is, as Grover Cleveland on a like occasion remarked, quite dissimilar from the theory to which it professes to be devoted.—Milwaukee Leader.

IMPORTANT MINERAL REGION.

The "Hanging Rock" Coal and Iron District of Kentucky and Ohio Described in Part in a Report by the United States Geological Survey.

The Kenova folio, No. 184 of the Geologic Atlas of the United States, has been issued recently by the Geological Survey. It describes an area lying in the three states of Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia. This area is in the "Hanging Rock" region of the Ohio River valley, a region of great industrial importance from its coal and iron industries and not many decades ago the center of several important charcoal iron furnaces. Though the charcoal-iron industry disappeared long ago it served a useful purpose in paving the way for the more modern steel and iron works in the city of Ashland, Ky., in the northeastern part of the area covered by the folio. The region is the center of thriving coal and clay industries, and within the last few years explorations for oil and gas have been vigorously prosecuted in some parts of it.

Catlettsburg, Ashland and Louisa, Ky., and Kenova, W. Va., are all busy and flourishing cities within the area. The Ohio river traverses its northeastern part and the Big Sandy, an important tributary of the Ohio, flows near its eastern edge. These streams not only furnish easy and cheap transportation, but have facilitated the construction of some of the important trunk lines of railway which traverse the area.

The Kenova area contains much of scientific as well as of economic interest. The peculiar drainage, both within and to the east and west of the area, the high gravel deposits back of Ashland and along Ohio and Big Sandy rivers, and the peridotite dikes in the western part of the area, are striking geologic features that are described in detail in the folio, which will prove of interest to the scientist devoted to the study of pure geology.

Of interest to the practical mining and business man are the descriptions of the minerals of economic importance—coal, flint and plastic clay, oil and gas, shale, limestone, iron ore, building stone, glass sand and salt. The relations of the valuable economic beds and those of stratigraphic importance are given in a columnar-section sheet.

Workable coal and clay beds are fairly well scattered over approximately two-thirds of the area, and the structure in the remaining third is such that at least a portion of the valuable beds will be found below drainage level. The location of the outcropping edges of these coal and clay beds is shown on the structure and economic geology sheet in the folio.

The coal beds vary in character, but include most varieties of the bituminous class, generally the harder kinds. As a rule they are not suitable for manufacture into coke, but when washed some of them give fair satisfaction. All are excellent for generating steam and for domestic use, and all bear transportation and stocking well. Certain of the coal beds in the western and southern parts of the area include benches of cannel coal which contains more than 50 per cent of volatile matter and which is especially suitable for use in open grates and in the manufacture of gas. Much of the good coal in the area occurring above drainage level and in proximity to the railroads has been removed, but there is still a considerable amount which, owing to its present inaccessible position, remains untouched.

The clays of the area are of both the plastic and nonplastic varieties, the latter being also known as flint clay. These clays are of considerable present importance and a variety of clay products are turned out annually, including common or building brick, fire brick and pottery. Many of the clay and shale beds of the area could if necessary be used in the manufacture of paving brick, sewer pipes, etc., for which an inferior clay is suitable.

The position of the oil and gas bearing beds in the different parts of the area is shown on the columnar-section sheet.

The geology of the Kenova quadrangle was worked out by W. C. Phalen of the United States Geological Survey, under the direction of G. H. Ashley, who also mapped some areas in the western and northwestern parts.

The folio comprises sixteen pages of text, one columnar-section sheet and three maps, one showing topography, a second showing the areal distribution of the different formations, and a third delineating the structure and economic geology. It may be purchased for 25 cents by application to the Director of the Geological Survey, Washington, D. C. The folio is also obtainable in octavo form for 50 cents.

THE PANAMA TOLLS CONTROVERSY.

No opinion has been so far expressed in this journal as to the merits of the controversy concerning the Panama Canal tolls and the British protest against the free passage of American coastwise shipping through the big ditch.

The Call on this matter remains neutral, though it might be supposed that being "unpatrotic" and "un-American," as a Socialist publication is usually assumed to be, it would take the British side of the controversy. However, we don't.

And it is not because of the fact that the bulk of the great capitalist newspapers seemingly favor that side, and that the "patriotic" Hearst is almost alone in screeching his journalistic lungs out against the impudent pretensions of John Bull to control the canal "we" have digged on "our" own territory and paid for with our own good money.

The really interesting point about the whole matter is why it is that the great capitalist journals of this country apparently take a pro-British view of the matter.

Hearst declares them lacking in patriotism, Anglomaniacs toadying to British pretentions, and aping things British in every possible manner. On the other hand, these journals declare they are taking a stand for the preservation of American honor, and the faithful carrying out of treaty stipulations. Both these explanations comprise the version of the affair as given to the public, and they can take their choice of either.

To the Socialist, however, the matter has really nothing to do with either patriotism, nationalism, Anglomania or Anglophobia, or even the "honor" of the nation. It is an economic controversy and absolutely nothing more. It merely represents capitalism in its international guise pitted against the narrow, restricted capitalism that has not yet crossed national boundaries.

The great American-born capitalists whose exploitative activities cover the earth have ceased to be "American" so far as their capitalism is concerned, and have become international. And the reason that they sustain the apparently "British" side of the question is that as regards their capitalism they are about as much "British" as they are "American."

The Hearst idea is that every vessel which flies a British ensign must necessarily be owned by a British capitalist, and conversely every vessel flying the Stars and Stripes must be owned by an American cpitalist, and that where one gains the other must necessarily lose.

The real fact is, however, that the flag flown on the taffrail of an ocean steamer is no guarantee whatever of her ownership. She may belong to an owner or owners of the country whose flag she flies, and then again she may not.

And the further fact is that American-born capitalists are already sole owners of hundreds of vessels flying the British and other flags, and part owners of thousand of other such vessels. The network of international capitalist interests that now covers the world is so immense and complicated that the so-called "nationality" of property of any kind counts for little or nothing, and it is diminishing every year. The great international capitalist interests, of which "American" capitalists form a part, have nothing to lose by permitting all vessels to go through the canal on equal terms, but, on the contrary, everything to gain. Capitalists who happen to live on this side of the water will send hundreds of ships under the flags of other peoples through the canal, and millions of tons of freight in similar vessels which they may partly own or own nothing whatever of, but they will naturally want to get their freight through on the lowest possible terms.

And this is the real status of the controversy, and it is this which explains the apparently pro-British attitude of most of our great American newspapers.

It is altogether likely that this view will ultimately prevail, too. But at present it affords an excellent opportunity to the Hearsts and other "tail twisters" to make a grand stand, patriotic play and their opponents to pose as upholders of the "honcr of the Amcrican people." And such opportunities are never overlooked while the bulk of the public still conceive that capitalism and nationality are inseparable, and that the world's exploiters have the slightest regard for nationality when private profit is involved.—New ork Call.

PATRIOTIC, BUT IMPRACTICABLE.

That versatile and enterprising gentleman whose copy is syndicated for the capitalist press under the feminine title of "Marquise de Fontenoy," now comes to the front with a suggestion, which, we are glad to say, meets with our unrescrved approval. He has discovered that many of the most powerful ships of the Greek navy have been the gift of wealthy Greek magnates to the nation, and bear their names, and that these ships have done excellent work in standing off any possible attack on the Greek coasts from Turkish warships.

He thinks the idea should be copied over here, and observes that "were the American people to have it brought home to them that their shores and their maritime trade were being protected by floating monsters known as the 'Morgan,' the 'Rockefeller,' the 'Astor,' the 'Vanderbilt,' the 'Hetty Green,' or even the 'Andrew Carnegie,' they might be less inclined to grumble against exaggerated fortunes and the unequal distribution of wealth."

Now there's certainly "some class" to that suggestion in every sense of the word. In fact, if it has a fault at all, it is rather that there is too much "class" to it. And we very much fear that the astute exploiters above mentioned would be instinctively inclined to reject it upon that account, which is exactly the reason why we recommend it.

It is not, to be sure, that they are niggardly or lacking in "patriotism" or reluctant to have their names blazoned forth as lovers of their country. But the suggestion too broadly and literally intimates the fact that it is "their country," and the launching of warships bearing their names and constructed at their individual expense would almost certainly bring into public prominence the idea that they were merely paying for the defense of their own possessions. And it is not, from their standpoint, a healthy idea to disseminate that they are the real owners of America. It would, in fact. be playing into the hands of the Socialists, a consideration which is probably beneath the notice of the aristocratic "Marquise," but which certainly would not escape the perception of those upon whom his suggestion is urged.

The Rockefellers, Carnegies, Morgans and others for the present will have to content themselves with the organization of privately armed forces operating inland. They can build stockades with electrically charged wires around them, they can mount machine guns around coal mines and steel plants and raise batallions of armed thugs to terrorize striking workers, but they must not, in their own proper names, venture on the sea with instruments of offense and defense. These things must be done in the name of the "nation," and they will have to content themselves with being really the "nation" themselves without having their names exhibited from the sterns of superdreadnoughts and battle cruisers.

Their names can appear on other structures, such as churches, hospitals and libraries, with tolerable safety. The American people at most "grumble" about these things, and refer to them as "blood-stained," as in the case of Andrew's libraries, but while they go no further, this is safe enough. Their names on warships, however, and perhaps their counterfeit presentments as figureheads—we should take extreme delight in seeing the steel prow of a dreadnought ornamented with the bulbous "mug" of a Morgan or the shabby draperies of a Hetty Green—might evoke something much more dangerous than mere grumbling; it might, in short, and most probably would, incite the "American people" to thinking, and instead of intensifying patriotism would probably tend to give that much-distorted national characteristic a twist that might head it in the wrong direction—so far as the donors of warships are concerned.

These things may go perhaps in Greece, where the people have evidently forgotten their own ancient proverb bidding them beware of gift-bearing Greeks. Their hatred for the Turks may not unnaturally have blinded them in this matter, but as we have no particular "Turks" against whom national hatred could be exclusively directed, the experiment on this side lacks the factors that make it comparatively safe over there.

The Marquise's suggestion does him all kinds of credit, and there is no doubt that his intentions in making it are excellent. He is only mistaken in assuming that the people he mentions are altogether fools and that their "patriotism" is as uncalculating and unsophisticated as that of the rest of their countrymen, the "American people." We ourselves hate to recognize that fact, but such is the case, and we are sorry to say that it makes the Marquise's suggestion, creditable as it is to him, utterly impracticable.—New York Call.

A SLAVE'S CONVERSION.

How He Was Set Thinking in the Right Direction.

My friend was a son of toil, of the horny-handed persuasion, as proud as Punch of it, too. When he exhibits his leathery-looking, corn-grained, toil-distorted ham, his mouth stretches across the dial like that of a mandrill (a specie of monkey with a face resembling that of a human) so broad is his grin. You'd think to look at them he walked through life on his hands along a cinder track. He wharf lumps for a crust, and considers himself the freeset man under the stars. I had been expatiating on Socialism, and placing him in the category of a slave. It touched him. His feelings were wounded, his pride pierced. After letting himself go as above described, he shot out his forepaws and asked me if ever slave bore hands like these? Why, man alive, yes, you bear them yourself! That flabbergasted him. I asked him how he got his living, and out came the hand-feet again. "With these," he retorted with pride. Then I pointed out the commodity nature of labor power, how this commodity was sold to the capitalist class, and how the force of human necessity compelled him to sell the energy stored within his soul-case, and which was part of himself, to the boss-owners of the wharves on which he toiled, and emphatically informed him that as he was forced to sell his energy, and with it himself, to the owner or owners of a plant in order to vegetate on this planet, he was no more free than a chattel slave was, that is economically speaking, of course. The difference in the position was mainly in the fact that the modern wage-slave was endowed with the liberty to change owners. My poor friend of the horny hand hazily admitted there was something in what I was saying, but—, I jumped in and sailed away. His attention was next drawn to the old auction block and the newer labor market, and a parallel shown. Before venturing further let me inform you that I am talking to you just at this moment, for my lumping friend is no doubt exercising his freedom to his mind's content. That's his share under capitalism!. See? Today we had the wheat market, the pig market, the cattle market, the sheep market, and alongside these a labor market. This was indisputable because the papers say so, the captialist papers, of course. But where comes the analogy between the slave of yesterday and the worker of today? In this: Buying and selling (and stealing) is the method by which society carries on its business of living, and as the worker has nothing to sell but his labor-power to get the means to buy the wherewithal to exist, he first must sell himself by the hour, day, or week. Secondly, in the case of wharf-laboring the modern slave is subject to the humiliation of passing before the scrutinous eye of a hired slave driver (pannikin boss)) before selection. Here we have a crowd of men eager to sell themselves for food and shelter—a body of human beings mobbed together like so many sheep, horny handed and hard-headed. Anxiously do they await the arrival of the "fellow worm" who is invested with the right of selection and rejection. These men wanted work to get money—many were in a bad way, too. With chest expanded, bearing carriage of great importance, his bosship struts towards the place of sale, and mounts a barrel. There is slight commotion in the crowd. In the anxiety not to be out of sight a short struggle takes place for position, those of smaller stature, or forced to the rear standing on tip-toe and elongating their necks like hungry giraffes in an endeavor not to escape notice. The selector rapidly runs an eye over the stuff he is about to buy for his boss. More humiliation comes. "I want you—you—you—" and so on until the complement required is picked from the mob, then "that's all." The rejected ones with heavy hearts turn away, and go elsewhere to undergo a similar painful operation. I put all that to my friend and inquired of him what he thought about it. His reply was that when one came to look at conditions a little closely, workingmen and workingwomen, also, were treated much as are sheep and cattle in their respective markets, the buyers picking what they want, rejecting the rest. And although he couldn't quite realize that he was a slave, yet there was so much logic in the contentions of the Socialists that he wouldn't attempt to combat the foregoing statements. That worker has been set thinking. And the very next time he is mobbed up for selection, and. probably, suffers rejection, he will be stung to the quick with the humiliation of degradation to which he has been subjected, realize the freedom to the worker under capitalism is a myth and the seller of labor-power in reality only a wage slave. Then will the fires of discontent burn hot within him.—The Vag, in Sydney People.

PRAYER AND PRIZE FIGHTING.

Religious literature teems with anecdotes purporting to demonstrate the efficacy of prayer, but an incident has just been cabled from England, which, while it apparently might be utilized for this purpose, we venture to say, will never be cited either as an inspiration and example to the true believer, or to confute the sceptic.

It relates how a British prize fighter, before "putting up his dooks" in a twenty-round championship bout, knelt in his corner, crossed himself, pulled a rosary out of his fighting shoes and prayed devoutly, while his opponent glared at him from across the ring, and the assembled "sports" looked on with mixed feelings of surprise and respect for what the item calls his "simple faith."

When he got through he toed the mark, and at once proceeded to whale the stuffing out of his adversary. Between each round he emitted a short supplication, and when finally he was declared victor, he devoutly gave thanks for the triumph in the same manner. Evidently the prayer of this righteous pugilist availed much.

The incident was deemed worthy of being cabled across here, and it has extracted many jocular and satirical editorial comments from the press. There seems to be an idea that the connection between prayer and prize fighting is in some way incongruous.

When men set out to murder each other in bulk, however, there is always prayer—elaborate prayer, too—and nobody thinks it in the least incongruous. In fact, it is regarded as not only highly appropriate, but were it omitted, it would be considered that the Almighty had been ignored, slighted, and treated most disrespectfully by His creatures, who failed to ask His blessing under such solemn circumstances.

And yet this prize fighter, it is safe to say, was infinitely more in earnest than nine-tenths of the innumerable hosts of men who, before going forth to war, invoke the Divine blessing upon their enterprise.

This pugilist did not hurt his adversary. He "won on points," as the account says. He merely got the decision of the referee. His opponent probably suffered nothing worse than a bloody nose or a contused eye, and as is the usual custom on such occasions, shook hands with him after the bout was over.

But when men go to war after invoking the Divine assistance, they murder each other in scores of thousands. Instead of a few drops of blood on the rosined surface of a twenty-four-foot ring, this is the picture that war presents. We select from among multitudes of others, a sample account from one of the most famous war correspondents, who described the great battle of Sedan:

"Fancy masses of colored rags glued together with blood and brains, pinned into strange shapes by fragments of bones. Conceive men's bodies without legs, and legs without bodies, heaps of human entrails attached to red and blue cloth, and disemboweled corpses in uniform, bodies lying about in all attitudes, with skulls shattered, faces blown off, hips smashed, bones, flesh and gay clothing all pounded together as if brayed in a mortar, extending for miles, not very thick in any one place, but recurring perpetually for weary hours, and then one cannot, with the most vivid imagination, come up to the sickening reality of that butchery."

And before this "sickening reality," prayers were sent up to the Almighty, that it might occur, and prayers of thankfulness after it did occur. That was perfectly proper, and not at all incongruous. God—that is the horror popularly conceived of as God—stooped down and smelt the sweet savor arising from the battlefield of Sedan, and it was pleasant in His nostrils, while half an ounce of blood in a boxing ring is a stench in the same nostrils.

And religious literature is full of accounts of prayers before battles, and Kipling's "Recessional," asking for something like what is contained in the above account, is listed as one of the "noblest hymns in the English language." Things of that kind find a high place in the most devout and respectable literature, while the prayer of the prize fighter cannot be even mentioned for shame, and is supposed to bring discredit and contempt on prayer and religion generally.

This horrible contradiction is perhaps too unpleasant a theme to pursue father. Besides, some malignantly hostile critics might possibly be inclined to accuse us of being "opposed to religion" if we did so, and our reputation is none too good already in that line, though the whole matter might apear as one of sanity or insanity, rather than a question of prayer. —New York Call.

MACHINES THAT WORK MIRACLES.

Manual Labor is Being Displaced By Mechanical Contrivances at a Rapid Rate.

In this age of miracles, when one revolutionary invention succeeds another with bewildering rapidity, there are few things more amazing than the devices by which man is making machinery do the work of his hands, and even of his brain, more perfectly and infinitely more quickly than he could do it himself.

Certainly it seems that, before very long, the occupation of clerks, like that of Othello, will be gone, their places being taken by a variety of machines manipulated by boys at a few dollars a week, each being able to do the work of half a dozen, more accurately than any human being could do it. Of such machines there are already nearly 100 varieties adapted to as many different purposes, in existence.

The "adding machine," which until recently was considered a marvelous triumph of mechanism, has, it is said, displaced a very large number of clerks; but it was, after all, a poor contrivance compared with its successor of today—a machine which can not only do its work of addition, but typewrite as well. This mechanical clerk, operated by a mere lad, is an expert and infallible bookkeeper, able to transfer entries from one book to another far more quickly than is possible by hand, and with much greater accuracy.

This machine, weighing about fifteen pounds, makes the most elaborate calculations at a speed which takes the breath away. "What is 479 times £15 14s 7¾d?" you ask; and almost before you can ejaculate "Jack Robinson" the typed answer is forthcoming, correct to the last farthing. And the machine is equally swift in its response, whether your sum is one of addition, subtraction or division. Two sums can be worked on the same keyboard of some of these mechanical calculators, and separate totals given; while, if the operator should be called away, the machine holds the figures until his return, and then completes its work, allowing no one to disturb it during his absence.

Five thousand items, we are told, can be registered in an hour; the machine is incapable of making a mistake; and if it falls downstairs and its gear gets out of order, it automatically locks itself. Even the shorthand writer is no longer indispensable to the busy merchant who has his scores of letters to answer daily. He dictates them to the wax cylinder of a phonograph, which repeats them to the typist. Each surface can take 1,200 words; and as the surface of a cylinder can be shaved over 100 times, the cost is absurdly small.

If our man of business wishes to send out a few thousand circulars he can produce them on his "Printograph," which costs but a quarter's salary of a junior clerk, at the rate of 2,000 or 3,000 an hour, each sheet looking exactly as if it had been produced by his own pen. And these are but a very few samples of the hundred or so mechanical devices for office work alone, which range from a machine which will open a large stack of envelopes, a whole day's correspondence, by a single operation of an instant, to a machine which stamps on every check the amount below which it is drawn, and thus makes it secure against all the arts of the forger.

Not only, too, are stamps now sold automatically and affixed to envelopes by machinery in hundreds of commercial homes, but there is an ingenious apparatus containing rows of stamps of five different values, by which a clerk can stamp envelopes at the rate of 2,000 an hour, thus doing the work of several men under much more pleasant conditions than are possible to the hand-sticker. Another equally ingenious machine for the registering of letters has a door which flies open when two pennies are inserted, revealing an aperture in which the letter is placed. On turning a handle a receipt is produced in front of the machine; while the letter, duly registered and numbered, is thrown out at the side.

Even railway tickets are now printed "while you wait," at 1,000 stations on the continent, and on at least one English railway, the Lancashire and Yorkshire. The machine for this purpose is charged with rolls of thin cardboard; and prints, cuts and numbers the tickets as the booking clerk requires them. It has a dial with an indicator like the long hand of a clock. If the clerk requires a score of tickets, he moves the indicator to the number, 20, pushes a lever, and, presto! twenty tickets are discharged into a little tray, each bearing the name of the company, the amount of the fare, and names of the stations from and to which the traveler is going. The tickets can be produced at the rate of ninety per minutes and at a cost of two-pence per 1,000—a sixth of the price usually paid by the companies for their tickets.

And in every other field of labor we find man being similarly supplanted by the machinery he has designed for his own undoing. In the great wheat lands of the West they have today a wonderful machine, motor-driven, which will clear a 100-acre field in a day—cutting, threshing, discharging the grain into sacks and dropping the straw as it goes in neatly-tied bundles, producing as many as 1,500 sacks of grain, at a cost less than two shillings for each acre cleared. In the cotton field you will find equally ingenious machinery, which does the work of a small army of men, not only picking the bolls, but effectually cleansing them at a mere fraction of the cost of hand labor.

In many a tobacco factory you will see a machine which will pour out perfectly rolled cigarettes at the rate of 20,000 an hour, performing with untiring precision the work of scores of men; and in the modern laundry a single machine will wash shirts at the rate of 200 an hour, iron and gloss one every minute, or complete collars and cuffs at the rate of one in four seconds.

Where, a generation or so ago, it took a baker forty-eight hours of hard labor to prepare, roll and cut 1,000 pounds of dough, the same work can be done today by machinery in as many minutes, one machine thus doing the work of sixty men. Boots are now produced in one-tenth of the time and at a tenth of the cost of manual labor; and the up-to-date bricklayer, equipped with his machine, can do the work of seven men at a mere fraction of the cost. The automatic cashier is able to count 21,000 or more coins in sixty minutes, and separate bags, without the possibility of mistake, doing the work of three or four experts at less than the cost of one.

And so it is, wherever we look—these modern "miracles" of machinery are replacing man's labor throughout the world, from the marvelous machine which turns out complete copies of your weekly journal at the rate of many thousands an hour, to the mechanical scullery-maid which washes dishes at an eighth of the cost and in a quarter of the time they could be washed by hand.—Weekly Telegraph.

THE TOILERS AND THE SPOILERS.

"The furnace blasts and the clanging sound
Of fire and steam and steel,
And the sweaty man that slings the sledge,
Too weary and wasted to feel,
While the park drives streams with gay and proud
And selfish employers—why
Are men strong and sinewed and crazed with heat
Penned up in the mills to die?

"The hammers pelt like hail in hell,
And hissing fires glare,
And the ill-shaped work-worm slaves toil on,
And who in the park drives care?
While the August sun makes lovers seek
The shadiest glen in the park,
The hammers swing in these sweltering rooms
Where the red beams sputter and spark.

"They bathe bare-limbed on the docks at sea,
And sit starched up in the shade,
But the steel mills' inhuman sweat-soaked dregs
Are the soul-sick sights they've made.
They sip iced drinks and idly stretch,
As the hours tinkle away,
While men are driven to death in hell
With the food of a beast in pay.

"Then ill-kept poverty's sadden dregs
Come bent with the empty pail
From the Carnegie mills where the blood-smeared steel
Rolls out as a railroad rail.
The dukes and dames and lice of the earth,
Who wouldn't pick up a pin,
Ride forth in their beautiful cars made bright
With the paint and flowers of sin."

THE COST OF LIVING.

"I do not see why folks complain,
Said Jorkins, "of the price of meat;
For 50 cents a pound you get
A sirloin steak that can't be beat.
For the same money you can buy
A luscious English mutton chop.
Why should you ask for more than that?"—
Yes, Jorkins keeps a butcher shop.

"The cost of living ain't so high,"
Said Jobkins. "Why should folks find fault?"
For half a dollar you can buy
A full three months' supply of salt.
Just think what people had to pay
Right after our great Civil War!
I tell you, flour cost money then!"—
Yes, Jobkins keeps a grocery store.

But Jobkins went to buy some meat,
And said that Jorkins was a skin;
And Jorkins, paying Jobkins' bill,
Declared he had been taken in.
And when the coal man asked for pay,
They both set up a mighty shout;
And just as they were feeling worst,
The plumber came and cleaned them out!

RETRIBUTION.

By "Who's Allen?" Butte, Montana.

"Thou art weighed in the balance—found wanting.
Thou art guilty of treason world wide.
With all of thy knowledge and vaunting
Thou forget'st on the Cross I once died."

"I taught 'Come to Me with your burden;
Come sick and forlorn and distressed.'
To those who accepted—a guerdon
Awaits them at Home with the blessed."

"I taught that all men should be loving;
That all should be equal from birth;
That men should be kind and forgiving—
Live peaceful and happy on earth."

"But My temples have been desecrated
By King, Politician and Pope.
No more is My name venerated—
My world is without love, without hope."

"The rich with exclusive opinions,
Strive ever to rule o'er My poor;
Strive yet to make slaves of My minions;
Strive yet to keep truth from their door."

"I meant individual endeavor
Should merit My world and it's wealth.
I meant that My world forever
Be free from all grasping and stealth."

"My sunlight shall yet pierce the sombre
And threatening clouds of despair.
In My world those who slave without number Shall yet My created wealth share."

"To those who have bonded and driven
And shackled and fettered and slain—
To them shall the cup yet be given
And all of its dregs shall they drain."

"To the toilers of earth shall be given
It's riches and fulness and love.
From their minds shall the shackles be riven
By the God who rules all from above."

LIFE'S MISSION.

The dream of wealth will but deceive
And fill my heart with care,
If selfishly I seek to gain,
Nor with my brethern share
The pleasures God has given man,
Life's joyousness to give;
Why should I, while my brothers starve,
Upon their earnings live?

Should I forget the brotherhood
That should be in our hearts,
And feel another's suffering,
No grief to me imparts?
Are we not all God's family,,
To love and care for all?
Then how can we ignore the cares
That on each other fall?

We must reach out the helping hand;
The sympathetic heart
And join our lives with that sweet bond
That never drives apart;
While love and charity shall rule
And make our lives ideal;
We then shall know the joy of life,
Its mission, learn to feel.

—Martha Shepard Lippincott, Columbia Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE ONES THAT "GOD" FORGETS.

W. E. Hanson, Butte.

There are rows of mounds of shifting sand,
With slabs that like silent sentinels stand,
Beneath them, unhonored, unsung there lie,
Thousands unknown to the passersby.
What tales could be told by that moldering flesh,
Of wrongs and injustice and wounds bleed afresh,
At the thought of it all, ere they came to lie
In the damp narrow bed, where you and I
Must come some day and take our place,
After we've finished and lost in the race,
For life is a race that we slaves must run,
And only ends, when that life is done.

The choking sobs and sighs one hears
For the poor have no time to spend in tearse.
A prayer for the living, a sigh for the dead.
No time for aught, save the struggle for bread.
Sweat and toil for the meagre crust,
And roll up profits for wealth and lust,
From dawn of morn 'til twilight gray,
Like a cog in the wheel with nothing to say—
Nothing to say, but oh, God the thought
That our lives for a pittance, the Master bought,
And as a return for what we have given,
Are damned on earth and forgotten in heaven.

A plain pine box, unpainted, unlined,
In the narrow space, a body confined;
The form of a woman, pallid and thin,
Who made her home in the marts of sin.
With her skeleton face and hair of gray
Is all that is left of this mortal clay
That once was pulsing, bleeding life,
Ere it entered the ranks of unequal strife,
For women must work if they care to live,
And for love and life their all they give—
When they truly love they count not the cost,
Give all the world, count the world well lost.

Life to women is sweet when they long to win
A place of honor, are blind to sin.
Their lives are grist in the "mills for gain,"
They may struggle long, but battle in vain,
For the system is mighty, the system is strong,
And profits are double when women go wrong,
For the wants are few, of this fallen brood,
Joined by bonds of a common sisterhood,
They drink to the dregs the cup of woe,
And never a thought on the future bestow,
But envy the ones who have ended the race,
And rest—"in their final abiding place."

Men and women and children as well,
If skulls could speak, the tale would tell
Of how this system for profits and spoils
Enmeshed their lives in its crushing coils—
For the system is mighty, the poor are weak,
If they toil for bread, they dare not speak.
What had they to live for? Life was a hell
Though oily tongued, well-fed "ministers" tell
That a "God" so ordained it; He knows best—
What is wisest for us, as His works attest—
Thrown down the gauntlet, fling back the lie,
Let this "minister's God" tell us "how and why."

HOW DID YOU VOTE?

How Did You Vote Last TIme?

Ah! union men, who strike to win!
The cause you feel is just.
How did you cast your vote last time?
For men whom you could trust
To look out for the public good,
Or greed and selfishness?
If voting for the rule of greed,
Your cause it will not bless.

Next vote for men who will do right
And not let pocketbooks
Be bribing them to cater to
All kinds of selfish crooks.
Put not the power in the hands
Of men who'll fight your cause,
And all the time be trying to
By making unjust laws.

So they can keep you where they wish
And make you humbly serve
To build the millions of their wealth
That they do not deserve.
While you send selfish men to rule
And make our country's laws,
You will not find them looking out
To aid the workers' cause.

You have the power with your votes
To save our land from greed,
If you will vote for just the men
The country seems to need.
Then be above gold's bribery
And vote for your own rights;
Then will the world be guided by
The just and truer lights.

Do not forget how you have erred
And let greed hold the sway!
So it has turned to fight you now
And make a sorry day.
Be men henceforth and vote to call
The nobler men to rule;
Then you will find we're living in
A better kind of school.

JUSTICE has been bull-penned in West Virginia.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR has now passed the two million mark.

THE SO-CALLED "Christian" unions are scabbing on the general strike for manhood suffrage in Belgium.

GUS LARSEN and Melvin J. Gaetz of Leadville, Colorado, have donated $1 each to aid the miners on strike at the Britannia mines.

THE PEOPLE of Ameriea are afflieted with about 2,000,000 parasites. When the people overthrow the profit system they will get rid of the parasites.

HUGH O'NEIL, father of the editor of The Miners' Magazine, died in Denver at St Joseph's Hospital on the night of April 23d, and was buried April 26th in Mount Olivet Cemetery. He was born in the city of Derry, Ireland, April 22, 1833. He eame to Ameriea when 14 years old, and passed away after reaching four score years.

THE MEMBERS of the Bricklayers' International Union have been voting on the question of affiliation with the Ameriean Federation of Labor. At the present writing the indications are that the bricklayers will become a part of the A. F. of L.

THE NEW TARIFF reduction that is being enacted purely as a piece of political advertising, will not stand up against even a little argument. To whom does it matter whether we have a tariff or not? Free trade has never solved the problem of poverty in free-trade countries. Gentlemen, it is the problem of poverty you are called upon to solve; the tariff is no problem at all.—New Times.

MAX PAM, one of the so-called leading eitizens of New York, gave $500,000 to the Roman Catholic ehureh about three months ago to be used to fight Socialism. We are not interested in the fact that he was an easy mark, but we want you fellows to get it into your noodles that the leading citizens of Christ's time were the fellows that were responsible for his death, and all because he was trying to better the condition of his class—the working elass. Socialists are engaged in the same kind of work as Christ was—the bettering of human conditions, and are in for the same kind of abuse slander that was heaped on their comrade—Jesus Christ.—Toiler's Defense.

EQUALITY before the law! Of course, nothing less, says the captain of industry, the railroad magnate, the street ear despot—every man must be allowed to hire as many strike-breakers as he chooses in order to frustrate the attempts of honest workingmen to improve their conditions of work and life. No law is violated when eapitalist employers make use of their economie power to bring economically helpless workingmen to terms except the law of humanity, the observation of whieh is not obligatory for model eitizens. Capitalist law knows no humanity; it is only concerned with material interest and the conditions under whieh it may be realized. What we need is not equality before the capitalist law, but a new law, the object of which is the human interest of all human beings.—Buffalo Soeialist.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY stands for the principles of unionism and proclaims war upon tyranny in every form. Such being the case, it is now pertinent to ask the question as to why the National Exeeutive Committee of the Socialist party has failed to arouse the working class of a nation to the fact that "Mother" Jones is held a prisoner in West Virginia by the orders of the coal barons?

Has she outlived her usefulness?

Is she ignored by the National Executive Committee of the Socialist party because age has dimmed her eyes, and eighty years upon earth presages that she is soon to be numbered with the dead?

Has thirty years upon the firing line of labor's battle been forgotten that she is to be abandoned by the National Executive Committee of a party that prates about its love for liberty and human rights?

If Berger, Hilquitt, Spargo, Barnes and other luminaries of the Socialist party were held as prisoners in West Virginia under the pretext of martial law, would the National Executive Committee of the Socialist party remain idle and silent to their imprisonment?

If not, then for what reason has the National Exeeutive Committee become apathetie and indifferent to the wrongs inflicted upon a woman who has borne the brunt of labor's fight for the life of a generation?

The National Exeeutive Committee must speak, and speak quiekly, or bear the eensure of every honest union man and woman in the labor movement of America.

WE HAVE HEARD much of the democracy of President Wilson and his secretary, William Jennings Bryan, and much of the democracy promulgated by these gentlemen, who on the rostrum have proclaimed their indignation against the despotism of predatory wealth. But in West Virginia the law has been trampled under foot and justice murdered by the authorities of the state, who seem to be the official agents of coal barons and railway magnates.

An old woman in her eightieth year has been held as a military prisoner, simply because she raised her voice in behalf of suffering humanity. "Mother" Jones and officials of the United Mine Workers have been the victims of the brutal tyranny of economic czars, and not a finger has been lifted in Washington to halt the corporate outlaws of West Virginia.

Wilson and Bryan and the other so-called giants of the Democratic party, can little longer remain blind to the infamies perpetrated in West Virginia, and at the same time make the people believe that the Democratic party stands for justice. Actions will speak louder than words.

HENRY GRADY, the once noted editor and orator of the South, paid the following eloquent tribute to cotton:

"Cotton! What a word to conjure with to us who are from the South. What a royal plant it is! The world waits in attendance on its growth. The shower that falls whispering on its leaves is heard around the earth. The sun that shines upon it is tempered by the prayers of all people. The frost that chills it, and the dew that descends from the stars are noted, and the trespass of a little worm on its green leaf is more to England than the advance of the Russian army on her Asian outposts. It is gold from the instant it puts forth its tiny shoot. Its fiber is current in every bank; and when losing its fleece to the sun it floats a sunny banner that glorifies the field of the humble farmer; it is marshaled under a flag that will compel the allegiance of the world and wring a subsidy from every nation of the earth It is the heritage that God gave to this people forever as their own when He arched our skies, established our mountains, girt us about with the ocean, loosed the breezes, tempered the sunshine and measured the rain. Ours and our children's forever. As princely a talent as ever came from His hand to mortal stewardship."

MOTHER JONES, the Florence Nightingale of the class war, has behind her a record of service that will immortalize her name. For nearly half a century she has been on the industrial line, giving her life to thise who toil. Hers was no message from beyond the starry dome, she had no time for celestial hash pots. Her's was a message of service. Many is the time that she led the discouraged host of toil, from the verge of chaos back into the confidence that is born of solidarity. When the faint light of hope seemed swallowed up in the dark night of despair, her zeal fanned the dying embers into flame. Her presence gave strength to the falling, courage to the fearing and confidence to those who doubted. Regardless of her own comfort and safety, she was always in the thick of the fight. Her kindly fingers cooled the temples of the sick, bound the wounds of the bleeding and closed the eyes of the dead. Hers was a life of sublime consistency. She was and is a mother among the toiling masses. No leader but rather a companion and comrade. Labor loves her for her service, hence the name of "Mother."

Today the enemy has her in its power, charged with inciting murder, a thing which is as ridiculous as it is absurd. She has been tried by a military court and found guilty, and upon appeal she is to be tried again by a group of men who have averred that she is guilty. She is to be tried by her accusers. Great is the impartiality of the law. Workers, organize politically and industrially into one compact bond of solidarity.—Truth.

THE FOLLOWING DISPATCH from Grand Junction, Colorado, shows how the I. W. W.s do business:

"Grand Junction, Colorado, April 21.—Sixty militant members of the Industrial Workers of the World arrived in Grand Junction last night and at once caused trouble for the police. Led by Jack McDonald, 'martyr' of San Diego, they marched at once to police headquarters, where they demanded food, which was denied them.

"Sixteen of the band then went to a restaurant, where they ordered a plentiful meal for which they refused to pay. The proprietor called the police and special deputies arrived at the restaurant before the Industrial Workers of the World had left. With drawn revolvers the deputies demanded and forced payment of the dinner checks.

"The men then declared that there was no more money in the party, but they expected to stay in the city for three days and be fed Citizens organized and drove the visitors from Grand Junction this morning.

"The men say they have come from Utah and are on their way to the relief of the 100 Industrial Workers of the World who now are in jail in Denver."

The above dispatch speaks for itself and needs but little comment. The traveling tourists have an eternal hatred for work and do not propose to lose any sweat as long as there is any possibility of being lodged and fed at the expense of others. The professional beggars proclaim themselves revolutionists and world emancipators, but sensible men will think more than once ere they reach the conclusion that workless wanderers rustling for fodder can promote the interests of the working class.

Voluntary bums and hoodlums are no part of the bona fide labor movement.

MR. MARSHALL, Vice President of the United States, has been receiving some letters from distinguished gentlemen since he delivered an address recently in New York The Vice President, during the course of his address said:

"Present advantage shuts our eyes to the permanency of our institutions. Not what we are nor what we stand for, but what we can make has come to be the measure of governmental duty and individual conduct. And yet, despite this theory of life, Karl Marx and hunger and a longing for happiness are abroad in the land. The desire of the people is for greater equality of opportunity and enjoyment. More and more men are coming to the belief that Socialism alone will open up and guarantee this equality."

The above sentiments expressed by a man who stands next to the chief magistrate of the United States have caused a nervous feeling to pervade those select circles of society whose wealth has been stolen under forms of law.

The pampered and petted darlings of the upper crust are displeased and are gently protesting against such language coming from a man whose official position nationally gives him entrance to the sacred sanctum of purse-proud plutocracy.

Marshall, though Vice President of the United States, has not become deaf to the mutterings of discontent. He knows that the unrest of the laboring millions presages the coming change which must ultimately result in the sovereignty of the masses of the people. He realizes that the reign of privilege will not be tolerated by a people who yearn for liberty.

THE NEW YORK SUPREME COURT has handed down a decision recently that will be of much interest to the membership of organized labor. From an exchange we quote the following, relative to the decision:

"The New York Supreme Court has decided that a trade union has the power to make laws and to impose fines for the violation of same. The court rules that when a member joins the union he must obey laws, properly passed, and if he violates these laws, which he promised to obey, when he joined the union, he has no redress, but must suffer the consequences. The case was started by two members of the New York Mailers' Union, who were fined for violating the union rules regarding overtime. The union, in defense, showed that the laws were clearly stated in the book of rules, and which were in operation when the members joined, and which they agreed to at that time. The court sustained the union and declared that when a unionist took an obligation to abide by rulings, he had no recourse from courts."

The above ruling from the highest court of the state of New York is very important and establishes a precedent that is not only based on law, but on sound common sense.

When a member of the working class is admitted to the membership of a labor organization he is presumed to know its constitution and by-laws, and it is further presumed that when he takes the obligation given to him by the organization of which he becomes a member, that he will render obedience.

The ruling of the Supreme Court of the state of New York relative to obedience on the part of a member to the laws and constitution of his local union, carried to its conclusion, must apply to local unions rendering obedience to the laws and constitution of the national or international bodies with which they may be affiliated.

IT IS SOMETIME since capitalism has showed its teeth as markedly as it is now doing in West Virginia.

For months the cossacks have hounded the miners like beasts of prey.

The coal barons are attempting to crush the miners in their effort to organize and secure some sort of living conditions.

When the men went out on strike the governor sent the militia at once, in obediance to the coal kings.

Trainloads of cossacks were shipped in. In running the train through the strike-bound valleys, the soldiers would put out the lights in the coaches and fire promiscuously into the camps and hovels of the miners, killing and wounding many of the women and children as well as the men.

The United Mine Workers have kept Paul J. Paulsen in the field for months to aid in the organization of the coal diggers. Mother Jones has spent most of the time there since the strike started. The Socialist locals and the state organization have joined in the battle. The Argus, the Socialist paper, has put up a fine fight.

For this reason the coal barons, who own both the mines and the government kidnaped Mother Jones, Paulsen, editor Boswell and about fifty others and put them into a bullpen at Pratt.

From this place we have received cards and letters to the effect that they are held under the military power of the state. The prisoners have appealed for trial by jury, but the Supreme Court of the state has denied that right.

These comrades and workers are now being tried by court martial and are liable to be lined up along the fence and shot like dogs.

Justice is not in the running. Justice is held an exile from West Virginia. Justice has no standing in that old seat of tyranny.

Shall the rest of us stand by idle and let our comrades be riddled with bullets? Shall the United States allow one of the commonwealths to violate the constitution and kill our citizens without recourse to the right of trial by jury?

Is there any wonder that the people are turning to Socialism? Are they not driven to think, and think harder?

The sooner we get Socialism the sooner will we be rid of the infamous butcheries now perpetrated by capitalism.—Next Step.

Colorado Invaded

THE INDUSTRIAL WANDERERS have invaded the state of Colorado. The Workless "Willies" first camped at Grand Junction on their way from California. When the sweatless tourists pitched their tent in Grand Junction the mayor and council immediately made an appropriation to purchase a "Mulligan stew" for the revolutionists.

When the taxpayers discovered that public funds had been appropriated to furnish the advance guard of the "I-Wont-Works" with soup refreshments there was a howl of indignation that meant something more than mere noise. A mass meeting was immediately called and vigorous speeches were made in denunciation of the city officials, who assumed authority to place a "Mulligan" before the emancipators of an enslaved world.

From the mass meeting a vigilantes was organized, and when the Revolutionists (camped on the outside of Grand Junction) heard of the warlike preparations of the citizens they immediately "hit the trail" toward Denver.

The city officials of Denver were anxiously awaiting their coming, in order that the "bummery" might not feel slighted by any act that might be interpreted as a lack of courtesy on the part of the Denver authorities. When the tourists struck the corporate limits of Denver they were immediately waited upon by a police committee and escorted to jail.

They were arraigned in court the following morning and convicted as vagrants.

The Revolutionists, after being convicted and sentenced to jail, refused to eat and trampled under foot the food that was served. They were as defiant as Mrs. Pankhurst, the suffragette, but not as durable, for in a short time it was discovered that the leader had smuggled a loaf of bread and put it where it would do the most good.

This act on the part of the leader was branded as treasonable, and the patriots for soup declared the hunger strike in jail at an end. The taxpayers of Denver may follow the example of the taxpayers of Grand Junction, and if so, the advocates of "sabotage" and "direct action" will be given doses of their own medicine.

They Are Class-Conscious

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION of Illinois is "on the job" and never loses an opportunity to prohibit labor from passing any measure that might jeopardize dividends. The following letter sent out to the manufacturers of Illinois shows that the exploiters are class-conscious:

Illinois Manufacturers' Association, American Trust Bldg., Chicago:

Gentlemen—A crisis is being faced by Illinois manufacturers before the General Assembly now in session at Springfield. The labor lobby is unusually active and scores of bills tending to throttle your business are up for passage.

Unless a united stand is taken at once Illinois manufacturers' industries, OF WHICH YOURS IS ONE, will receive a blow from which they may not recover for years. The Illinois Manufacturers' Association is fighting this battle—YOUR battle. It has been doing it for years. DON'T you think you ought to bear a portion of this burden? Are you not willing at a critical time like this to put YOUR shoulder to the wheel and assist this organization in guarding your interests? We want YOUR aid—YOU NEED US. Inclosed is an application blank. Please send us check for $50—$10 initiation fee and $40 dues for one year. Very truly yours,

JOHN M. GLENN, Secretary.

Laboring men who read the above letter and who believe that the interests of employer and employé are "identical," should endeavor to ascertain why such an association, made up of employers, send out letters soliciting funds to defeat labor legislation.

The workers have been frequently told that the employer and employé should be brothers, and some have gone so far as to declare that master and slave are partners.

But with all the sophistry and hypnotism used to blind the worker to the interest of his class, conditions are being created and facts revealed that are awakening the struggling millions to the treachery and duplicity utilized to drug the victims of exploitation.

The class struggle is raging in every nation of the world, and the time is not far distant when greed must go down before the power of a class that is demanding that economic slavery shall be buried in its eternal grave.

Shall America Be Russianized? Dangerous Menace to This Country

By R. A. DAGUE.

To the Editors of Socialist and Labor Union Publications and All Advocates of Peace and Lovers of Liberty:

Comrades—A well-matured and powerful movement planned and promoted by capitalists, professional military men, politicians, presidents of six great universities, the adjutant generals of twenty-eight states, and others, has been started and is well under way to create an immense army in the United States.

This is not because any other nation threatens to wage a war against us, or that there are any indications of a war with anybody. The men behind the screen promoting this movement put a higher estimate on the rights of private ownership of property than they do on the well-being of men, women and children.

Ideas of peace and the awful curse of war have been spreading among the people. The czars, the kings, the plutocrats view with alarm this awakening of their subjects, their wage slaves, their victims. They are, therefore, quietly moving to counteract this tendency. They need soldiers who, at their bidding, will thrust the glittering bayonet to the heart of the men whom they desire to kill. To carry out their plans they are, therefore, starting movements to cultivate the war spirit in boys and others, and to strengthen the army.

This is a critical age of the world. Nothing stands still. Civilization will go forward to higher and more peaceful planes, or go backward into tyranny, violence and bloodshed. Monarchies will dethrone kings and establish republics and democracies, or retrograde to despotism. Peace will be promoted, bringing its inestimable blessings, or we shall nurture the war spirit and go back to killing for glory or spoils, and, in due time, find our government is a military despotism ruled by a few enormously rich, while the many are in dire poverty.

I ask my readers, which shall it be in America? Will a hundred millions of liberty-loving people permit this great nation to be adroitly converted into plutocratic military government? We shall see.

I propose that a million lovers of peace send up to our law-making bodies a protest against the movement referred to. With that idea I submit herewith a form of protest. Let it be cut from this journal, be attached to sheets of blank paper and signatures of men and women be solicited and, when filled by names, sent to the general offices of the American Federation of Labor at Washington, D. C., and to headquarters of the National Socialist party, Chicago, Illinois, on the 1st of October, 1913, the same to be placed on file, duplicate copies to be forwarded to the presiding officers of every State Legislature next winter; also to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Let a million of good citizens send in their emphatic protest against this un-American and dangerous scheme to convert this republic into a military despotism. Let all Socialist Locals, labor unions and all other opponents of war and lovers of liberty circulate this protest for signatures and do all they can to avert the impending danger.

Here is the protest I suggest:

A PROTEST.

Whereas, There has recently appeared in the Chicago Record-Herald and other newspapers the following:

"Announcement has been made of the completion of the "organization of the Army League of the United States and "of its purpose to hold a convention in Washington in Decem-"ber. At this meeting the policy of the league will be formu-"lated and the methods of its extension outlined.

"The Army League of the United States embraces among "its officers some of the most distinguished men in the coun-"try, including two ex-Presidents, two ex-secretaries of war, "an ex-secretary of state, two ambassadors, two former am-"bassadors, three lieutenant generals, who were once chiefs "of staff, the adjutant generals of twenty-eight states, the "presidents of the Universities of Chicago, Harvard, Yale, "Princeton and California, the former provost of the Uni-"versity of Pennsylvania, senators, authors, editors and other "men of national prominence in different walks of life.

"One of the principal objects of the league is to promote "the welfare of the national guard and obtain legislation that "will bring the organized militia into closer relations with "and make it a stronger adjunct of the regular army.

"The Army League, in directing its efforts to obtain an "adequate and efficient military force will favor:

"Military forces for the nation, and not for local inter- "ests.

"Legislation to encourage a reserve and organized militia "as auxiliaries to the regular army.

"A reserve composed of officers and men who have re- "ceived sufficient training previously to make them an effi- "cient force at the beginning of hostilities.

"The league has a long legislative program. Among other "measures it will support will be bills to increase the personnel "of the army and national guard through a reformed system of "promotion for officers; to render the organized militia avail- "able when the regular army is insufficient for military opera- "tions, with provisions for suitable pay; to extend the com- "bined maneuvers for the regular army and organized militia "in larger forces than heretofore, approaching as nearly as "possible to war conditions; to provide adequate sea-coast "troops and reserves, both regular and militia, and to revise "the laws relating to the calling out and organization of volun- "teers.

"The officers of the Army League are:

"President—William C. Endicott, son of the secretary of "war during Mr. Cleveland's first administration.

"Vice Presidents—Robert E. Lee, grandson of General "Robert E. Lee; Robert Bacon, former secretary of state and "ambassador to France, and Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, pres- "ident of the University of California.

"Secretary—Frederic L Huidekoper, well-known mili- "tary writer.

"Treasurer—William B. Hibbs, banker."

And, Whereas, There is an organized movement in all enlightened countries of the world to create and maintain international courts of arbitration to the end that war may be abolished; and,

Whereas, The apparent object of this Army League movement is to counteract and neutralize the aforesaid peace movement and to continue bloody wars, with all their horrible consequences; and,

Whereas, The cost of maintaining the present army and navy of the United States is now a grievous burden upon the people and is yearly increasing; and,

Whereas, If this Army League succeeds in their proposition, thousands of new officers will be created, arms, uniforms, arsenals, frequent traveling expenses, tents reviews, etc., will load upon the people an enormous additional expense; and,

Whereas, This Army League proposition would change time-honored customs, abridge the rights of the respective states and create a great federal army under the command and control of one man; and,

Whereas, This movement is apparently a part of a similar one inaugurated and promoted by European despots; and,

Whereas, History proves that, when their services are required to defend their country, a volunteer army, fresh from shop and farm, after a little drilling, become as efficient soldiers as members of the standing army; and,

Whereas, This Army League movement is clearly intended to, and will, arouse and foster the military spirit of millions of boys and thus indefinitely postpone that much-desired day when all wars will be abolished; now,

Therefore, We, the citizens of the United States, in the interest of peace and to prevent enormous needless expenses from being loaded on a people already heavily burdened, and that the rights of the individual states may not be abridged and the methods of king-ruled countries may not be established in America, do here and now and ever will protest against the legislation proposed by the "Army League of the United States."

(To Solicitors: Secure signatures of both sexes of discretionary age and, on October 1, 1913, mail protest to headquarters of American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., or office of Socialist National party, Chicago, Illinois).

They See Things

PROMINENT MEN in the upper walks of life are realizing that a time is not for distant when the present brutal industrial system must give way before the united power of the victims of exploitation. The murmurs of discontent are growing louder and the army of rebels is increasing. The tyranny of the industrial czar is becoming more unbearable and the slave is reaching the conclusion that it is far better to fight to live than to be peaceful and die slowly from hunger.

Elbert H. Gary, head of the steel trust, at a banquet some time ago, expressed himself as follows:

"There are things being said nowadays which are very similar to things said just before the French revolution. I tell you that the spark may make a flame, and that soon. Unless capitalists, corporations, powerful men themselves, take a leading part in trying to improve the conditions of humanity, great changes will come, and they will come mighty quick, and the mob will bring them."

Ex-President Taft, while in the White House, made the following comment on conditions as he saw them:

"Such extremists (radical progressives) would hurry us into a condition which could find no parallel except in the French revolution or in that bubbling anarchy that once characterized the South American republics. Such extremists are not progressives—they are political emotionalists or neurotics."

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley had the following to say as to the uprising that might come, unless human rights received more favorable recognition:

"I agree thoroughly with Judge Gary of the Steel Corporation that unless something is done to alleviate present conditions of unrest in the nation, mob rule will come."

Bishop D. D. Williams has not been blind to the infamous system that makes brutes of human beings, and in a sermon delivered some time ago, gave his opinion as to what should be done:

"It is not drunkenness that leads to poverty, but poverty that leads to drunkenness. Justice and rightcousness cannot prevail so long as we have people enjoying wealth they did not earn and toiling not. Put them to work for the benefit of mankind. It is getting to the point where people realize that a social conscience is needed, and a general awakening is needed."

Representative George W. Norris had the following to say as to what would ultimately save humanity:

"Evolution, not revolution will be the saving of the country. No better evidence of this could be asked than the attitude of the very representatives of vast aggregations of capital, who are today predicting revolution."

The above opinions are from prominent men in the public life of the nation, and scores of opinions could be offered as expressed by other men of national reputation, who can discern the change that must come ere humanity can enjoy "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

The Control of Bread

WHEN THE INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY decided or threatened to move its twine mills from Auburn, New York, to some place in Germany, it acted quite within its acknowledged rights and, if the move is really made, it will still remain within the territory where it sells its products. The harvester trust is not a local or a national industry; it is ubiquitous; it is international. It leaves in Auburn, or one that it can put through the sweating process which pressed the workers of that locality to the point where they were forced to desperation. It goes to Germany, or threatens to go, because it believes it will find there a supply of labor more docile than Auburn, or one that it can put through the sweating process with greater enrichment of itself—not that it loved Auburn less, but that it loves profits more.

And where is the sacred American flag? Where are the glorious Stars and Stripes? Where are patriotism, honor, devotion to country, desire to see this, the most prosperous nation on the footstool, and all that? They are where the greatest profits are to be made, and the harvester trust believes they are to be made in Germany, or at least it claims so. Its country is the world; to make dividends its religion, and to move to that locality where it thinks it can pay the workers the least wages is its patriotism.

Naturally, when the threat was made, there was a great outcry from the substantial citizens of Auburn. Almost on their bended knees they have been begging the harvester trust to be merciful and stay in fair Auburn. They, too, have interests that must be conserved. If the trust moves and its place is not taken by some other concern, and if the workers employed by the trust are forced to migrate in search of employment, then the dealers in the town and the landlords will be deprived of the opportunity to sell goods and rent houses to just so many persons. The yearly payroll of the trust, it is said, was about $400,000. The loss of that amount in wages means a loss of 20 or 30 per cent of it to the local traders.

All the newspapers feel sorry for the business men of Auburn. It is a blow to the city, nay, a staggering blow. The Empire State is proud of Auburn. It has some beautiful estates and nature has made it a most picturesque spot, though not by permission of the harvester trust. It is a thriving center of industry, adding millions of dollars to the total of our national output, and possessing some most wretched hovels in which the workers crowd.

But while the newspapers, lawyers, politicians and others are sorry for Auburn, they do not express much sorrow for the workers. The workers are responsible. If they had not been so unreasonable in their demands, if they had not insisted on bullying the trust, and if they had not sought to throw a further scare into capital, which is always timid, then the trust would not have been forced to seek shelter in Germany.

The removal of the plant will break up some hundreds of homes. The workers will wearily pack together their few belongings and go to other places where they can sell their labor power. Those who tried to buy a little house will be forced to sacrifice it. Those who gathered together something for a rainy day find that the deluge has come. They must move on, as so large a proportion of the working class is moving on. Millions of them have no fixed home and can have no fixed home. They are driven on and on. Hundreds of thousands of them are merely camping out in the great cities. Hundreds of thousands of them are camping out in the industrial towns and at the mine mouths. The working class is not only subject to precarious employment, but to insecurity of location.

How can there be homes for these workers when they never know how long they can remain in a place? If the harvester trust removes its plant, and serious as that would be for the local workers, it is really insignificant in the great shiftings of industry, it would merely be in line with what has been done before. Capitalist industry has wiped out farms and erected great towns. It has wiped out great towns and left desolation. Just as families were broken up, never to be reunited, through the selling of the father or the mother "down the river," so working-class families are broken, never to be reunited, through the shifting of the labor units, through the depopulation of towns, through the greed that leaves black ruin wherever it sprawls, and through the necessity of the worker following his job. The manufacturer will go where he can get cheap land, or steal it; where he can get cheap water power, or steal it, or where the labor conditions are such that labor may be had cheap. He doesn't care whether it is in Auburn or Germany, Georgia or China, New Orleans or Cuba, Colorado or Mexico. He is going where the combination of raw material and labor will give him the greatest profits, and he does not care whether it is under the sheltering folds of Old Glory, the dragon, the double-headed eagle or the crescent. He does not care what tongue the people speak, what creed they believe, or what color they are. Men, women and children, righteous and unrighteous, old and young, are merely "hands" to him, "hands to be applied to raw material through the medium of his machinery to turn out commodities that he will sell for a sum greater than the combined cost of the use of the hands, the raw material, the wear and tear on the machinery, the supervision of labor, the bookkeeping and the selling expenses. Humanity and patriotism cannot be considered where profits are concerned.

Even those who are now humbly supplicating the harvester trust to be merciful and stay in Auburn would make the city a wilderness if they saw their way to greater incomes. The capitalists are teaching the workers that they have no country. And the workers, for themselves, are slowly learning that all they possess is their mutual interest as workers. They have no "partnership" with capital. There can be nothing between the workers and the capitalist but a temporary truce. For the conflict the capitalist is able to choose the battlefield, as is shown by the ease with which plants can be moved from one place to another, from Auburn to Germany, or from Lawrence to South Carolina or Georgia. But when they get to Germany they will find there also that "labor is unreasonable." And the more "unreasonable" labor is, judged by capitalist standards, the better for itself.—New York Call.

The Shameful Conditions in West Virginia

A SHAMEFUL CONDITION prevails in West Virginia—a condition that ought to cause every decent American to blush, and which, if permitted to exist in Russia would arouse world-wide indignation.

Mother Jones and a large number of officers and members of the United Mine Workers have been languishing in cold, dirty and insanitary jails for weeks without knowing their ultimate fate after being kidnaped and given a farcical trial before a so-called military court, as though a state of war exists where the defendants are entirely unarmed.

In writing to the Citizen from the "Military Bastile" at Pratt, West Virginia, Mother Jones says:

"I was kidnaped on February 12th, while walking along the streets of Charleston, and they brought me twenty-two miles in order to bring me within the martial law zone, so that they might try me before a drumhead military court.

"I refused to concede their right to try me under those circumstances and while the civil courts were in session. But the cowardly whelps of the millionaire operators had their orders and tried us anyhow, and none of the boys, nor do I, know upon what charges we were tried or what sentences we must serve. All that we know is that we are locked up while the flag of liberty is waving over our stockades.

"I am watched day and night by three capitalistic tools, although I am past 80 years of age and would not be able to go very fast if I could make my escape. No one is permitted to see me, and any newspaper man that would dare to approach the gate would be snapped up like a dog and run into the bull-pen. They wrote over the door these fatal and memorable words: 'All hope abandoned ye who enter here.'

"Labor in all its conflicts never met with a more cold-blooded, merciless crew of pirates than we are confronting in this slave-cursed state of West Virginia. They are now attempting to resurrect the methods of the old Spanish inquisition and are testing them out here to see how far they can go. This is a danger to our movement that every union official in the country should understand, and the members as well.

"We have made a great fight against tremendous odds—poor, uneducated, hungry men, women and children on the one side struggling for a little more liberty, and on the other side unlimited wealth, power of the governor, the military, the courts, an army of private thugs and other elements of rottenness and corruption that are a disgrace to civilization.

"If ever I gain my freedom again the country shall know what an infamous crew of plutocrats and their crooked political hirelings are daily conspiring to keep the working class in slavery and subjection in this state. They say I have already put them to an expense of $500,000 to keep their grip on their privileges. Well, I will endeavor to double and treble that amount and fight them until they emancipate my boys and their wives and children from slavery."

The organized working people of this country ought to rise as one man and demand that the authorities at Washington take effective steps without further delay to end the brutal and slavish conditions that exist in West Virginia, and have existed since the Civil War.

Henry Gassaway Davis, the Elkinses, Scotts and other modern feudal barons of the West Virginia mountains are THE REAL TRAITORS TO AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS, not Mother Jones and the poor, oppressed miners.

We want to know, and at once, what President Wilson, William Jennings Bryan, William B. Wilson, secretary of labor, and other members of the Cabinet intend doing about the plutocratic insurrection in West Virginia.

The Washington officials have known since March 4, and doubtless for some time previous to that date, what outrages were being perpetrated in West Virginia.

Why haven't they acted?

WILL THEY ACT NOW?—Cleveland Citizen.

Lest We Forget!

NOW IT'S COMMISSION GOVERNMENT for the state that's proposed as the next great "reform."

The governor of Kansas has recommended to the Legislature that the constitution of the state should be revised to simplify the state government and shorten the ballot.

The Kansas idea is a Legislature composed of highly-paid officials who shall be elected from districts as large as the present congressional districts. They shall be in session continuously and shall perform the administrative duties now entrusted to the several state officers.

There is no blinking the fact that our legislative bodies are often unwieldy—that in the few days, or weeks, or months, in which they are in session they are required to pass upon bills and measures blindly rather than with any knowledge of the facts. Even if they were in session continuously, they could not hope to grapple intelligently with the grist of laws which they enact.

At the best, the Legislature enacts that which the class that has created public opinion has decreed and the form of which has been indicated by the intelligence of its actual authors. It is only when a legislative body initiates measures from its own consciousness that we are confronted with the freak legislation which is peculiar to the statesman who assumes that he was brought into the world that his fellow-men might benefit from his superior capacity to govern.

The conception of the legislator as a Moses, who, from his inner consciousness, perceives what is right and what is wrong and makes laws that humanity henceforth may be guided aright down through the ages, is the basis of the small and "select" legislative body "reform" with which it is proposed to bless the American people. As against this, we have the direct legislation proposal, based on the assumption that public opinion is flouted by legislative bodies and that we shall not have the will of the people, or the will of God, expressed in the laws of the land until a majority shall be given opportunity to pass directly upon the statutes provided and enacted in the name of the people.

Commission government is a reaction from representative government precisely as the initiative, referendum and recall indicate impatience with representative institutions. The commission form reacts toward the aristocratic or monarchial ideal, while the referendum reaction is toward the ideal of pure democracy. The net result will probably be that the two forces will so neutralize each other that we shall have neither pure democracy nor the ideal of government "taken out of politics," which finds its final expression in absolutism.

There is no occasion for any citizen to worry over the common council or the Legislature or Congress lest needed laws shall not be properly enacted. When there is anything vitally at stake, we may be sure that our lords and masters will put men on the job. There's no bungling when their interests are involved. For the rest of us, it really doesn't matter much, even if the laws providing that bed sheets shall be seven feet long or that no one shall dance the turkey trot without the mayor's permission, or that ash pans shall be no larger than a cellar window or that cigarettes shall not be smoked or unvaccinated citizens permitted to attend the opera without a physician's certificate, shall come in conflict with the constitution or prove to be defective in their phraseology.

It doesn't matter much whether laws shall be enacted directly, by representatives or by large legislative or small legislative bodies, we may be sure that no laws of any consequence will be enacted that are disapproved by or are injurious to the dominant class. The question to be decided—the only issue of consequence—is, which class shall be dominant—the class that is doing the work and producing the wealth of the nation or the class that is absorbing it without giving any adequate service to society in return. No class, when it is in possession of the powers of government, has ever had any difficulty in enacting the kind of laws that it needed. It's the class that isn't in possession, but which is seeking to obtain power, that meets with obstacles and difficulties. The measures which it demands are quite sure to be "blunders" when passed upon by the higher authorities.

It's unconstitutional for Dred Scott to assert that he's a free man when his owner is the government.—Milwaukee Leader.

Against the Red Flag

IN THE LEGISLATURE of Connecticut the following bill was introduced, having for its object the prohibition of the red flag being borne in any parade:

"HOUSE BILL NO. 266.

"An Act Concerning Public Processions, Parades and Outdoor Meetings. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in general assembly convened:

"Section 1. No public procession, parade or outdoor meeting shall be held in any town, city or borough of this state, without a permit which in towns shall be granted by the selectmen, in boroughs by the warden, and in cities by the chief officer of the police department.

"Section 2. The authority issuing the permit shall state on the permit the kind and character of flags or banners which may be carried in the procession or parade, or exhibited at the outdoor meeting, and no flag or banner not described on the permit shall be carried in any parade or exhibited at any outdoor meeting.

"Section 3. Every person who shall violate the provisions of Section 1 or Section 2 of this act shall be fined not more than $200, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

"Section 4. This act shall not apply to parades, processions, or public meetings of the soldiers or sailors of the United States army or navy, or to the soldiers and sailors of the army or navy of this state, or to the soldiers or sailors of the army or navy of any other state or foreign country temporarily within this state."

The above measure was supported by representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic and by a number of prominent ministers of the gospel, who openly declared that the bill was aimed to make it unlawful for members of the working class to bear the crimson banner in a public parade.

The bill was opposed by representatives of organized labor and of the Socialist party, on the grounds that labor bodies had the right to carry the banner of their respective organizations, and the Socialist representatives contended that the red flag stood for liberty and humanity.

The measure in the Legislature of Connecticut clearly demonstrates the fact that the class struggle is here, and that capitalism does not propose to permit the proletaire to march beneath the folds of a banner that represents principles not in harmony with the ethics of the pirates of privilege. The workers of the world are realizing that the flag of every nation belongs to a master class, and that the flag of every nation is borne aloft by the armed force of every nation, in every conflict between exploiter and exploited to crush the rebellion of the impoverished against industrial tyranny.

The economic masters of the world have decreed that labor shall have no flag save the flags that belong to that organized horde whose economic power controls the government of nations.

A Bait for Suckers

UNDER THE HEAD of Sabotage, we find the following advertisement published in an exchange:

"If a thousand wage workers could go on strike and keep on drawing their wages just the same, they ought to win. Doesn't it look so?

"Suppose they stay in the shop, but work in such a way that the boss loses money on them instead of making money? The capitalists say this is immoral. So do some Socialists. What do you think?

"First you need to know more about it, don't you? That is why we have just published the new book, 'Sabotage,' by Emile Pouget. This is the classic work on the subject, telling how this new weapon is used by the workingmen of Europe. It was translated by Arturo Giovannitti while the capitalists kept him in jail last summer. He also wrote an introduction.

"Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, postpaid. Address Charles H Kerr & Co., 118 West Kinzie street, Chicago."

A number of the professional jawsmiths of the I. W. W., when pressed closely as to sabotage, evade and dodge giving a straight answer. But here is a publishing firm of Chicago that publishes a magazine known as the International Socialist, that solicits subscriptions to a new book on sabotage.

To make the book appeal to the thoughtless and unsophisticated, Mr. Kerr, Socialist-Syndicalist and advocate of any old thing that draws revenue, inserts in his advertisement: "If a thousand wage workers could go on strike and keep on drawing their wages just the same, they ought to win. Doesn't it look so?"

The above paragraph is a poser and should bring the ducats to Mr. Kerr. Just think of the simple capitalists being so verdant and childlike in their simplicity as to permit the strikers to draw their wages while they were on strike!

In the second paragraph of the ad the strikers are supposed to "stay in the shop, but work in such a way that the boss loses money on them instead of making money? How beautiful!

Who would have thought of such a brilliant scheme to so hypnotize the capitalist that he would permit strikers to remain in his shop while he was losing money? Strange that the Direct Actionists and apostles of sabotage did not try the scheme at Lawrence, McKees Rocks, Paterson, Spokane, San Diego and every other place from which they sent out circulars pleading for funds for soup.

The advertisement of the Kerr Publishing Company may appeal to numb-skulls and lunatics, but not to men who lay any claim to intelligence.

San Diego Free Speech Facts Made Public

THE INSIDE FACTS in the famous "free speech" fight made some time ago in San Diego are given in an article by Ralph Korngold in the Social-Democratic Herald, which make it appear that the victims of the fight were themselves to blame for the trouble. Speaking for both the secretary and treasurer of the San Diego Free Speech League the statement is made that:

Both men are emphatic in their statement that if it had not been for the language and tactics employed by the majority of the I. W. W. speakers, there never would have been a free speech fight in San Diego, nor would any restrictive ordinances have been passed.

The article continues:

"Most of the I. W. W. organizers who came to San Diego to speak," said Baner, "used language upon the street corners such as would not be tolerated in any civilized community. They were foul-mothed and vile. They did not preach industrial unionism, or at least devoted very little time to that subject. They either attacked the Socialist party or devoted themselves to the slinging of vile epithets, such as calling the police 'dogs' and 'pimps.' As a result, they inflamed the people and the police, and the restricted district ordinance was passed. As this ordinance included all other organizations, the Socialist party decided to make common cause with the I. W. W. in order to maintain free speech, although once more I want to repeat that we would not have had to meet this situation if it had not been for the I. W. W. speeches and tactics."

The Free Speech League intended to place one or two speakers on the streets in an orderly manner and not so as to inflame the public against them, but simply to bring a test case. But the I. W. W. began to send men, a large number of whom seemed to have come simply for the purpose of obtaining free food and lodgings. As a result the fight ended in a complete fiasco.

Mr. Bauer, treasurer of the league, ends his statement by saying:

"We want to serve notice on Haywood or any one else that the I. W. W. will never again be able to create any situations for the comrades of San Diego to meet."

The above statements should leave an impression upon the minds of men whose sympathies in the past were touched by the circular letters of the "bummery" pleading for funds under the pretext that free speech was throttled in San Diego.

The professionals worked the free-speech fiasco to a finish, and now the Socialist party of San Diego, through its officials, is making known the fact that organized labor and the Socialist party were imposed upon by the shameless vagrants who gathered in San Diego merely to be fed and lodged upon the money fraudulently obtained from those who were not familiar with the swindling tactics of an aggregation whose presence in a "red light" district would lower the moral standard of the social outcast.

The "bummery" is no more a part of the labor movement than an unblushing hypocrite is a part of Christianity.

The Red Flag Proscribed

THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA now boasts of a law that prohibits the carrying of the red flag in public parades.

A legislator by the name of Walton introduced the bill, and the measure was duly signed by the governor.

It is probable that the Legislature of Pennsylvania and the governor who signed the bill entertained the opinion that the passage of such a measure would strangle rebellion against brutal industrial conditions and cause the poverty-stricken wretches of the Keystone State to turn to the Stars and Stripes with a new-born belief that "Old Glory" stands for "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

But while the memory of the vast majority of the laboring people is faulty and prone to forget many of the wrongs perpetrated under the folds of Columbia's banner, yet there are some wrongs that are so indelibly engraved upon the memory of labor which will live until wrong is righted by the united power of slaves becoming men.

Labor does not forget that under the Stars and Stripes 1,200 men were held in bull-pens in the Couer d'Alenes, while black brutes in the uniform of soldiers insulted their mothers, wives, sisters and daughters.

Labor does not forget that while the representatives of toil marched beneath the starry banner at Latimer, Pennsylvania, a sheriff with his blood-thirsty hirelings, "shot to kill" the law-abiding citizens who believed that every star and stripe on the American flag stood for equal rights and constitutional liberty.

Labor does not forget the outrages committed in Cripple Creek and the southern coal fields of Colorado, where human rights were assassinated, while "Old Glory" floated over the military outlaws who executed the orders of a master class.

Labor cannot forget that in West Virginia the coal barons and railway magnates have used the flag and the soldiers to still further enslave the starved victims of wage slavery.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania that passed such a measure and the governor who signed it will yet learn that laws will not command respect for a flag that has been prostituted to subserve the interests of insatiable greed.

AN EXPLANATION.

New York, April 14, 1913.

The Miners' Magazine:

When the present management of the Metropolitan Magazine assumed control some sixteen months ago and changed the previous policy to that of espousing the Socialist cause, they found themselves tied up with a contract for the printing of the magazine with a non-union concern in this city. Numerous inquiries and complaints from Socialists and others reached this headquarters, and the undersigned officers of Typographical Union No. 6 called on Mr. Whigham, the president, who promised that when the existing contract expired the magazine would thereafter be printed in a union printing establishment.

We write this letter to inform all trade unionists and Socialists that Mr. Whigham has kept his word with the union and that the Metropolitan Magazine is now printed in a strictly union printing office in this city.

Very truly yours,

C. M. MAXWELL,
President.

Secretary-Treasurer.

AN APPEAL TO DEBAUCHERY.

By Paul H. Castle.

Much has been said and written about the glowing advertisements of the military to induce young men to enlist in the army and navy.

The recruiting officer, having failed to induce a sufficient number of young men to enlist in the service of our capitalistic war forces by talking of good wages, education, travel and chances for promotion, has struck upon a new device of appealing to the most depraved and immoral instincts of the animal nature

In the past few months I have traveled from Florida to North Dakota, and I have seen in many postoffices in all this wide range of territory an army poster that ought to arouse the indignation and sense of shame in the mind of every decent father and mother of boys eligible to army service.

The poster in question, among other alluring pitcures, portrays the soldier boys in some coast town being entertained by the lewd dances of some of the denizens of the redlight district.

That this poster has the desired effect was well illustrated to me a few days ago when one of the Socialist comrades in a small North Dakota town told me of a conversation he overheard between two young men who were looking at the poster when one of them remarked, pointing at the lewd women, "There is where we can have a good time!" There is no doubt what the young man meant by a "good time."

You fathers and mothers, go down to your postoffice and look a tthis poster put before your sons, printed in lewd pictures ,that they may have an opportunity while traveling with the navy to participate in the most dangerous profligacy.

Now another word: What has become of all those prudish sex purity fanatics who are so keen to discover immorality in the plain, scientific teachings in sexology, and whose foolish censorship compels sane educational articles on the sex question to be eliminated from worthy magazines? Why are these prudish hypocrites silent while the demoralizing influences of the money lust forces our recruiting officers to advertise debauchery as an inducement to get our young men to enlist for legalized murder?

These canting hypocrites who cry out that Socialism is immoral and will debauch the youth of the land had better pay more attention to cleaning up the present dirty system of its social filth before they pose as models of virtue and censors of the public morals.

INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY.

By Jean Jaures.

For the twenty-fifth time May Day, this year, reunites in one international demonstration the organized working class of two worlds in their affirmation of solidarity without distinction of frontiers, and in a mighty declaration of their determination to overthrow the forces which plunder and murder their class, and endanger the peace of the world.

At this moment when the struggle between capitalism and labor is at its height—

At this moment when governments place more and more at the disposal of privilege and capitalism all their forces, both military and police, in order to suppress the workers who are claiming a little more of their due—

At this crisis it is imperative that the organized workers everywhere should signify to the capitalistic classes that they have tolerated long enough a régime founded on the bondage and subjection of the producers.

Let us be stirring, so that on May Day we may demonstrate in one body that the workers of all countries are ready to recover their rights; ready also to oppose the plots of capitalism and of governments which endanger international peace.

Let us affirm with vigor our demand for the limitation of working hours to eight a day

Let us prove by our action that the working class will not rest content until it has secured the complete control of the means of production and exchange, the possession of which is the condition of its emancipation.

WHERE IT WILL STAND.

Written for The Melting Pot, by Theodore Debs.

"Where stand the churches of this nation as to the issue of a minimum wage for working girls?"—Terre Haute Post.

Where will the church an an institution stand?

It will stand where it stood almost two thousand years ago, when the white, quivering flesh of Jesus Christ was spiked to the cross.

It will stand where it stood when babes were torn from their mothers' breasts and "knocked down" from the slave block.

It will stand where it has stood through all the history of the past—under the protecting wing of the ruling and exploiting class—what palsied hand, sightless eyes, and tongue as silent as the dead.

Under a capitalist regime it does not require keen penetration to discern where the church will stand when the profits of the ruling class are in the balance.

In every situation involving the profits of the exploiting class the institutional church has stood with the strong, the powerful, and against the weak and oppressed.

When monstrous crimes are inflicted upon the working class the church stands mute and dumb.

The Morgans, Rockefellers, Baers and their kind are the direct beneficiaries of the terrible wrongs which the "lower" class suffer and it is from this class, the ruling class, that the church receives its main support.

Economic determinism has and will continue to fix the status of the church in all matters touching the profits of the capitalist class as long as capitalism is king.

The Post will ask in vain for an affirmative expression from the church on the subject of a living wage for working girls.

With sanctimonious cant the institutional church will turn its Pharisaic features heavenward, roll its eyes in pious resignation, but not a sound will escape its coward lips.

ANOTHER FAKE EXPLODED.

Rich Gold Ores Reported in Oklahoma, Have, According to Geological Survey, About Same Value as Sea Water.

During the past winter there have been persistent reports of the discovery of gold and other valuable ores in the vicinity of Albion, Pushmataha county, Oklahoma, some finds being reported as exceeding $60 a ton and some even as approaching a value of $600 a ton. It has been known in the Interior Department that several "mining companies" have been or are being organized on the basis of these assertions and that many persons have been induced to invest in the stock. The excitement produced by the alleged rich values has resulted in requests for an authoritative eaxmination of the lands and the temporary suspension of the sales of the tracts of Indian lands on or near which the supposed finds were located. Although from its general knowledge of the geology of the region the Geological Survey reported that there is no likelihood that the area contains commercial quantities of gold, the reports and the demands were so persistent that by direction of the Secretary of the Interior a field examination was made last month by Henry G. Ferguson, associate geologist of the Survey. Mr. Ferguson reports the entire absence, so far as can be recognized in the field, of gold or other metals in commercial quantities. There is not the slightest indication of any vein or metalliferous deposit of such character as to increase the market value of the land. The rocks in the region consist of chert, shale and sandstone, carrying here and there small amounts of pyrite, which is known to the miner as "fool's gold." None of the supposed rich ore, which is generally a brown or gray standstone, when crushed and panned yielded any free gold.

Salted Samples or Fraudulent Assay Certificates?

The entire local excitement appears to be based on certain fabulously high assays made chiefly on material dug from wells. Assay certificates which reported as much as 32 ounces of gold a ton were shown to Geologist Ferguson, but samples of the supposed gold ore, collected by him and assayed by Ledoux & Co., of New York, showed less than 2 cents in gold and ½ cent silver to the ton. The assey certificates which are being shown by the promoters are therefore either directly or indirectly fraudulent in character.

OH, WHEN THINGS ARE WRONG, JUST HAVE AN INVESTIGATION.

By Patsy O'Bang.

The nineetenth century will always be looked upon as the era of invention. The first fifteen years of the twentieth century will always be looked upon as the era of investigation. The twenty-five years following that will be the great years of reform in social life.

It's the fifteen years of "investigation" that I am concerned with in this piece for the paper.

Here's what investigation means:

When the people get sick of an evil, when the people get disgusted with a wrong, just have some legislature appoint a commission to "investigate" it —and then, let it go at that.

Are there hundreds of thousands of child slaves? Oh, appoint a commission to spend five years at a hundred dollars a day to "look into it." And, after it reports back that there are child slaves—as we all know—then let the matter go at that.

Are there vast armies of women held as white slaves? Oh, have a commission appointed to ask a lot of questions, report back three or four years later—and let it go at that!

Investigate! Investigate! That's the mania just now. And yet, any schoolboy knows that great wrongs are blotting our social life.

But the putterers in governmental life aren't concerned with changing things—they merely want to investigate—and let it go at that.

It's like sending a crew up to the North Pole to find out if it's cold up there. With thermometers costing anywhere from fifteen cents to a dollar and a quarter we don't need to spend a hundred thousand dollars to learn that it is cold up at the North Pole. And yet, that idea is carried into our social life. We appoint men to "investigate" evils, but never hear of anything being done to wipe away the causes of evils.

The people are growing tired of this "investigation" tommyrot. They want something more than an "investigation"—they want relief.

We know there are many unemployed persons in this country and we know that conditions will not be remedied by merely "investigating" matters.

It's a splendid way to dodge a question, though. While the people are excited, "investigate," and when the excitement is switched over to baseball or a prize fight, forget all about it. Oh, it's a dandy stunt. But its days are numbered.

POLITICAL ORGANIZATION.

By Hugh McGee.

We are living under a system of government which is known as a political organization and it is called a democracy or rule of all the people.

This system is expressed by and through one of the organizations which is given the reins of power by a part of the voters every four years.

However, on account of the granting of special privileges and exemptions to corporations and individuals by the organization which is given control of the government by a plurality of the voters, our system of government is proven to be democratic in name only.

A perfect democracy is an organization of all the people.

A perfect democracy would consider the safety and well-being and advancement of all the people, all the time.

A perfect democracy would distribute equally to every man, woman and child every benefit that the government could bestow.

Under a system of perfect democracy, special privileges and unequal exemptions would be abolished and every man, woman and child would share equitably all the benefits of modern civilization.

One great fact stands out boldly today and that is the fact that the trend of community life is steadily moving toward an organization of perfect democracy or Socialism.

Socialism or the Socialist state, simply defined, is perfect democracy.

In the United States, at the present time ,there are only fourteen million men and one million women who are privileged to vote, and these fifteen million voters keep in power either one of the two capitalist political organizations known as the Democratic and Republican parties.

Those who profit by the existence and nower of the Democratic or Republican organizations are not the voters, but the office holders who work very little and live very well, and the business men and big corporations which are given special privileges and exemptions by the office holders or so-called public servants, the officials of the organization in power.

The three million voters who voted for the Republican organization last year are not in any sense members of the organization known as the Republican party. They are merely ignorant tools of the organization.

The six million voters who placed the Democratic organization in control of the government last fall will not get any of the benefits or privileges or exemptions which the organization hands out during the next four years as they are not members of the organization. They are merely ignorant tools of the organization.

The new political organization, the "BULL-CON" party, which was formed by Roosevelt and his friends, if it had succeeded in getting control of the government, would not have helped anyone but the office holders and the few capitalists who formed the organization.

The Socialist political organization was formed by workingmen for workingmen.

It is financed by workingmen and when it gets control of the powers of government it will make all laws and interpret all laws and enforce all the laws in the interest of workingmen.

It will grant equal privileges to all and special privileges to none.

In a few words the Socialist party stands for a square deal for every man, woman and child.

There are not more than five hundred thousand persons who profit by the success of the Democratic party or the Republican Party when they are in control of the government and in a nation of a hundred million souls such a condition is neither Democracy nor a square deal.

A square deal for all the people can only be obtained by collective industries instead of private monopolies and that issue is the one great public question which must be decided by the voters of the United States.

LASH THEM WHO MADE THE LAW.

By R. A. Dague.

This in many respects is a glorious age of invention and progress, but in some things we have not advanced much beyond the savage. In the matter of treating criminals we are about as cruel as are the inhabitants of Central Africa. We take little account of heredity, prenatal influences and early environments of the criminals so-called.

Wilbur D. Nesbit very truly and forcibly voices the complaint of the scourged inmates of our prisons in the following lines under the heading of "Punishment." He says:

"Yuh got me back all bloody-bare, th' cat is in yer hand;
Yuh've kept the count, an' some to spare, an' I can hardly stand.
Don't hang th' cat up till ye're done; you've lashed me to me shame—
Now go an' lash 'em one by one—th' folks that is to blame.

"Go back a century or so, an' trace it to its start—
Th' cunnin' notions deep an' low, th' crime that found me heart.
There's men back there, an' wimmen, too, that gave their thought an' deed
To build the soul that in me grew all warped to fit my need.

"Go back and find the men that lied, and stole—but wasn't caught;
Th' wimmen with deceitful pride—whose soft words come to nought;
Go back an' lash 'em, one by one, an' then don't think ye're through—
The punishin' will not be done; there's more for ye to do.

"Go find the alley where I come, unwelcome, to this earth—
A part o' human nature's sucm, a bad 'un from my birth;
Go find the folks that let us be, contented with our dirt—
They've got to take some blame for me, they've got to feel my hurt.

"Go find the folks that made the law an' never put in love,
That thought that what they never saw was done by God above!
Go lash the good ones! Them that drew away in righteous scorn
From alley and from hovel, too—th' place where I was born.

"God knows that I am bad enough an' never had a name,
But High-Heeled Shoe an' Spotless Cuff has got to share th' blame.
W'y, just a word, a look, a smile that they would never miss
Might ha' made me go straight awhile, might ha' kep' me from this.

"Yuh've got me back all bloody-bare, th' cat has left its sting;
I ain't a man, so you don't care—to you I'm just a Thing.
But who made me a Thing, I say? All right, I'll do my time,
But lots o' you on Judgment Day will share with me my crime!"

I hope that lawmakers and judges and clergymen and teachers will read the above lines again and again, for they contain more truth than a thousand average sermons or a whole volume of laws for the punishment of criminals. Capitalism is responsible for a great majority of the crimes of the present age. There is little ground for hope that crime will be diminished until Socialism has been established. Under the present system of competition, or capitalism, a higher estimate is placed upon the dollar than upon the man. Under Socialism the rights and well being of humanity will be regarded as more to be desired than dollars. Socialism will go back and—

"Find the alley where I come, unwelcome, to this earth—
A part of human nature's scum, a bad 'un from my birth."

Socialism will abolish the alley and the slums, and by establishing a cooperative commonwealth and improving the material conditions of the submerged peoples, will diminish, if not entirely abolish squalor, ignorance and crime, and push humanity up to a higher level.

Now, competition, strife, greed and cruelty are in the saddle. When Socialism comes in all its fullness, justice, a square deal for all and kindness will rule.

THE ARMAMENT CRAZE.

An Unmistakable Manifestation of the Unsoundness of Capitalist Society.

Big increases in the armies of Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary and France are foreshadowed. A "remarkable wave of enthusiasm" is said, by the plutocratic press, to be sweeping over France. According to the "North German Gazette," the additional expenditure of Germany is to be met by a fortune tax, thus making the rich pay for it. This is apparently a dodge to soothe the workers. That it has been mooted at all testifies to the growth of the Socialist propaganda. The increases in the war votes signify little. The maintenance of big armies and navies is one of the means by which the plutocracy gets rid of the "superfluous wealth of the country in order that production may continue. Production is continually increasing, therefore the waste must also increase, so long as plutocracy rules. On this point the following London cablegram has some bearing:

"The Westminster Gazette states that one result of the Balkan war is now seen in the competition in armaments, but it has not increased the war prospects. The Gazette endorses strongly the manifesto of the German and French Socialists affirming that the mass of people desire peace."

As the Westminster says, the increase in the war votes does not signify that war is any nearer. In by-gone days this armament hysteria would have had a very serious significance. At such periods the plutocratic press and "diplomacy" had only to give the signal, at a word from the big financiers, and nations were involved in war. Those days have gone. The plutocratic press and the diplomats no longer influence the public as they once did, and the money trust knows it. The producers on all hands are declaring against war, for they now realize that war, under present conditions, represents simply a grab by financiers for fresh markets and concessions, and a means of getting rid of inconvenient wealth. As the cost of war is eventually paid by the producers, both in money and blood, the workers now refuse to have anything to do with it. The manifesto referred to by the Westminster Gazette is that issued by the Basel (Switzerland) Conference of International Socialists. The conference, representing seven million workers in various lands, carried a resolution, at the instance of Keir Hardie of England and Vaillant of France, in favor of a general strike in the event of war breaking out between the larger powers. A declaration of war in Europe, therefore, will reduce that continent to a condition of chaos unparalleled in its history, probably resulting in the overthrow of a tottering capitalism. High finance (very "high") doesn't want a catastrophe of that sort, hence the increase of the army votes has very little significance. The increase, however, will serve to emphasize the wanton and criminal waste of the capitalistic system. The stronger the determination of the producers of wealth to discountenance war the less is the need for armaments.

In the face of this truism the expenditure on "peace" is increasing!

The anomaly arises from the fact that while the workers can decline to slay their fellow-workers across the border, or be slain by them, they cannot yet control "diplomacy," or "government," both of which are under the thumb of High Finance. Now, the very existence of High Finance depends on a steady waste of wealth, for unless wealth is used up somehow, production cannot go on.

The maintenance of armies and navies is an excellent way of wasting wealth in the view of High Finance, because it has hitherto been able to convince the producers of wealth that armies and navies were necessary, and so the wastage has gone on without much notice or comment. When wealth is wasted in other ways the criminality of the proceeding becomes apparent. Suppose, for instance, armaments were abolished; then the interest lords and rent lords of Europe would find wealth crowding upon them faster than they could use it. All the freak entertainments and freak pastimes and gluttony and gorgeousness which could be invented would not suffice to get rid of the wealth rolling in.

Then would the world suddenly realize the startling idiocy and criminality of the present economic system, now rendered utterly out-of-date by the tremendous increase in production through the aid of wondrous machinery. But High Finance desires to stall off awakening. If it is prevented wasting it on an increase of the army and navy vote; but the awakening is happening, all right.—Westratian Worker.

REPORT OF BOARD MEMBER MILLER.

South Porcupine, Ont., April 7, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

Many instructive things well worthy of record happen in every strike, but he who has anything else to do will hardly write them all down. Here as everywhere the powers that be use all their energies to subdue the worker; he is beneath the law; the employer above it.

The appeals of Holwatsky and Cleary, found guilty by the local magistrate of inciting a strike in violation of the Lemioux act, and Croft of striking in violation of the act were heard by Judge Kehoe on the 26th ult. The decision turned on a technical point. The act forbids a strike in the mining industry or on public utilities without first submitting the dispute to a board of investigation and conciliation; it also forbids a strike pending the decision of the board.

The decision in the cases of Holowatsky and Croft were reversed, Cleary's conviction was sustained. The prosecution failed to show that there was any dispute between the Hollinger Mining Company and its employés at the time they went on strike, therefore no law was violated. The evidence seemed to show that Cleary was on the ground of the company after part of the men had quit work and a dispute had arisen, his conviction was therefore sustained.

Our attorney, A. G. Slaght, showed that under the act men might take concerted action to quit work, provided that the quitting had nothing to do with the conditions of employment, wages, hours, etc. For instance a new gold discovery might be announced, the men hold a meeting, decide to go in a body to the new district and locate claims, but no action would lie against them. The court accepted his reasoning.

The law is supposed to guard the interests of the "public" by preventing any sudden change in conditions that may involve a strike on the one side or a lockout on the other by providing for the submission of the question to a board composed of a representative of the employer, the employés and a neutral (?) member. In case the two members cannot agree on a third party, he is appointed by the government.

A practical illustration of the working of the law is shown here where Robbins, manager of the Hollinger Company, reduced the wages of his employés a day or two after the strike had occurred and when asked about it in court had replied that he did not know that it was against the law. Which shows that ignorance is a good defense for the rich but no good for the poor. He also showed the same amiable quality just after the fire that desolated Porcupine and left the workers unable to resist. His advice at the time of the strike was to vote right and the strike would be unnecessary. Oh, no, he was not pointing the way to freedom; not intentionally, anyway; simply trying to discourage the men.

By piecing together his various reports one learns that the Hollinger treasury is lower by half a million than at the beginning of the strike. Of this $100,000 went for police protection, i. e., Thiel detectives. It was a pure gratuity, companies making no contribution to the Thiels suffering no loss. While the police have worked in kindly co-operation with the detectives, Mr. Robbins is bitter in his criticism of the government for failure to afford him protection—which shows how impossible it is to please men of his stamp.

Another instance shows the attitude of the Hollinger Company toward "law and order." A hockey match was played in South Porcupine by the Hollinger team. While here they purchased white handkerchiefs and tied them around their necks to mark them, made their way to the union mess house in Timmons, invited the men out to fight (there were but five or six at the time in the hall), using unprintable language. This bunch of desirables was led by McCoy, one of the officials of the Hollinger. Later the mayor threatened to read the riot act to them. A day or two later five Hollinger men came into Timmons in a fighting mood, started a row in a saloon and got more trouble than they could take away with them. Eight union men were arrested on a charge of assault and held under $500 bail. Just before being brought to trial the charge was changed to unlawful assembly. Three men are held under that charge to appear at North Bay before the district assizes, under $1,000 bail.

The membership are in receipt of a circular letter sent out by No. 145 when there was a very small attendance. It seems to have been timed to arrive at about the same time as the Industrial Worker, carrying an article which, after many slanders, revealed its purport and that of many similar articles at in advocating the substitution of the I. W. W. for the W. F. M. in Ontario. To divide is some men's idea of solidarity. In that article there is a statement that there are at least 100,000 workers engaged in mining and correlative industries in eastern Canada. Government reports state that there are 9,500 underground workers in Ontario, in all 15,500 men engaged in mining and correlative industries in Ontario, 10,000 in the other eastern provinces would be a liberal estimate. The articel came more nearly approximating the truth in giving the number of men engaged than in most other matters.

Some small properties are expected to start up soon fair to the union. Development work is at a standstill in the mines of the district. Many scabs are leaving, but few coming in. Men are hopeful and standing firm.

Fraternally,
GUY E. MILLER.

IS SOCIALISM HARD TO LIVE UP TO AS CAPITALISTS ALLEGE?

By R. A Dague.

A Chicago paper recently said: "The late John Arbuckle, the coffee king, once said of Socialism:

"'Socialism is, in a word, the golden rule. It is excellent in theory, but worthless in practice—for human nature is incapable of living up to it.

"'The proof of this lies in the Socialists themselves. Study the Socialists in their organizations, their clubs and their homes—they are selfish and vindictive, just like the rest of us.

"'Socialism, in this imperfect and selfish age, means, not the division of your wealth with your brother man; it means the division of your brother man's wealth with you.'"

Others beside Mr. Arbuckle use similar arguments. They say:

"Socialism has high aims; it advocates the golden rule; it is what Jesus taught; is excellent in theory but can never be put in practice; Jesus was mistaken; people are naturally so bad that no improvement can be made in government; the smart thieves must always be allowed to steal; people must forever be dishonest; virtue and honesty must ever go to the scaffold and the cross, while thievery and dishonesty must ever sit on the throne. The desirable, the just, the good, must fail always; the wrong must triumph forever."

Socialists hope for better things. They will work for high ideals, believing sometime they will be reached. They believe, with the poet, that—

"Ever the truth comes uppermost
And ever is justice done."

Socialists do not agree with the statement of Mr. Arbuckle that Socialism cannot be inaugurated until selfishness is eliminated from all the people. While Socialism has high aims and makes appeals to the better impulses of men, yet Socialists are not proposing to make all people unselfish and good. The chief thing they are trying to do is to bring about the adoption of an industrial system, under which the crafty and greedy few shall not be able to take from the honest but often stupid working people five of every six dollars they earn, without giving anything in return therefor, as they have been been doing for fifty years, until ten thousand shrewd speculators now own more wealth than is possessed by ninety millions of people and the country is on the verge of a bloody revolution. Socialists say disaster may be averted by the inauguration of a co-operative commonwealth in which every worker with head or hand will receive the full value of his labor, and speculation, stock-making and a system by which shrewd men gain vast wealth for nothing, will be displaced.

People complain of the trusts, and Democrats propose to smash them, but Socialists say the evil is not in the trusts themselves but in their ownership by individuals for private profit. They say trust sare good, for those who own them; therefore let the nation own them, and all the benefits go to the people collectively.

Socialists are trying to induce the people to change the representative features of this government, under which gigantic corruption prospers, and to establish a democracy in which the people will govern themselves by direct legislation, through the initiative, referendum and recall.

Mr. Arbuckle's often exploded and silly statement that "Socialists want to divide up existing property," is not worthy of an answer.

The entire fundamental proposition of Socialism is contained in the statement that "Every adult person should be a worker with head or hand in some useful occupation, and receive the full value of his labor."

Under the present competitive system the average worker gets but one dollar of each six dollars that he earns. Undr this system the wealth of the nation is going into the pockets of a few men who do no useful labor, until those few own ninety per cent. of the total wealth of the nation.

Socialists contend that while they do hold to high ideals yet all their demands are practical and will not be hard to live up to. All the diivding-up for which they contend is an honest, fair divide, in which each citizen shall receive what he earns and not a dollar more. They propose a system that will put a stop to child slavery, stock watering, Wall Street gambling and the exploitation of working people by a few crafty speculators and gamblers who acquire great mountains of wealth without returning any value therefor.

Mr. Arbuckle, and other captains of industry, insist that their "incentives" to trick the masses out of millions must not be curbed. They must be allowed to have had full play for their "incentives" until they have come into the ownership of ninety per cent. of all the wealth of the country, while fifty millions of people are propertyless. Thomas W. Lawson, a millionaire, and one of them, admits that forty billions of watered and fraudulent stocks have been foisted on the people, and he predicts a violent revolution before vultures are extinguished.

Socialists propose that the nation, state ,county and city acquire the ownership of public utilities and the means of producing and distributing wealth, and let the earning or profits go back to the people, and that the monopolizing of public necessities by individuals for private profit shall stop. This, they say, will prevent the impoverishing of the masses, and avert labor strikes, violence and bloodshed. The proposition is a simple, just, plain, common-sense one, and would not only be easily and peacefully inaugurated, but one not at all hard to live up to. The people of the United States are now carrying on many useful enterprises collectively or Socialistically. such as carrying the mails and parcel post, the public school, irrigating the arid lands and digging the Panama canal.

Uncle Sam constructs great warships, arsenals, forts, powder mills and gun factories with which to kill people. Why should he not build factories and railroads and operate coal mines and farms, etc., to help people to live and rear children and build up a better civilization?

It is not at all necessary that everybody shauld be saints or pure, unselfish angels before we can have a decent industrial system and a few laws to stop a few human hogs from devouring all the swill.

The people are capable, Mr. Arbuckle, of living up to a few simple, honest rules adopted to prevent the inflated incentives of a few great financiers from gobbling up five-sixths of the earnings of other people by speculation and smart financiering.

A certain amount of selfishness in this world is necessary—is right and Socialists are selfish enough to insist on the right to enjoy a greater proportion of what they have earned than they have heretofore been allowed to keep. They do not, however, believe that the right can never succeed and that the wrong must forever triumph.

IS THE PRESENT CIVILIZATION CHRISTIAN?

By R. A. Dague.

(Author of Henry Ashton: What Is Capitalism: What is Socialism? etc., etc.)

"To safeguard peace we must prepare for war"—
I know that maxim; it was forged in hell.
This wealth of ships and guns inflames the vulgar
And makes the very war it guards against.
The God of War is now a man of business,
With vested interests.

—Israel Zangwill.

"It hung above the postoffice door, and this is what it said: 'WANTED—YOUNG MEN TO GO TO WAR'—that's how the poster read. 'Peace on earth, good will toward men' is nothing for us to heed, for we are the wolves of the jungle den and ours is the god of greed, and the wild war whoop will never cease where the wolf whelps buy and sell—so CURSE 'good will' and the way of 'Peace,' for ours is the way of hell! And the splutter of blood and crunch of bones and the screams of the tortured ones, and the sweethearts' sobs and the mothers' moans are hushed by the belching guns! And the vultures swoop where the carion lies and the demons dance and yell, and laugh at the sight of the weeping eyes in the land where war is hell!"—Henry M. Tichenor.

Is the present civilization Christian? "Yes," answers the czars, the kings, the big-salaried clergy, the Wall Street philanthropists, the millionaires and the generals whose profession is to kill their fellow-men.

I do not ask if there are any individual Christians; I know there are thousands of them, but is there a Christian nation on earth? Are there any governments, or national economic systems, Christian?

It is said that when Jesus Christ, the founder of Christianity, was born angels announced his birth by singing: "Peace on earth, good will to men." When Jesus became a teacher he said: "Love your enemies, do good to them who spitefully use you; return good for evil; comfort the sick, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you."

Are any of the so-called Christian nations promoting peace and good will to men? Are they loving their enemies? Well, hardly! They are building great warships, manufacturing powder, swords and guns with which to burn, mangle and murder each other and to spread poverty, desolation and horror throughout the world. In this fair land of ours we have, for several years. and in times of profound peace, constructed two great battleships each year at a cost of fifteen millions each. Our military and naval expenditures amount to $600,000,000 a year. To pay for past war and to prepare for future wars requires 72 per cent of the national income.

The British Chancellor of the Exchequer says: "It costs the Christian nations of the world two billions and two hundred and fifty millions ($2,250,000,000) annually to maintain their army and navy on a war footing."

War has shed rivers of blood and produced an incalculable amount of poverty, suffering and sorrow, and has cursed the race of mankind beyond all estimate. In the bloody conflict now, as I write, raging between Bulgaria and Turkey (which was commenced by Christians against Mohammedans for spoils) half a million of men have been killed, about as many crippled, billions of debt saddled on to the working people, and a deluge of hellish influences let loose that will curse the world for centuries. Who are these bloodthirsty murderers who promote such atrocities? Who is responsible for plunging nations into war? Are they not savage monsters, or very devils in human form? "Oh, no, not at all. They are the pious, Christian kings and bishops and professed disciples of Jesus." They say they "love their Savior," but if they covet the lands, the markets, or the mines of their neighbors, they put swords and guns into the hands of peasant boys whom they have taught that it is gallant and glorious to kill people, and they send these deluded boys swooping down on a neighboring nation, to burn his houses. outrage his wife, his sister and daughter, devastate his fields. stab him in the breast with a bayonet, and blow out his brains by powder and dynamite.

No, there are no Christian nations now. The Nazarene is not yet the nation's ideal, for not Jesus, but the most successful killers, are still our greatest heroes.

Christ taught peace, kindness, brotherhood. Not one of these is possible until war ceases.

Not only do conspicuous Christians (?) promote war for spoils on the bloody field of conflict, but they practice directly opposite to the teachings of Jesus in the economic or industrial field. They uphold competition, which is contention, strife and war; and they oppose co-operation, which is brotherhood and makes for peace.

They force working people to surrender to them two-thirds of the value of their labor without rendering any equivalent therefor. They preach economy to the working man, and if he fails to support his family on $1 or $1.50 per day and strikes for a little raise they enjoin him in the courts and call out the militia and shoot him like a dog.

In this Christian country (so-called) we have seen the pious "captains of industry" flood the country with forty billions of watered or fraudulent stocks; corner the foodstuffs of a continent and force up the prices so that they exploited out of the people billions of dollars which cost them nothing; grab and monopolize by sharp tricks for private profit lands, oil, coal, iron machinery and other utilities of a public nature; adulterate all the medicines 85 per cent; glut the markets with shoddy goods of all kinds; cheat in weights and measures; discharge adult workers from their mills and factories and put children in, and so overwork those boys and girls that their health is hopelessly wrecked in five years, and then they boast that this great Christian country is "capturing the markets of the world" because they can sell their goods at less price than the foreigner can furnish similar wares produced by pauper labor. They send their goods abroad accompanied by missionaries, whisky and a warship, and they felicitate themselves on our marvelous Christian civilization.

Notwithstanding the fact that since 1850 crime has increased 600 and insanity 700 per cent, and a few sharp financiers, by tricks they call "business," have become owners of about 90 per cent of the total wealth of the nation, these Wall Street philanthropists build grand churches, sit in the "Amen corner" at religious meetings, and with blunted consciences puff themselves up with pride and "thank God for the great blessings He has bestowed upon them."

No; I do not think that this is a Christian country. If Jesus Christ were here today in bodily form I think He would be found standing on soap-boxes at street corners pleading the cause of the poor, opposing war, defending working people—in short, making good Socialist speeches. He would probably be in jail much of the time. I am disposed to think that after He had thrashed the big financiers out of the church and kicked over the tables He might repeat the public speech He made about two thousands years ago, when He addressed a lot of big capitalists who claimed to be very religious. He then said:

"Woe unto ye, scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites; for ye devour widows, houses, and for a pretense make long prayers, therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. Even so, ye outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?

"If ye say ye love God, whom we have not seen, and hate and oppress your brother, whom ye have seen, ye are a liar and the truth is not in you."

If Jesus were on earth and I started out to look for him I would not seek for him at the fine churches, but I would go to the hovels, the workshops, into the mines and wherever workingmen are found. I would also expect to find him in the slums and quite often at meetings of the Socialists and labor unionists, participating in the consideration of ways and means of abolishing child slavery and war and improving the condition of the homeless and friendless and the upliftment of all humanity.

"Is there any ground for hope that war will be abolished and a universal brotherhood and universal peace established?" Yes; but not soon. That desirable condition of society cannot come until the present mammonized war-upholding system of religion is displaced by a genuine Christianity. It cannot come until the competitive system of industrialism, so strenuously upheld by the church, is abandoned and Socialism takes its place.

War, and strife, and deceit, and greed, and crime, and poverty are the legitimate children of the competitive system of business. Indeed, that system could not exist a day without the practice of all those selfish, brutal, un-Christian methods. They are its incentives, its strength, its very life.

If nations should inaugurate Socialism, then capitalism or the competitive system of individualism would in due time disappear, and the whole foul brood of cruelties, injustices and crimes spawned from the hells of capitalism would vanish away. Do you ask why? My answer is that Socialism proposes to establish a co-operative commonwealth, and that means brotherhood. The four cornerstones upon which Socialism is erected are Justice, Reciprocity, Universal Peace and Universal Brotherhood. On its banners is inscribed the motto: "An injury to one is the concern of all. One for all and all for each."

If "war is hell," as was declared by General Sherman, then we shall have hell until Socialism abolishes it.

For nearly half a century I have been a student of law, and economics, and theology, and my deliberate judgment is that Socialism, while making no claim of being a religion, is in fact more truly Christian than the present institutional church, either Jewish, Catholic or Protestant.

THE SOCIALIST ARGUMENT AGAINST NON-PARTISAN ELECTIONS.

By Carl D. Thompson, Director of the Information Department, Socialist Party.

If you favor non-partisan elections, answer these arguments for us.

If you oppose non-partisan elections—as we do—maybe you can give us some better arguments.

We have listened patiently and followed carefully the whole line of arguments put out by our municipal reformers in favor of non-partisan elections. And after all is said and done we still believe in partisan elections.

To us the whole non-partisan idea seems such a transparent fallacy that we frankly confess to a certain degree of amazement at the fact that intelligent and thoughtful people seem to be misled by it.

The whole host of our municipal reformers in America seem to have been swept off their feet with the fad. As though by the simple device of striking the party name off of ballots we would eliminate, as by the stroke of a magic wand, all the evils of municipal misrule!

And the zeal with which the reformers have hunted out this witch of partisan elections and striven to drive it out is worthy of a better cause. The commission charter recently proposed in Traverse City, Michigan, for example, provides:

"The ballots for election of city officers shall be separate from any other ballot and shall be without insignia, emblem or designation, etc." (Section 26).

The charter of Grand Junction, Colorado, and of Spokane, Washington, which are worded identically the same, are even more extreme. They provide:

"Nothing on the ballot shall be indicative of the source of the candidacy, or of the support of any candidate. No ballot shall have printed thereon any party or political designation or mark, and there shall not be appended to the name of any candidate any such party or political designation or mark, or anything indicating his views or opinion."

Nothing could be more complete. The authors are not content with merely denying the Republicans, Democrats and Socialists the right to the use of their names as a means of helping the voter to quickly and readily select the ballot which will represent his conviction—they prohibit the use of any and all kinds of designations whatsoever on the ballot—anything and everything that would in any way connect an individual's name with the policies he represents.

And these extreme provisions are only types of scores of city charters being adopted or urged by the advocates of the commission form of government for cities.

At this point we Socialists dissent entirely and most emphatically. To exclude all possible designation from the ballots seems to us unwarranted and abortive. And we frankly believe not only that a partisan or designated ballot is right but that it is the best method for securing desirable results in our civic affairs.

I.—Local Issues Require Local Parties and Designated Ballots.

Our first argument against this non-partisan fallacy is that it disorganizes the people at the polls at the very point where they most need facilities for marshaling their strength.

There are distinct differences of opinion and different policies possible with regard to municipal affairs, just as surely as there are in state affairs. The question of the municipal ownership of waterworks, gas plants, electric light plants, street railways or other public utilities is one upon which there is and must be a difference of opinion. And the only form of election that will enable the people to settle these questions and settle them intelligently will be such as enable them to express themselves in groups formed accordingly to the policies advocated by the groups. And the form of ballot that will enable the voter at the polls to quickly and accurately express his purpose must be one that has some designation other than an individual's name.

Is not this necessity perfectly obvious? For example, a certain idea is advanced by citizens in a given community. Weeks and months are spent by its advocates in bringing the idea to the attention of the people and explaining it to the voters. The idea gains support, people's opinions are formed, conclusions are reached, convictions are settled upon this principle and policy. Then comes the election. People go to the polls, desiring to express preference for this policy. Suppose they are confronted by ballots on which appear only the names of certain individuals, as proposed by these commission charter reformers? There is nothing on the ballot, no distinguishing mark, that connects these names with the policies which they represent. Is it not obvious that that kind of ballot fails to supply the voter with the information he needs at the most critical point?

It may very easily happen that certain individuals may be prominent in the advocacy of certain ideas, while the actual candidates put forth may be much less prominent. The name of the individual, therefore, is not a reliable guide to the voter. In many cases it may be no guide at all.

II.—Local Issues in a Municipality Also Involve State and National Issues and Therefore Require That State and National Party Organization and Voting be Permitted.

Our second objection to the non-partisan election is that it destroys the power of the people in their state and national fight for local relief. On this point we quote the report of the committee on the commission form of government made to the last convention of the Socialist party, at Indianapolis, Ind., May, 1912:

"There is hardly a serious problem of municipal government that can be solved at all aside from a state and national movement. Take the question of home rule. Here in the very nature of the case the city is powerless in the hands of the State Legislature. The fight for home rule itself is a state and national fight. Take the question of the commission form of government itself—it has been an issue for state legislation very largely. Or consider some of our commercial and industrial problems. The real difficulties that concern a people in a city, involve state and national issues. For example, the supply of coal for a city—what can any city in America do on a problem of that sort without state and national action? The city may establish a coal yard. But that is only the merest fraction of the problem. The coal must be shipped to the city over railroads that are owned by the monopolies and trusts. The transportation of the coal becomes a problem of interstate commerce. Thus the most elemental problem of the city becomes a state and national problem, a question requiring a consistent and comprehensive program for state and national action. To undertake to solve problems of this kind by limiting our efforts to local issues, and separating our cities from state and national issues, is absurd.

"It may be quite true that neither the Republican nor the Democratic national parties have anything in their platforms or programs looking to the relief of the people that live in cities. But to attempt to find relief from the evils that torment them without state and national action is the height of folly. If the Republican and Democratic parties have no program and no principles that apply to the great problem of municipal government, so much the worse for them. Let the people know it, the sooner the better.

"Such is not the case with the Socialist party. It has a program—municipal, state and national. And they are a part of one consistent whole.

The same principles for which the Socialist party stands in the state and nation apply with equal force, though with different details, to the city as well. And what is more, there is no solution of municipal problems apart from the principles of social democracy. And the principles of social democracy cannot be applied except through state and national action. The effort therefore to eliminate national and state issues and to prevent the organization of a state and national political party that shall have also a municipal program is to block the way to a final solution of the problems of municipal government.

"Furthermore, let the Socialist party of America grow to sufficient strength and numbers; let it capture enough of the cities of this country, let it secure enough representatives in a few of the State Legislatures and the National Congress to make its municipal, state and national program a real menace to the capitalistic parties of today, and we shall very quickly see the political parties of capitalism rush into a party that will be the most bitterly partisan that this country has known since the anti-slavery times.

"There is an issue in municipal government that is bound up inseparably with the state and national program. It is impossible to solve the municipal problems apart from these larger state and national problems. So the lines of this struggle may as well be drawn sharply and as closely as possible. We believe it to be the task of the Socialist party to bring this issue into the open and to make the people of this country realize that the struggle between plutocracy and the common people is not only a municipal struggle but a state and national one as well. And the effort to conceal this struggle by detaching the city and its issues and problems from the state and national situation serves only to deceive the people and to prolong the period of their enslavement."

III.—The Non-Partisan Election Eliminates Principles from the Elections and Introduces False Issues.

In the first place, it throws the weight of a campaign onto the personality of the candidates. There must be something upon which the effort to get the candidates elected shall be based. Since nothing but the names are to confront the voters at the polls, the supporters are forced to emphasize the name—the candidate and his personality. Thus the advocates of an idea or policy are compelled to unduly emphasize the personality of their candidate in order to force his name upon the attention of the voters. This is especially so in the case of minorities, which almost always lack men of especial prominence or fame—in the beginning. Such a course is repugnant in that it unduly emphasizes the importance of the individual. It is not only harmful to the candidate himself, but introduces an unfortunate amount of harmful personalities.

Furthermore, non-partisan elections tend to thrust false issues into the campaigns. It must be admitted that campaigns will be fought and that there will be something to fight about. Campaigners are going to put up some kind of an argument for their candidates and against their opponents. If the principles involved are lessened in importance the inevitable result will be that other matters will be thrust into the campaign. Personalities, religious and race prejudices, always ready to spring into action, are almost sure to be aroused. Such things, besides being very harmful in a community, are also false issues.

IV.—Non-Partisan Elections Give the Advantage to Men of Wealth and Prominence.

Elections carried on upon that basis put the working classes and the common people at a disadvantage. Individuals who own banks, railroads and great daily newspapers are not on an equal footing with individuals of the working class. The latter have no hope of matching the power and influence of the former except by group action. And the possibility of that group action must be maintained up to the very moment that the ballot is cast.

Our policies should not be settled upon the basis of personalities. The issue is not—"Is this candidate an honest, upright man? Is he a kind husband, a good father, a worthy citizen?" That is not the question. He may be all of that. He may be a man of fame, so that his name is in the mind of every voter. And yet, from the standpoint of the public welfare, he may be the worst possible public enemy. He may represent wrong and harmful polices. The people must have the means of rallying their forces around principles rather than individuals.

V.—It Gives a Terrific Advantage to the Press.

The capitalist class and its powerful members own the press. To make elections turn upon publicity and personality is to play straight into the hands of the capitalists who own and control the agencies of publicity. The non partisan election may weaken the power of the old-time political boss but it would put a tenfold more dangerous power in his place—the press, owned and controlled as it is to an overwhelming extent by the plutocratic interests.

This, the power of the press, must not be overlooked. A minority party never has a strong press at the beginning. The press is generally on the side of the majority. By constant and imposing advertising, by judicious and adroit editorial writing, and a news comment now and then, the people may be made to believe that a certain candidate stands for things for which he really does not. This is one of the most common and most dangerous tricks of a capitalistically controlled press.

The people need the assistance of every possible device with which to meet these difficulties and above everything else they need a designated ballot to help them connect the individual candidate with the principles he is supposed supposed to represent, and which also serves to connect the individual with the group of people that have put him forward as their candidate, so that they, too, may be held to account for him and his course after election.

These arguments seem to us unanswerable objections to the non-partisan election idea. We submit them with the hope that those who favor the idea will answer us and argue us down—if they can.

On the other hand we submit these arguments hoping that those who agree with us will suggest better arguments than these if they can.

THE INVINCIBLE IGNORANCE OF BRYAN.

As secretary of state, William Jennings Bryan will shortly be given an opportunity to comprehend a simple fact that has never before been actually forced upon his attention, namely, that the real use and purpose of this world under present conditions is as a place in which to invest capital.

For the last sixteen years, while Mr. Bryan was an irresponsible individual, he was wont to deliver himself of considerable twaddle about "placing the man ahead of the dollar" and such like stuff, but as he couldn't place anybody, not even himself, at that time, nobody took any serious notice of him. His moral output of this sort of thing was naturally regarded as the stock-in-trade of the ordinary politician publicly exhibited for office-seeking purposes.

Now, however, when Mr. Bryan has secured the office of secretary of state, which has particularly to do with the placing and securing of the American dollar in foreign lands for investment, and is apparently neglecting his duty of seeing that it is afforded the power and protection of the American government, he is due to receive a salutary lesson regarding things as they are, instead of what he thinks they should be, and are not.

Mr. Bryan's attitude of disapproval toward these enterprises of American capital in foreign lands, especially Latin America, "threatens to result in a grave loss to American investors," as the report says, and Mr. Bryan is already beginning to hear of it. These investors have heretofore been "enjoying unprecedented prosperity," owing to the fact that the Taft administration stood firmly behind them, but now several little South American republics, encouraged by Bryan's attitude, are making trouble for their beneficent American exploiters. Bryan had gone so far as to induce President Wilson to recall one Janes, who had been sent by Taft to uphold the interests of an American railroad concern in Ecuador which had a dispute with that government. A powerful New York capitalist interested in the same railroad casually called at the White House the other day, and the immediate result of his visit was that Wilson countermanded the order recalling Janes, and that gentleman will stay in Ecuador until the government decides to do justice to the American investor who has risked his capital in building a railroad for that ungrateful republic. Mr. Bryan isn't yet satisfied, and is using all his influence to have Janes again recalled. But Janes is there to stay, and Bryan has received his first lesson, though he does not seem to have learned much from it as yet.

Bryan never understood the necessities of capitalism nor comprehended its economics. To him, in fact, as a system, it has no existence. The trust is simply a creation of statute law, by wicked and greedy legislators, and is in no sense an evolution of industry. As a matter of fact, the Bryan mind has no comprehension whatever of evolution. There need be no surprise that the intelligent capitalistic elements of this country regarded him as a dangerous sort of person, not because of his knowledge, but on account of his ignorance—dangerous, in short, as a fool is dangerous who gets hold of and tries to run a costly and complicated machine that he does not in the least understand.

It was no doubt a perception of this that induced Wilson to express the wish that something or other might "knock Mr. Bryan into a cocked hat" some time before the election, and something of the sort is certain to happen if, through his ignorance and folly, "grave losses" occur to American investors abroad. That is the one thing that capitalism will not tolerate from its politicians, and it will stand on no ceremony in making Bryan acquainted with the fact, just as a stupid servant is bound to hear from his master.

Bryan has either got to learn that the needs of capitalists are national needs and must be backed by the power of the nation, or see himself overruled, as in this case, or perhaps finally discharged as incurably stupid and unable to learn the supreme need of what is called in diplomatic language "a vigorous foreign policy."—New York Call.

SYMPATHY, NOT PITY.

A Bond That Will Strengthen the Class-Conscious Movement of Labor.

No English word endures worse using tha nthe word "sympathy" or compassion." They are the same word. They mean "suffering with." They are not "pity."

We can pity sufferings we can never feel. The rich, warm-hearted woman pities the harlot. The generous rich man pities the thief. The poor girl sympathizes with, compassionates, suffers with the harlot. The poor man suffers with the thief. We have too much pity, too little sympathy.

We cannot sympathize with sorrow we have never known. We can have no compassion for pains we have never borne. We cannot suffer with those whose sufferings we have never suffered. Sympathy is the rich flower of experience or the genius. Youth pities; the Pharisee pities; sub-consciously thanking God all the while that he is not as these other men whom he pities. Experience or genius sympathizes with, compassionates, suffers with the sufferer. The Publican could have known sympathy; the Pharisee never. The genius reaches sympathy by a wonderful short cut. But we others, we must take the long road to Delhi and, there, meeting forty men, must learn that each of them is our brother.

For pitying youth there are unfortunate classes—the criminal class, the prostitute class, and the like. For sympathetic experience or genius there are no classes. There are men and women feeling like himself.

Geniuses are few, so few that did we trust to them alone, the springs of sympathy, the waters of compassion, would run dry. It is from the stricken rock of our natures that the life-giving flood must gush. Here lies the great refutation of asceticism. The ascetic is not a better man than most of us. He is a worse man, inasmuch as he is the less a man.

Origen, who, by one decisive and irrevocable act, saved himself forever from his besetting weakness of the flesh, was not a greater, but a less, man, for all his sacrifice. And so to have killed or drugged any part of one's nature leaves one incapable thereafter of sympathizing with, of compassionating, or suffering with others whose nature has not been thus maimed. Like the hero of one of Poe's fantastic tales, the ascetic slays the enemy who has dogged his steps from his youth upwards, only to find how utterly he has murdered himself.

"Thou madest man a little lower than the angels," triumphantly proclaims one.

From another and an unexpected direction come the lines:

"There's a door in every heart that leads to hell, Could we but find the key."

And that is as it should be. The perfection of man is the man or woman who, in the fullest manner, combines the passions, the impulses, the ideals, the hopes, the fears of men and women. It was said by Thomas Carlyle that one thing alone detracted from the perfection of Jesus. In Jesus there was no Falstaff. Jesus could not sympathize with, could not compassionate, could not suffer with Falstaff.

Friends, we are overdosed with the pity of those who have never felt, as we have felt, while we are ahirst for the sympathy of those who feel as we feel. It is this rebellion against pity, this instinct for sympathy, which is the basis of class-consciousness. It is this which makes the cry of Marx, "Workers of the World, Unite!" no mere formula, but a confident appeal. It is this which one to whom suffering taught sympathy thus expressed:

"Grave this deep in your hearts,
Forget not the tale of the past:
Never, never believe
That any will help you, or can,
Saving only yourselves."

THE WASTE OF CAPITALISM.

There are about 35,000,000 people in this country who work, who perform some kind of labor.

If 25,000,000 of these should quit work and sit down under the trees or rove over teh hills and not turn their hands in one single act of labor, it would not make a particle of difference as far as actual wealth production is concerned.

Why?

Because out of the 35,000,000, less than 10,000,000 people do all the really necessary work.

The other 25,000,000 who toil hard do nothing but useless labor.

1.—All Adevrtising Is Useless Labor.

This country spends five billion dollars ($5,000,000,000) a year in advertising. This employs over 4,000,000 people.

Ore has to be dug and smelted for presses, machinery and transportation systems. Presses, machinery and transportation systems have to be built and maintained.

Logs have to be cut and ground into pulp, paper mills built and run, paper made, shipped and printed, printing establishments put up, office force maintained and distributors kept busy.

For all these employed in the great advertising industry houses have to be built, clothing made, food supplied.

All this is a waste.

Your shoes are no better because they are advertised in the street cars. Your clothes are not better because they are pictured in the newspapers. Your food is not better by having big signs of corn flakes and "ham that am."

Not one iota is added to the usefulness of the articles you make by advertising them.

We don't advertise our postage stamps, our public schoosl, our streets or our city parks. It is not necessary.

2.—Insurance Is Useless Labor.

It is hardly possible to get at the tremendous business carried on by insurance companies. It runs up into the billions.

An enormous crew is employed in the insurance industry. Solicitors, clerks, buildings, traveling expenses and all the elements that make up the business must come from those who create the necessities of life.

Insurance, as many other wasteful things, may be a necessity under capitalism, but it is only one of the wastes.

3.—The Legal Profession Is a High Waste.

Thousands of men give their whole life to law. Courts have to be maintained. Office buildings and libraries have to be kept. Millions of volumes of books, that require writers, editors, printing, binding, shipping and handling, consume much labor.

To analyze the waste of the legal profession would require big books. The very mention of it should be sufficient.

But capitalism with its system of private ownership and property complications and criminal producing factors must have the law and the lawyers. It cannot be otherwise. They will be useless under Socialism.

4.—Duplication of Plants in the Competitive Warfare Is Waste.

Of course the trusts have done away with much of this waste and in so much they are beneficial to civilization.

But we still have ten stores when one could do the business. Ten express companies when one could do the job. We have the duplication of telegraphs, telephones, milk service, ice service, coal service, grocery service and a thousand other duplications.

These all require extra labor though it adds nothing to the actual well-being of the people.

5.—The Salesman.

The salesman, together with all the office buildings, hotel service, railroad and Pullman service, and everything connected with the work of a salesman is only waste. It is useless labor.

Most of our large cities are almost entirely given over to office buildings. Three-fourths of those at least are wholly unnecesasry and wasteful. The people who build and maintain them might as well be off fishing for the wealth of the land is not increased by their hard toil.

6.—War Is a Waste.

Let's not mention it, for it is too horrible. The $8,000,000,000 spent each year in the world for army and navy is an awful sum. Add thereto the waste of manhood in the ranks and the devastation of home and loved ones in their loneliness and anxiety.

Eight billion dollars would go a long ways towards keeping a miserable, poverty-stricken race.

Out of this eight billion the United States contributes $450,000,000.

At one thousand dollars each it would build 450,000 homes. It would not take many years before every homeless family in this country would have its own home.

This waste of war is so brutal and sickening even capitalist society is tiring of it.

We have given the salient forms of waste but there are many leaks that cannot here be mentioned.

Under Socialism all the waste mentioned in this article would be eliminated.

We will need no advertising for our commodities will be created for use and not for sale.

We will need no life insurance for society will guarantee a comfortable livelihood to all who work and to all who are past years of labor.

We will need no legal profession, for there will be no cause of quarreling, and the chief source of legal disputes, which is public property privately held, will be absent.

There will be no needless duplication of industrial plants or points of distribution for competition will be displaced by co-operation.

There will be no need of salesmen for goods will be shipped as ordered and as needed but not forced on the market for profit.

There will be no war, for when the people collectively own the earth they will have nothing to fight over.

By eliminating waste the 25,000,000 people now occupied in wasteful labor can join the 10,000,000 now occupied in useful labor.

These ten million work about ten hours a day to feed, clothe and shelter the people of this country.

Now figure out for yourself how many hours it would take the thirty-five million to create the same amount as the ten million now create.

You see it is quite a deal less than two hours a day.

The Socialist asks why you should work ten hours when the same result can be obtained by working two hours.

Cut out the waste. Get shorter hours and better living conditions.

You can do this only through Socialism.—Next Step.

POETICAL

WANTED.

J. G. Holland.

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue,
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty, and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions, and their little deeds—
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps!

THE DYING TRAMP.

W. E. Hanson.

Well, I guess this is my finish,
I know that I'm all in,
For when a man runs a race with Death,
It is certain that Death will win.
And, somehow, I don't worry,
That I am going to die,
Alone, out here in the open,
Under the arching sky.

My past life passes before me,
The days of hunger and thirst,
Days that will come to all of us
Who are slaves, exploited, accursed.
And I think of my early manhood,
The happiest days of my life,
When I had something to live for—
Then I had a home and a wife.

But daily I learned the lesson
That wage slaves ever must learn,
While our "Masters" rob us of dollars,
They give us "Pence" in return.
For years I toiled in silence,
A patient, submissive slave,
All the while my wife was drifting
Silently toward the grave.

The day she lay in her coffin,
I looked at her withered face,
And the toil-knotted hands enfolded,
That had toiled in the wage-slave's race.
That night, when the stars were shining,
Alone at that mound I sat,
That covered "my ALL" I lived for,
Her grave out on "Poverty Flat."

Together we toiled and suffered,
Believed in a God that was just,
And bore our sorrows in silence,
As wage slaves ever must.
Asleep 'neath the mound I left her,
And began to ramble and roam,
The only thing that is left to a man
Who has no kindred, no home.

I have roamed from ocean to ocean,
Verdant valleys and desert plain,
But I've kept the vow I made that night
"To call no man 'Master' again."
I am faint, I know I am dying,
But dying "a tramp and free!"
So, God, if you've something else to do,
Don't bother yourself about me."

STAY AWAY FROM PORCUPINE, ONTARIO!

STAY AWAY FROM BINGHAM, Utah. No worker but a traitor will take the place of a striker!

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

PRESIDENT MOYER and Board Member Lowney left Denver for Porcupine, Ontario, last Sunday.

THE STRIKE is still on at the Britannia Mines, British Columbia, all workers are urged to remain away until the strike is won.

THE DEMOCRATS, as a matter of economy, have concluded that United States Senators should no longer take a bath at public expense.

Chloride of lime may be cheaper.

THE READERS of the Miners' Magazine are requested to be charitable towards the editor for lack of original editorial matter in this issue of the official organ of the W. F. M.

On account of a death in the family, the editor has been unable to do his usual work.

NINETY-FOUR LIVES were sacrificed in the Cincinnati mine of the Monongahela River Consolidated Coal and Coke Company at Finleyville, Pa., recently, due to the greed of exploiters to whom dividends are more priceless than the safety of human beings. A master class can kill victims of wage slavery and are never brought before a court to answer to the charge of murder.

"We are all equal before the law," is the most ludicrous joke of the twentieth century.

THE LEGISLATURE of Indiana towards adjournment passed a measure appropriating $25,000 for the care of hogs, but defeated an appropriation bill of $5,000 to be used for the better care of children.

The hog in Indiana commands more consideration than the child afflicted with the national disease, known as poverty.

AT THE LAST ELECTION in Belgium, the returns show that 993,070 men possessed one vote, 395,866 two votes, and 308,683 three votes.

The late strike in Belglum being for manhood suffrage and the strikers having forced the government to recognize the justice of their demands, future elections will result in the working class being heard at the ballot box.

IT IS SAID that the Socialist party has lost 35,000 dues-paying members during the last twelve months, and there are some people asking the question why the membership has decreased?

The answer may be found in the fact that the Socialist party has made a soul mate of the I. W. W. and men and women of the Socialist party do not propose to stand for the affinity.

Free love between Socialism and lunacy, will still further reduce the membership.

CARDINAL GIBBONS and Archbishop Messmer ought to get together on "faith and morals."

The archbishop has been quoted to the effect that no woman can vote and be a good Catholic.

The cardinal says that the church has not condemned woman suffrage and that it is entirely a question of individual opinion—that the church passes only on "faith and morals."

The dogma of papal infallibility is of recent origin, but it does not appear to have brought order out of the confusion which attends a multiplicity of clerical voices speaking with the tone of "moral" authority in the realm of economic discussion and political action.—Milwaukee Leader.

DR. ARUNDEL of Pittsburg, Pa. preached his farewell sermon at St. Mark's church, recently, and in the course of his sermon said:

"A clergyman cannot preach the doctrines of 'universal brotherhood of man' in the Episcopal church or any other church for that matter these days and last very long. Money, not religion, dominates the church of today. I believe in preaching the gospel as our Saviour did, not as a few of my congregation may desire. I am leaving St. Mark's because of insurmountable obstacles which have been placed in my path to make my work abortive."

It is presumed that Dr. Arundel knows what he is talking about and his statements are a sad commentary on the standing of the church.

A church can be no better than the influences which dominate the church. If money wields the sceptre in those temples that are dedicated to Christianity, then money is God.

THE BILL providing for pensions for indigent mothers, has been passed by the State Legislature of Ohio and is now before the Governor for his approval, which is assured. The law provides for an annual tax levy of one-tenth of a mill, which is expected to create a fund each year of not less than $700,000, with which to pay the pension authorized. Destitute widows, women whose husbands are completely disabled, have deserted them, or are serving prison sentenees are to be cared for nnder the provisions of the measnre. Juvenile eourts are to be authorized to pay sueh women $15.00 a month for a ehild under fourteen years of age, and $7.00 a month for each additional ehild nnder that age. Other drastie changes are made in the juvenile eode. Under the latter, boys under fourteen are prohibited from selling newspapers or chewing gum on the streets.—Labor Leader, San Diego.

OF COURSE we know the tornado struck Omaha, but we hardly think that a good exeuse for a paper that elaims to represent labor devoting most of its attention for several weeks to exploiting a printer's "eost congress"—a convention of master printers ealled for the purpose of devising ways and means for boosting the price of their product. "Sadie Maguire" and the Western Laborer have about ended their usefulness to the labor movement when the union is given a baek seat and the Typothetae gets the floor.—Seattle Union Record.

The Reeord is not the only labor publication that has reached the eonelusion that the Western Laborer has outlived its usefulness as a journal devoted to the interests of the working elass. When a journal prating about its unionism, accepts advertising matter from a firm that has been deelared unfair by strikers, it is only reasonable to presume that the dirty dollar has become more powerful than the principles of unionism.

THE I. W. W.'S (Irrepressible Wandering Willies) didn't last long in their hunger strike at Denver. Emulating the tacties of the militant suffragists in England, they lacked the staying qualities of the English trouble makers and soon eapitulated when the pangs of real hunger began to shoot around their belt lines. In another Colorado city a gang of Willies marched into a restaurant, ordered a bounteous repast, and refused to pay for same, loudly proclaiming that the city must be host to their gang of industrial hoboes. The indignant citizens firmly insisted that their absence was more to be desired than their company and if it was all the same to them would they move on. Upon assurance that they would be given real work upon the roek pile if they remained, they moved speedily. Jail bears no terrors for this crowd if the grub eomes regularly and hard labor is not ineluded in the sentenee. The wonder of it is that this buneh of irresponsible, irrepressible, near-anarchist set of revolutionary industrialists attraets any serious attention from any men with brains enough to open and close a swinging door.—Everett Labor Journal.

THE STRIKE in Belgium was for manhood suffrage, and the strikers forced the government to recognize from its haughty throne that the working class was a power when organized along the lines of class interest. The workers demanded an equal voice with the employer and clerical fraternity, and the government was forced to give consideration to the demands of labor.

There are a number of revolutionists in America who hold that the ballot is but a "paper wad" and a useless weapon in the hands of the working class to redress wrong. If the ballot is useless and impotent in the hands of labor, then the strikers of Belgium are foolish, for only fools would declare a strike for the use of a weapon that is worthless in the fight of labor against economic slavery.

Again, if the ballot is impotent and worthless to the working class, then employers and and all the influences that eombined to resist the demands of the strikers of Belgium are likewise foolish, for if the ballot in the hands of the workers is impotent and worthless, then Capital should make no fight against labor being granted manhood suffrage.

The wise men who exclaim "hit the ballot with an axe," should send their missionaries to Belgium to convert the unsophistieated, so that hundreds of thousands of men who won a strike for the ballot may be convinced of the error of their ways.

IN THIS ISSUE of the Miners' Magazine, there appears lengthy statements relative to the smelter strike at El Paso, Texas.

The smelter trust is ezar in El Paso and shows no consideration for the vietims whom poverty has foreed to accept employment from this dehumanized octopus.

The slaves at El Paso endured long hours and starvation wages, until human endurance broke down, and when the hungry victims of insatiable exploitation asked for a reduction of hours and a few more cents per day to appease the pangs of want, they were brutally refused by the Guggenheim eombination that knows no justiee that interferes with the usual stream of dividends that flow into the eoffers of the most arrogant trust on this continent.

The smelter trust at El Paso cannot say that the Western Federation of Miners has launched this strike, for the poor ill-paid slaves were not members of the organization so mueh ealumniated and slandered by the American Smelting and Refining Company.

They were unorganized, but desperation drove them together, and in their desperate straits, they have appealed to the Western Federation of Miners for aid and protection, and their appeal has been answered by an organization that never fails to respond to the distress of the working class, regardless of raee, ereed or color.

RAILING at the English judge who sentenced Mrs. Pankhurst to jail because she had advoeated the disobedience of laws in which they had no making, the Hearst papers, through their Brisbane editorials, are supporting the roughhouse work of the English suffragettes.

Beyond the statement that the tacties employed by the English women are poor tactics—tactics of the sort that never have made for permanent social advance—this editorial is not about the English women, but about the Hearst type of papers.

The Hearst papers justify the law-breaking of the English women on the ground that those women had no part in making the laws.

There is a street phrase that applies to the Hearst papers in this instance. "They all look good when they're far away."

Supposing that an army of voteless men were to mareh on Washington, kidnap Mr. Bryan, spirit away Mr. Hearst's businenss manager and dump muriatic acid in the morning mail!

The Hearst editorial rooms eouldn't grind out enough maledietionary eopy to meet the erisis! Not that the voteless man would be justified in eutting up didoes of the English militant type, or anything of that sort, but just that papers of the Hearst type are adroitly inconsistent. The English tactics may look good to Hearst—"they all look good when they're far away."—California Social-Democrat.

THE GENERAL STRIKE in Belgium for manhood suffrage lasted ten days and ended in a complete victory for the workers.

The great army of organized workers, to the number of 500,000, laid down their tools and folded their arms in a peaceful demand for a change in the electoral laws which would give one vote to each man.

The preparations for this great struggle has been going on for several years.

Ample provisions were made to feed the strikers for a long siege, and when the strike was ealled, the arrangements on the part of the labor organizations were as nearly perfect as possible.

The strike was under the direct control of the Socialists, and perfect order was maintained.

The Socialists propose to take over the property now held by the eapitalists in the near future. They, therefore, do not want to destroy or injure the property.

The strike was to secure the ballot for the workers, to the end that they might take possession of the political power and use it to legalize the program of the Socialists, which will dispossess the capitalists and make the means of social production collective property.

If the eapitalists seriously object to this program, the general strike just closed is only a faint intimation of what will then happen.

The working elass must use every weapon at their eommand in their battle for industrial freedom, but every weapon must be used timely and with wisdom and discretion.—Oakland World.

KASPAR BAUER, treasurer of the Free Speech League at San Diego, Cal., has made a public statement regarding the free speech fight made in that city last year which throws a lot of new light on that affair. P. S. Ford, secretary of the same league, verifies Bauer's statements, which are in part as follows: "Most of the I. W. W. organizers who came to San Diego to speak used language upon the street corners such as would not be tolerated in any civilized community. They were foul-mouthed and vile. They did not preach industrial unionism, or at least devoted very little time to that subjeet. They either attacked the Socialist party or devoted themselves to the slinging of vile epithets, sueh as ealling police 'dogs' and 'pimps.' As a result they inflamed the people and the police and the restricted district ordinance was passed. As this ordinance ineluded all other organizations the Socialist party decided to make eommon eause with the I. W. W. in order to maintain free speech, although onee more I want to repeat; that we would not have had to meet this situation if it had not been for the I. W. W. speeches and tacties. Many of these men came to San Diego simply in order to be supported. Out of one crowd of 75 who were fed and housed at the expense of people who sent in their funds, only six offered to go on the street to speak. Hundreds of dollars were sent directly to the I. W. W. in San Diego which were never accounted for to my knowledge or to the knowledge of those in charge of the Free Speech League. The fight ended in a complete fiasco and has done irreparable damage to the Socialist cause in San Diego as well as to the principles of industrial unionism."—Dallas Laborer.

IRMA JACKSON and Edward Diek are to be married in a bee-utiful $3,000,000 house. They are going to have all the advantages of trained servants, wonderful ehina, silver, and so on, and from the kitchen and cellar of the house will eome the finest of foods and wines. The decorations will cost a great deal of money.

Presumably the happy couple, as society reporters remark, will stand under a floral bell, the groom clothed in conventional black and the bride in a clinging gown of white.

It will be a quiet wedding. If it was otherwise, the owner of the house would throw them out, for he is Col. Oliver Payne, of the Standard Oil, and the house is his home, and the aforementioned happy couple were for fourteen years his servants.

He is allowing them to be married in his home, where they have lived for fourteen years. But during none of that time was it their home, and when the eeremony is over they will go to some home that will probably be worth considerably less than 3,000,000 cents.

They have spent a great part of their lives in keeping another human being's house in order. During that time they did not have a home of their own. Such a state of affairs is common among workers, and even when they do get a home, there are always forees at work to break it up.

The love whieh culminated with marriage in a mansion, afterwards has to stand the test of poverty in a cottage, or, worse still, a flat. And the gentleman who loaned his mansion for the marriage may call around to collect the rent of the cottage, or one of his friends may do it.—New York Call.

INTELLIGENCE is the result of the awakening of the dormant intellect, and has been the guiding star of all progress. It is the faculty that makes education of value, and is only seen in its best expression, when the two are in conjunction. The labor movement, more than any other movement, has caused an intelligent understanding of the needs of the workers, and by its constant campaign of education, is enlightening them to the changes that must take place, before their final emancipation will result. No one can hope to accomplish much in this day and age, without some measure of mental equipment. This can be supplied, in a large measure by home study. Problems are daily confronting the union movement that require educated intellects to handle, and the fact that we have these minds to guide us, should not keep any worker from preparing himself for a better understanding of the great questions.

We can only remain a serious factor in civilization, so long as we show an intelligent understanding of and acquaintanceship with the forces that dominate and direct it. Discontent with existing conditions, if not intelligently directed, may result in an ignorant display of brute force, which would prove detrimental to the accomplishment of the ends hoped for. While living under a system where we must treat with an employing class we must learn to treat them with that consideration, to which our co-relationship entitles them. On the other hand, we must assert our rights to those wages and conditions that will enable us to live healthy, normal lives. Education along broad lines enables us to view the present with the mind of a philosopher, while preparing for the time when we, as workers will assume the powers of government.—Labor Journal, Cheyenne.

WHILE THE BELGIUM STRIKE was called a "general strike," it was far from being one in the sense that American workers understand the term. In this country "general strikes" are associated with sudden and unexpected upheavals that paralyze industry without notice, and which cause intense suffering to the participants.

The contrary was true in Belgium. For months these workers prepared for the event, with no attempt of secrecy. The smallest detail was not overlooked. Men were urged to husband their resources. Special stress was placed on the necessity of abstaining from alcholic drinks and gambling. For a long period collections were made every week all through the nation, which was divided into districts for this purpose. To show how successful these collections were, savings bank officials report that few deposits have been withdrawn by the strikers. Children were provided for, and thousands of them were shipped across the frontier and placed in the hands of friends and sympathizers. It was comparatively easy to work all these details because of the marvelous discipline of Belgium workers and because of the compactness of their unions, due to the small size of that country.

When the strike order was finally given instead of a noisy, turbulent uprising of idle men, we see a well captained army of labor going quietly to their homes with a confidence in their officers that has been seldom equalled.

Another point in the Belgium strike must not be overlooked. The strike was for the ballot. In America our "direct action" friends, while pointing to Belgium's success with the general strike, will not only fail to show the preparedness and detail before the strike, but they will also fail to state that this strike was for universal suffrage—a thing the "direct actionists" profess to despise.—Toledo Union Leader.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., who served as foreman of the special grand jury which was empanneled to investigate vice conditions in New York, frankly acknowledged that the social evil at its basis is an economic problem. Mr. Rockefeller, who has not yet won his spurs in business, says:

> As foreman of the special white slave grand jury, I came to recognize the extent and horror of the social evil.
> I believe it constitutes one of the great and vital world problems of the day.
> It is a business run for profit and the profit is large.
> In the vast majority of cases the woman is the victim.
> Less than twenty-five per cent of the unfortunate women in this country would have fallen if they had had an equally good chance to lead a pure life.
> Poverty, low wages, improper home conditions, lack of training, craving for amusement and pretty things and men are responsible for their fall.

There are citizens who insist that there is no relation between economics and morals. The Rev. Enoch Perry, whose activity on the "select committee of twenty-seven" indicated that he is under no illusions as to the exact location of his master's house, is quite convinced that the social evil is purely a question of religion.

Girls fall because they have wicked hearts. What they need is prayer. If enough prayers shall be said, the capitalist needn't trouble himself about raising wages. Let him build more churches—the Steel trust has just spent $50,000 in erecting five Roman Catholic churches at Gary—and all will be well. It eliminates the embarrasment of bringing economics into a moral discussion.

Leave it to the clergy. The politicians are corrupt.—Milwaukee Leader.

The Cowardly Quitter

TO SUCCESSFULLY FIGHT the battles of labor requires courage of a high order. The wage-earner without means who goes on strike for more pay or to resist reductions in wages, and does it without flinching, is brave.

It is such as these who have made unionism what it is today.

It sometimes requires or has required high moral courage to even be identified with unionism in localities where hostile commercial interests are in control, and are unscrupulous enough to manipulate the police, the courts, and the law to serve their ends regardless of the rights of citizens.

Sometimes in strong union centers feeling among union men may run high upon a certain issue, and to hold views opposite to the majority may be unpopular, but if a member is honest in his conviction he is entitled to respect providing he is not running counter to the law of his union.

It is the strong men with the courage of their convictions, who have refused to be scared by the employers, or by commercial interests, or by their fellow workers, who have built up the union movement.

The quitter never won a strike, nor established a right, nor a union, nor caused a principle to be adopted.

The quitter seeks to avoid trouble even by abject surrender.

He seeks to sugar coat the union pill to tickle the palate of commercial interests regardless of the rights involved.

In controversial matters, when his associates divide sharply in opposing groups he seeks some middle or compromise ground, in the vain hope that he can please both sides, and consequently has the respect of neither.

He has the brains of a jellyfish and the backbone of an angleworm.

He is deeply susceptible to flattery and a pat on the back by employing interests will cause his chest to expand wonderfully.

Like a steam engine without a governor he has no control over his own speed, and while a glimmer of reason might tell him he had a conviction and ought to fight for it, his legs will run away with him faster than he can think.

If it is a strike he is liable to come in the back door before the last of his associates have gone out by the front.

In a controversy among his associates he can perform the acrobatic stunt of sitting on a fence and hanging over both sides at one and the same time.

He is not of the stuff of which martyrs are made.

He has not a single heroic figure in the history of the whole world.

Men of conviction, of purpose, of resolution, determination and tenacity are the ones who make history.

The quitter is of very little use anywhere and least of all in the trade union movement.

His vacillating views and sail trimming methods win from him the contempt of his associates

Some one has said, "The Almighty hates a quitter."—Shoe Worker.

The Strike in Belgium

ANOTHER MILESTONE has been reached in the march of progress. The culmination of the recent general strike in Belgium is a signal success and a credit to the Socialists of that country, through whose management this victory was achieved. While probably all will not be gained at this time that the workers demanded, there is no doubt but what revision of the voting system will be obtained which will do away with many of the existing unjust features which makes it possible for a minority to determine the laws by reason of plural voting based on property and educational qualifications.

Of even greater value than the immediate concessions which may be granted, is the lesson in solidarity the workers have learned in this experience. It presages great things for the future, for without this use of solidarity, or class interest, the vote amounts to next to nothing, as witness, in the United States at the present time, where the workers have not yet learned to a very great extent the connection between government and making a living.

Another valuable lesson to be learned from the successful culmination of this general strike is that it was won because the strikers were supported by public sentiment. Had they not been, the result would have undoubtedly been different. There have been general strikes before in various countries that have been lost, and for no other reason than that the majority of the public was not with the strikers.

This is an important thing to take heed of at this time, in view of the fact that a large number of workers in this country are advocating the general strike as the most effective—if not the only—means of obtaining their demands, these being always economic instead of political as was the case in the strike just won.

In the cases of the general strikes that have taken place within the last few years in European countries, the most notable were those in Sweden, France, Italy and Spain. In the latter country the object was mainly anti-militaristic, directed against the sending of troops to Morocco. It was crushed with ferocity. It shows the utter helplessness of the workers to wage contest with the military forces of capitalism.

The strikes in France and Italy were over the question of hours and wages, they were attended with considerable disorder and violence and ended in defeat, crushed by the force of the state.

The Swedish General Strike was conducted along similar lines to the one reeently successful in Belgium but was lost. It was for economic reasons and was conducted free from crime and disorder. There was no hostility on the part of the government, no repressive measures such as had been used in other countries, yet within less than two weeks is was generally seen that the strikers were beaten, and within a month the strike was over, the workers acknowledging complete defeat.

What caused the strike this fall? Failure to have support of others not directly involved in the strike. In other words, a great voluntary organization of latent and unused forces developed when it appeared that the country was facing a crisis, and these forces organized for social service to a degress that defeated the strikers. What was known as the Public Security Brigade, composed of the classes outside the actual proletariat or wageworkers broke the General Strike. Had the strike received popular approval this would not have taken place, and the result would have been very different, as seen in the Belgian strike.

In view of these conflicting results what then is the Socialist view of the General Strike? The aim of the Socialist, as stated by Wilhelm Liebknecht, must be "in the interest of a peaceful and harmonious evolution, to bring about the transition from legal injustice to legal justice with the greatest possible consideration for the inviduals who are not privileged monopolists." As Spargo points out in his recent work, Syndicalism, Industrial Unionism and Socialism, "not because of any solicitude for the 'privileged monopolists,' but because the methods of peaceful evolution are of great importance to the proletariat, which aims to destroy nothing of value in the world it wishes to conquer and make its own."

The Belgian General Strike was successful because it met with popular approval and was resorted to in the last extreme, when no other means were available. We may have to advocate a General Strike even in the United States, but it should be only as the last resort, and even then, only when the public has become educated to a sense of the demands involved. In the meantime the work of Socialism is to make the process of socialization legal and pacific, and not to deviate from this course save in cases of urgent neeessity, as the General Strike in place of parliamentary action is a dangerous weapon to employ, and injudiciously used will do more harm to the workers than to their opponents.—Seattle Herald.

Monte Carlo

By Sigbjorn Obstfelder, in Vorwaerts.

MONTE CARLO!

Monte Carlo with palms and cypresses! Under the electric light it rises from the shore where the Mediterranean, murmuring, rolls in deep darkness, it rises in stately terraces to the Casino, where the gold rolls, now hushed, now in wild passion.

Monte Carlo, with the finest hotels of the world and its costliest silks! Monte Carlo, with the Riviera hotel, an Eden of stone, a garland of fire above the sea, an Aladdin's cave in the midst of warm darkness.

Monte Carlo, barred to the common herd, the place where princes mingle with forgers, where princesses are outshone by adventuresses from Vienna and Brussels, from Europe's hundreds of heavily perfumed boudoirs.

Is the air anywhere else in the world as delightful as it is here? We seem to float in it, we feel our cheeks taking on color, and we become intoxicated without wine. Is the air anywhere else as light, as pure and so laden with delicate perfume? It blows from the Mediterranean, heavy with the scent of roses and orange blossoms.

Here we tread upon the earth as if upon thick Persian carpet. Daintily the white shoes of the women trip along the terraces, and the men's shoes are russet and yellow, for it is never winter here.

From the great café float the passionate strains of the gipsy orchestra. These sweet tones have in them something of Vienna, something in Munich, something in Paris, have trembled over powdered breasts and have died on painted lips.

And princes and lords and adventurers—millionaries today, tomorrow slinking into a pawnshop—eat their beef with solid silver forks, beef at $2 a slice and potatoes at 50 cents apiece. The bank is close at hand, the gold mine.

The passionate strains of the gipsy orchestra vibrate upon the syphilitic cheeks of a white haired man, while the brilliantly ringed hand of his lady jingles the gold piece in her purse, to the tune of the czardas or the bolero.

When they leave, an elegantly dressed young gentleman follows them at a discreet distance and stares and stares at the lady's purse.

The waiters bow obsequiously, their faces expressionless. They have seen so much, and they are very discreet. Their faces like dry parchment, they bow equally low before counts of long lineage, before speculators, before forgers; equally polite to all, princesses, cocottes. For what is the difference? Are the waiters not right? What is the difference?

But among all this money, between all these white cravats, between silks and savory food, the red coated gipsies pass with their silver plates—and beg.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

The white walks of the Casino reflect the bright light. Within is the green altar where the fire is never extinguished, the fire of gold. Sh—sh! Let there be quiet in the temple! Silence!

The money alone may talk. No sudden movements, no passionate glances! Only the eyes, the eyes, the eyes can follow it—the money, the money, the money!

"And if any man or woman's heart begins to beat too violently, if their hands tremble, then come, my attendant of the temple, bow low and lead him or her out of my halls."

Thus commands the god of this temple.

"And if any man or woman wishes to offer up his or her life, his or her blood, they may accomplish this quietly, and in all discretion and preferably outside of these halls, in some dark corner of the park."

Thus commands the god of this temple.

Watch the uneasy hands! Hands of all nations, all sorts of temperaments, well cared for and white, noble, slim, long hands, and nervous, lean blue-veined and swollen hands with diamonds on the white fat. Listen to this quiet mass, the worship of the god, the ringing sound of the gold pieces, the rustling of silken garments, the rattling of starched cuffs! Do you notice the air which moves in the hall; do you notice it? As poisonous as the breath of a tabernacle, which singes without fire.

But look! There, between the hands, between the green altars! Can you not see it? It grows, reaches ever higher and higher. It looks with feverish eyes upon the hands.

It grows, it reaches above the ceiling of the hall, above the roof, over Monte Carlo and out over the gulf—the beautiful gulf—and over Europe, and over Ameriea, and stares and stares.

The god—Mammon.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

The Mediterranean knows him.

The sea lies in deep darkness and whispers to the cypress:

"I know him. I saw him in earlier times than these. I saw him thousands of years ago in Syria, and saw him again in Alexandria. I also saw him in Athens. He dies, and comes to life again in some other place.

"I have borne the shining spears from Rome to Carthage; brought purple and velvet to Venice; my seaweed conceals ships which sailed from Genoa. I carried Paul over my waves. He had a roll of papyrus under his arm

"Yes I have seen mighty empires decline and have seen temples overthrown, temple upon temple. And this empire here will also decline, this temple, too, will collapse upon the hill. And all will be still once more. And we shall be alone again, you and I, palms, cypresses and oranges!"

A light! A locomotive. The last train de luxe for Nice . Princes and harlots. Silks and diamonds. Wrinkles hidden behind paint. Forced simles. Drooping heads. Wigs.

And over all, Mammon.

But far below, far below is the sea. It waits, it waits.

A Never-Ending Tragedy

A MINE EXPLOSION has killed over one hundred miners. This time the "accident" was in Pensylvania. In West Virginia the miners are striking. Tennessee had its explosion last year. Alabama may be expected to follow. Colorado and Kansas and Oklahoma will take their turn. The coal fields cover a wide territory.

The reports from Pennsylvania state that "two-thirds of the dead are foreigners." If killing foreigners is a test of patriotism, then our capitalists are entitled to rank first among the patriots of America.

"Two-thirds of the dead are foreigners."

When "Bob Howard, who was the best known of the newspaper reporters of Milwaukee, was serving as the labor editor of one of our contemporaries, he related his experience as the editor and publisher of a newspaper in the mining regions of Pennsylvania.

There had been an accident in a mine near the very town in which he had published a newspaper. The toll of death was large and the dead were nearly "all foreigners."

It was in the "seventies" that Howard entered the coal fields of Pennsylvania.

The miners had come from the coal mines of England and Wales or were the sons of men who had worked in the English mines. They were Welsh and Irish and English and Scotch. They were miners who understood the risks of their occupation and who guarded against its many dangers.

They were intelligent and they were organized.

The mine owners concluded to get rid of them.

They were too independent and too aggressive.

They struck for higher wages. They struck for better conditions of employment.

They refused to work where danger was imminent.

They struck and the mine owners refused to treat with them. Their places were filled with foreigners who knew nothing of mining. Slavs and Hungarians moved in and the Irish and Welsh and English and Scotch moved out. And the newspaper was suspended!

The new comers were not experienced miners. They could not comprehend the danger that is ever present in the mine. "Accidents" increased. But it didn't matter much to the mine owners. The labor was plentiful and cheap. They could not be held financially responsible for "accidents" in which there was "contributory negligence."

The exploited Slavs and Hungarians in turn have organized.

The United Mine Workers is one of the strongest and most intelligently organized body of workingmen in the trades union movement. It has been instrumental in compelling the adoption of safety appliances and in educating its membership in the technical work in which they are engaged. But with all of its wonderful organization, with all of its intelligent direction, with all of its devotion to the welfare of the miner, it cannot eliminate the constant menace which greed for gain imposes.

There is ever being introduced into the mines cheaper and cheaper labor.

Even the children are not spared.

Ever the cry is for larger profits for the owners and ever the response is death and sorrow and anguish for the workers.

The tragedy of capitalism has no interludes.—Milwaukee Leader

Mother Jones

MOTHER JONES, who has lately come into national prominence as the leader of striking coal miners in West Virginia and who has been on trial for her life before a military court in that state, is one of the most interesting characters in the country. She is eighty years old, if years be accepted as a criterion, but in a very real sense she can never grow old. Her ardor is unquenchable. Her spirit is like a beacon. When officials told her recently that she was in danger of being executed for complicity in acts of violence committed by West Virginia miners, she replied: "I haven't long to live, anyhow. Since I have to die, I would rather die for the cause for which I have given so much of my life. My death would call the attention of the whole United States to conditions in West Virginia. It will be worth while, for that reason."

In this utterance, Mother Jones may be said to take ultimate ground. She puts herself beyond the power of the world to hurt her. Imprisonment sets a kind of sanctity on her lifelong labors. Persecution can only have the effect of increasing her prestige. Martyrdom would be her apotheosis.

All who know Mother Jones realize that she is the incarnation of sincerity. For upward of thirty years, this Irish-American working woman, who is different from other working women and working men chiefly because she is articulate and can express in words what they feel without being able to express, has been going about the country making speeches and organizinz trade unions. She is fiercely ascetic. She has white hair and blue eyes, and she travels in a simple black dress with a handbag that contains all her worldly goods. When asked recently where her home was, she replied: "Where the battle for human liberty rages."

There is hardly a labor struggle of importance in this country within the memory of living man in which she has not played a direct or an indirect part. Her special work has been among the miners, and she has lived with them in their homes, sometimes for months at a time. Her economic faith is that of uncompromising Socialism. Eugene Debs is her valiant admirer. She criticizes many of the labor leaders of the country as being too conservative. Years ago, she worked side by side with William B. Wilson, now Secretary of Labor in Washington, at a time when he was secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers She has been intimately associated with John Mitchell in the past. Mitchell, the labor leader, she admired. Mitchell, the employé of the National Civic Federation, she despises. She says he is a lost soul, corrupted by capitalism.

Tireless, devoted, fanatical, this brave old champion of labor has spent her days and her nights devising plans, campaigns, crusades, in behalf of her class. She has spoken in crowded halls in great cities; in mining camps; at meetings on the hills and in the open spaces. Once she led a parade of starved child factory workers from Philadelphia to President Roosevelt's home at Oyster Bay. On another occasion she visited President Taft at the White House in the interest of Mexican radicals confined in American prisons. From Madero, when President of Mexico, she obtained permission for the peons of that much afflicted land to organize in trade unions.

Mother Jones is really too good for this generation. We are hardly capable of appreciating the nobility and the heroism of a career like hers. Her life-story is an epic of labor. She rises or falls with the working class. If as Socialists believe, the coming civilization is to be built mainly by those who are now wage workers, Mother Jones will be recognized as one of the great figures of our epoch.—Leonard D. Abbott, in April International.

At Last a Great Obstacle

THE SOCIALISTS are causing almost as much anxiety in Europe as the Balkan allies. These unreasonable people are actually objecting to being slaughtered in a quarrel they do not profess to understand and which nobody seems able to explain. In Germany, where they represent by far the largest political party, they are showing a solid front against the huge increases of expenditures for army purposes, and are making it very clear that they have no taste for war undertaken just to prove the supremacy of one nation over the other. A like movement has been started in France, not on so large a scale, but still aggressively active.

These are steps in advance far more important for the welfare of the world than all the peace societies or arbitration courts ever accomplished or ever will. War is a game in which kings play and the people pay. They pay first with their money to finance the amusement; later with their blood and bodies, the latter serving as pegs to score points. As long as the people like this arrangement, why shouldn't there be vast military preparations going on all the time and plenty of bloodshed now and then? Militarism is one of the last strongholds of privilege. It is a splendid money-making machine for great interests; it affords a multitude of fat jobs for the aristocracy and gives certain windy gentlemen an opportunity to blow off a lot of steam in the way of sham patriotism. Such gifts of fortune were never surrendered without a struggle, and nothing could be more flagrantly absurd than the idea that reform in the war spirit will begin on top. It's the people's fight. They have to be trained up and educated to a realization of the folly they have been the victims of since the raising of the first tribal chief When a great body of men like the Socialists of the world rebel against war as a waste and a crime, then, at last, there is hope ahead.—S. Unemployed and War

I WAS IN CHICAGO last week. I went down on Canal street. I saw the long row of employment offices. Here a jobless working man may get a job provided there is one to get simply by paying the employment shark the small sum of two dollars.

And ten thousand workers were waiting to buy a chance to ship out and sell themselves on the installment plan.

Several days I went down and saw the same sight.

Ten thousand jobless working men lined up before employment offices waiting for a chance to sell themselves in a free country. The weather was cold, and I almost froze with an overcoat, and yet many of these men had holes in their clothing, exposing their naked skin. Long they waited, day by day and week by week. They waited for a job and if they received a job it was only to be fired in a day or two so as to give some other employment shark a chance to rob him of another two dollars.

In the center of this employment office district I saw an American flag and also a blue flag. It was a recruiting station. There were large pictures conspicuously displayed, portraying the soldiers resting at ease near springs of crystal water in the open air, with half clothed girls proudly dancing before them. Above this picture were large words like this:

"Young Men wanted
"Good pay. Free board and medical attention.
"Join the Army."

And thus capitalism, after driving these men into despair, then drives them to join the army of destruction and murder. No greater outrage could be forced upon the lowest peon in all the world than to force people into selling themselves for wages for their very lives and then force them to go without a job and then come up to them in their despondency and offer them food only under the consideration that they become murderers.

War is murder.

It is a million times more dastardly than the foul murder's deadly plunge into the human breast in the dark alley.

For the soldier has no revenge to seek, but only an order to obey. He is not a man; he is only a machine to obey the orders of his superiors. He fights against his own interest. He betrays himself and his fellows. He shoots to protect a robber who robs not only the man who gets the bullets and also the tool who pulls the trigger that sends them. He commits suicide for his class.

He is the last desperate remains of a body that was once a man, but who has sunk into the depth of depravity so low as to cause gods to shrink and fiends of hell to cower.

Yet with all his depravity, he is as helpless as a lamb in the shambles. He is driven there by the foul and slimy hand of starvation and despair. He deserves not to be blamed; he needs pity.

But, brother, the blame rests upon somebody's shoulder.

Do you stand for private ownership of the industries?

The private ownership forces competition in the labor market and makes the propertyless class slaves of the propertied class and the competition in the labor market drives men out of a job and hence they are through starvation forced to resort to this bloody and heartless murder.

Did you say you stood for this system? Then you are guilty, and I think the blood of the millions will be required at your hands.—The Eye Opener.

The Strike at El Paso, Texas

THE SLAVES at the smelter of the American Smelting and Refining Company of El Paso, Texas, have struck for an increase of wages and an eight-hour work day. The vast majority of the laborers have been receiving but $1.40 per day and each day constituted 12 hours work.

The work is so unbearable that but few of the employés can work twenty-four days in the month, and many of them cannot even average twenty days per month.

The following demands were sent to the representatives of the El Paso Smelting Works by the representatives of the employés:

State of Texas, County of El Paso.

To the Officers of the El Paso Smelting Works:

Gentlemen:—We, the undersigned representing the striking workers of the El Paso Smelting Works, hereby respectfully present to you and through you to your company, whose representatives you are, as follows, to-wit:

That the union of workers hereby represented asks for the following changes mentioned in their order of importance to them:

First. That they ask for eight hour shifts to work in all minted departments.

Second. That they ask for a raise of twenty (20) per cent of the wages upon the existing wages, said wages to be paid on the abandoning of work.

Third. We ask for the removal of the physician in charge of the hospital department, as this union if workers is not satisfied neither with his medical services nor with any other treatment that they receive at his hands. They state to your corporation that they are taxed for the support of said hospital and the support of said physician and they, in consideration of this fact think they are entitled to competent medical services and treatment. They do not presume to dictate to you whom shall be the person thus appointed, but they insist on the appointment of some competent physician who will treat them and theirs in a proper manner.

Fourth. They ask for the discharge from the employment of the El Paso Smelting Works of the chief of the contract department.

Fifth. They ask that a salary of two ($2.00) dollars for eight hour's work should be paid men who work on contract work, excluding the other salaries given the other departments.

Sixth. The union asks that laborers who have been active in the promotion of this strike and against whom no other charges can be justly alleged except in the active promotion of the strike shall not be discharged and they ask that such laborers be treated with the same treatment as all others and that no oppressive measures shall be used against them when they return to work.

Seven. The union asks for the absolute abolition of fines imposed by the contractor in chief against laborers.

Eighth. The union asks that foremen who own stores be prohibited from discharging employés when they refuse to trade with said foremen who own or may own such stores for reasons that are sufficient to themselves. In order to discuss these various propositions hereby made to your corporation through you, its officials, the union asks for a conference between your officials to the number of three and an equal number from the union, to discuss these various points of difference now existing between the Company and the union of workers and ask that each side may call in legal counsel for the determination of such other matters as may be discussed at this joint meeting.

The El Paso Smelting Works posted the following notice as an answer:

April 23, 1913

To Whom It May Concern:

With reference to various requests that have been made by some of our former workmen, we believe it advisable to make this statement, in order that there may be no misunderstanding.

During the first part of April we made an advance in wages of 25 cents per day to practically all of our men doing common laboring work, as follows:

Men in unloading and sampling department,	about	110	men	affected
Men in blast furnace	"	100	"	"
Men in reverberatory furnace	"	40	"	"
Men in converter	"	50	"	"
Men in roaster	"	50	"	"
Total men advanced		350	"	"

The advance was in the nature of a bonus, it being necessary to work at least twenty-four days a month in order to secure the bonus. This advance in wages, amounting to about $2,500 a month was given by us voluntarily; no request for any advances had been received when we gave this raise. We therefore supposed that the men would be pleased with the increase. All of them were not satisfied and many went out on a strike. Those who struck were chiefly laborers earning the minimum wage. Our skilled laborers were not affected.

Since then some men have told us that the work is so hard that twenty-four days' labor a month is an unreasonable condition for the earning of the bonus. To this we have replied that we are perfectly willing to make twenty days' labor in a month the condition for earning the bonus, as we have no intention of placing the limit so high as to be unreasonable. We believe that steady workmen are worth more to us than those who work only a few days a month, and for this reason we gave the advance in a way that would benefit these steady workmen.

Another objection made against the bonus was that it might be removed at the end of the summer. To this we replied that we have no intention of removing the bonus at the end of the summer, and are perfectly willing to say that it will remain effective during the remainder of the year, which is as far as we can look ahead.

The workmen after striking asked for an advance of 20 per cent in wages. As the majority of men affected were earning $1.40 per day, the requested advance for these men was 28 cents per day. As compared with this it will be noted the advance we made before the strike, and before receiving any demands, was 25 cents per day in bonus form. The difference between amount demanded and amount given for steady workmen (who were formerly paid $1.40) is therefore only 3 cents per day.

Our men on contract work unloading ore, were averaging about $1.59 per day during the early part of April, to which the bonus of 25 cents is to be added for the steady men, making their earnings $1 84 per day. From the way these men acted after the bonus was granted them we know they were much pleased by it, but nevertheless they stopped work a few days after the charge wheelers. The majority of the men who are dissatisfied are those who earned $1.40 per day of twelve hours under the old scale, or $1.65 under the new scale if steady workers. We have carefully compared this rate with the rates which are paid by other factories in El Paso for this class of labor, and confidently assert that this rate of $1.65 for twelve hours' work is well above the average paid by others.

That our present rates are attractive is proven by the fact that laborers in the vicinity and elsewhere in Texas are eager to come here to work for this pay; they are coming as fast as we can arrange to accommodate them, and after working a few days the great majority of them say they are perfectly contented.

Before the strike we had about 750 men at work. On April 22nd there were 365 men at work, and on April 23rd about 425.

Since the strike started, the railroads have refused to accept from any mines shipments of ore for this plant until the cars now on hand here have been unloaded. This has forced the miners to either stop shipments or send the ore to some other smelter. Before the strike we were receiving about 12,000 tons of ore monthly for the copper blast furnaces The miners are now shipping 10.000 tons of this ore to other smelters in which this company has no interest. It may be a difficult matter to induce these miners to ship to us again. It is therefore apparent that we do not need 750 men to run the plant in the way that it is necessary to run it to take care of 2,000 tons of copper blast furnace ore instead of 12,000 tons formerly received. We believe that 500 to 550 men will be enough to operate the plant in the immediate future.

We regret that change from a twelve-hour to an eight-hour shift is impossible at the present time. After this was explained to the men, as follows, we understood that they withdrew this demand: El Paso is at a great disadvantage in competing with other smelters on account of its distance from the mines. For instance, from Globe, Arizona, we have to pay a freight charge of two dollars a ton of ore. There is a smelter right in Globe that can take this ore at a freight charge of a few cents per ton. It is apparent that we can only get ore from Globe if our smelting costs are less than those of the smelter there. Should we at the present time change to an eight-hour shift it would increase our costs to such an extent that much of the ore formerly coming here would be taken by other smelters, as we could not compete for it. To meet this condition we have for the last year been planning extensive changes in our plant which will make the men's work less severe and the conditions surrounding same much more attractive. We hope that the present strike will not injure our business to such an extent that these improvements will be delayed; if they should be authorized at once, it would take a year to complete them.

Complaint has been made about the service rendered by the company doctor. We believe that the doctor is most efficient and that the complaint is really caused by the fact that the former doctor was authorized to give the men free of charge tooth powder, cold cream, and such drugs, which we now believe it unwise to furnish, as the hospital is run for the benefit of the sick people who do not require these luxuries. We shall always be glad to investigate any specific charge of inefficiency made against the doctor.

We are unwilling to discharge the chief of the contract department, as requested, because we believe he is efficient and fair to the men. The fines which he imposes on careless workmen who lose or destroy tools we also believe to be fair, but shall be glad to investigate any specific complaint which may be made in the future.

The request that a foreman who owns a store be prohibited from discharging employés when they refuse to trade at his store is entirely proper. If any abuse of this nature has occurred in the past, we assure you it will not be tolerated in the future. We are opposed to employing foremen who own stores and will not permit this practice to continue. Any foreman now owning a store or interest in same is hereby notified to dispose of such interest within a reasonable time.

The company has no interest in any store and desires that its employés be free to trade wherever they please. To assist them in doing this the change from a monthly to a weekly pay-day was made last September.

The company believes that most of the men who struck were satisfied with their wages and conditions of work.

We are constantly endeavoring to make improvements which will enable us to make the work less severe and more attractive to the men, and regret that some of our men struck after an unsolicited advance had been given them, thus causing great hardship to themselves and to their families, and also injuring our business very much.

Respectfully submitted,

CONSOLIDATED KANSAS CITY SMELTING & REFINING CO.

The employés of the El Paso Smelting Works, as a result of the attitude of the octopus has sent out the following circular:

The Smelter Workingmen in Strike.

Because it is intolerable the treatment and exceedingly hard work forced by the company at the local smelter the workingmen at the Basoules department have declared a strike that is supported and approved by the laborers of all the other departments, because they think the former's demands just, and have abandoned their labors in sympathy with the other workers.

Some slavers that will please the smelter chiefs say that they have enough workers to cover the vacancies, but we expect that nobody will do this work because the excessive labor of twelve hours per day, is too much and it is not used in any manual works, and ought not to be enforced in smelting works, where the insalubrity of the metal fumes is enough to disgrace permanently the workers.

Nobody but a slave will work twelve hours a day and for that reason the smelter workers have declared a strike against the smelter company to finish such abuse, in benefit of all the workers that are ill-treated; that pay for hospital service which they do not receive properly and which are in every way exploited.

This is the strike basis:

1st—Eight hours work instead of twelve as is done now.

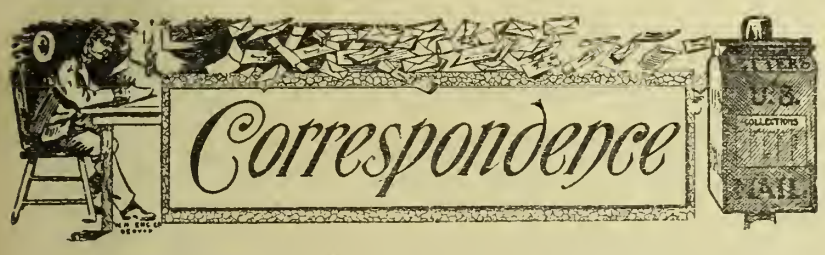
2nd—Raise of twenty per cent in the actual salaries.

3rd—Change of the present doctor because of his incompentency and because they charge us too much for his salary.

We have named special delegates to go to the Mexican Republic and neighbor towns so that every worker will know the reasons of our strike and all will recognize and honor it.

We ask every Mexican to not take our places, because it is anti-patriotic to take places left vacant by others in strike and because it will be against them all. If all do this way we will win in everybody's benefit.

We have already nominated the delegation that will present this basis as stated above.



A PROTEST FROM GRASS VALLEY MINERS' UNION.

Whereas, The Chamber of Commerce of Nevada City has published a statement in the Morning Union that the miners of this district are entirely satisfied with working conditions, and while we appreciate our relatively favored position, our organization has always aimed to better conditions and secure a higher standard of living. We do not believe our working conditions can be made too favorable by the pending legislation. While we regret raising the issue with the business interests, not to make a protest will indicate a lack of desire for better things; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we resent the action of the Chamber of Commerce. We must regard it as an unfriendly act and the organization as a potential enemy; and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the press and to members of the Legislature representing Nevada county.

CONDEMNS THE CHARGES.

The Report of the Committee to Investigate the Charges Made by the Denver Express Against John H. Slattery.

Silverton, Colorado, April 26, 1913.

Mr. President—We, your committee appointed to investigate the action of Representative John H. Slattery in voting against the investigation of the conditions in the Globe smelter, and also the charges made by the Denver Express against Mr. Slattery, beg leave to report that after a thorough investigation of the whole matter, we find that Mr. Slattery has at all times supported the demands of organized labor, and his attitude throughout the entire session of the Legislature has been friendly to labor, and we therefore condemn as untrue all charges accusing Mr. Slattery of conduct inimicable to the interests of labor.

RESOLUTIONS DEMANDING JUSTICE.

Burke, Idaho, April 27, 1913.

Burke Miners' Union No. 10, Western Federation of Miners, in regular session assembled, do hereby protest against the inhuman methods used against the striking garment workers of Little Falls, New York.

Whereas, The mill owners of Little Falls have been paying starvation wages to their employés, and now that the cost of living has advanced to a point where the wage earner cannot live on the small wages paid by the mill owners and have been compelled to strike for better conditions; and,

Whereas, The armed forces of the commonwealth have been called in to force the strikers to submit to the will of the mill owners and have received inhuman treatment at the hands of these paid thugs, who make a business of traveling from place to place to create trouble for the wage earner, these men are known as professional strike breakers and constitute the lowest strata of the human family.

Whereas, These striking toilers are not getting justice in the courts of the state of New York, and not receiving protection as citizens from the police force of Little Falls, we, the backbone of production, the workers, demand that the governor of the state of New York call a grand jury to investigate the conditions of the strikers and the methods used by the mill owners of Little Falls, New York.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the governor of New York and a copy sent to The Miners' Magazine, the official organ of the Western Federation of Miners for publication, and that every honorable means be used to get justice for the toilers, without being forced into open rebellion against the inhuman treatment we are receiving at the hands of the employers of labor. Respectfully submitted,

A TESTIMONIAL TO MARION C. LEAKE.

At a meeting held at Pioche, Nevada, April 30th, by Local No. 263, the following resolutions were adopted unanimously and a committee appointed to draft them in appreciation of the good work done by Brother Marion C. Leake, organizer for re-organizing the local at that point.

Resolved, That the thanks of this body be tendered to Brother Marion C. Leake, organizer W. F. M., for his valuable services in bringing the members of this local together into a concrete body, and as a testimonial to his unselfish, brotherly and sterling qualities, his faithful performance of duty and his high character we, the undersigned, appointed as a committee, affix our signatures.

PAT MARTIN,
L. M. CUTTS,
E. J. DECK,

Brother Leake has been at Pioche for about two months and during that time has accomplished wonderful results in reorganizing the local here. His many friends both in the union and outside regret his departure and hope he will visit us again soon. PAT MARTIN.

OH, ORTIE, ORTIE WILL SOON BE FREE, AND THAT'S WHY POOR ORTIE IS SO SAD.

By Patsy O'Bang.

Ortie McManigal, who brought fame and fortune to his fair name by confessing to a number of mischievious adventures with sticks of dynamite and later disappearing for a whole day, causing the noted Patsy O'Bang no end of heart pain, will soon be a free man. The doors of the county jail will open, it was announced yesterday, and the unrefined Ortie turned into the cruel, cruel world.

When seen by Patsy O'Bang yesterday, Ortie was in tears.

"Why should they turn me into the street after I've been here for two years?" he asked the sympathetic Patsy. "Here I've had the best of everything—good cigars, champagne, duck, cream puffs and ice cream. I've been treated like a lord for peaching on the McNamaras, and my reward is only two years in this lovely jail.

"Why, Patsy," Ortie added, "you yourself know that only a few weeks ago they took me down to Venice and let me spend the whole day fishing. You know because you spent the day looking for me. Haw! Haw! Haw!

"Believe me, Patsy—I mean Patrick Ignatius O'Bang, that was some fishing trip. And now, after two years of the cream of life, with boxes of cigars from the old General himself, they're going to drive me out to take a job somewhere; and that's the way I'm treated after all I done to help these big ginks turn the trick.

"I tell you, it's a hard, hard world, when I do them a favor and they end up by putting me out of this paradise."

Ortie could not say another word. Tears overwhelmed him, and falling upon a couch he dissolved in tears. A deputy rushed forward and sprinkled some champagne over him, which soon pacified the sobbing Ortie.

"Cheer up," said the deputy, "I know it's hard on you after all the fun you've had here, and after all the kind things we done for you; but you can't tell, Ortie, you may be able to do another stunt like the other one, and then you'll be able to have two more years of this stuff."

This seemed to encourage the flabby Ortie. Turning to Patsy O'Bang, Ortie said:

"I hope so, for I'd love to write another book. Conditions for me in this jail were so ideal that I couldn't resist the temptation of writing a book of poetry and a fiction story about the dynamitings."

LANE MINERS' UNION CONDEMNS EXPOSITOR ARTICLE.

Kimberly, Nevada, April 24, 1913.

Whereas, There appeared in the Ely Mining Expositor of April 21, 1913, a notice relative to strike rumors, which was signed by F. C. Rowan and Arhtur McDonald, respectivcly president and secretary of the Ely Central Labor League; and,

Whereas, Lane Miners' Union at a regular meeting held Thursday, April 17, 1913, by a unanimous vote of all members present, refused to make any such statement for publication, for the reason that said strike rumors did not originate with said union, its members or officers, or any organizer of said Western Federation of Miners; and,

Whereas, Said Ely Mining Expositor, in commenting upon said notice, made an attack upon Mr. Thomas Corra, organizer of the Western Federation of Miners, claiming that said organizer was out of harmony with said union and its members, which statement upon the part of said newspaper is unqualifiedly false; also said newspaper in said statement made it appear that said organizer, Mr. Thomas Corra, has attempted to cause another strike in this district, which statement upon the part of said newspaper is also unqualifiedly false; and,

Whereas, The editor of said newspaper, for reasons best known to himself, has seen fit in said article to attack President Moyer of the Western Federation of Miners, by making false statements concerning Mr. Moyer in reference to his connections with the late strike; and,

Whereas, Said false statements and comments by said newspaper, in our opinion were made for the purpose of creating an antagonistic sentiment against the Western Federation of Miners, with the hope of minimizing its power of continuing the doing of good work for the betterment of the men of the mines, mills and smelters; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby unqualifiedly and emphatically condemn the above referred to statements and comments of said Ely Mining Expositor, believing the same to be inimical to our best interests and to that of organized labor as a whole; and, be it further

Resolved, That we hereby re-affirm our allegiance to the Western Federation of Miners, and hereby pledge to its officers and organizers our undivided support for the good cause of labor.

PUTTING ON THE SCREWS.

By Frederick Monroe.

The brand of so-called "democracy" which exists among the dominant Southern Democrats in the United States Senate has been recently revealed. Just what kind of "progressivism" may be expected from this branch of the new administration was revealed by the sharp snapping teeth which came from the direction of the north end of the capitol when President Wilson sent in the name of Charles P. Neill to succeed himself as commissioner of labor statistics in the new Department of Labor.

Commissioner Neill has been commissioner of labor since that bureau became a part of the Department of Commerce and Labor. When the new Department of Labor was created in the expiring hours of the last session, Neill's bureau was transferred to the new department. But Commissioner Neill's term of office expired in January, and President Taft sent his name to the Senate for confirmation to succeed himself. The Senate Democrats, hungry for spoils, were able to block the confirmation of any Taft appointments in the last weeks of the session, and the job remained unfilled. President Wilson promptly forwarded Neill's name to the Senate almost as soon as he took office.

But distinct signs of agitation appeared in the Senate. Tillman and Overman, than whom there are no greater apostles of reactionism in the United States Senate—which is saying much, when it is remembered that the Senate also contains Elihu Root, Reed Smoot, Cabot Lodge and Boies Penrose—emphatically demurred. Indeed, demurred is hardly strong enough. They figuratively howled. Neill, they said, is no fit person to have any longer on the job as commissioner of labor statistics. He is a very improper person. And they had good reason to oppose him. For Neill, as commissioner of labor, and taking seriously a resolution of Congress which directed him to probe women and child labor conditions in the Southern cotton mills and factories, actually did that thing.

Not realizing that he was expected to whitewash everything nasty in sight, Neill actually took the job seriously and struck the probe deep down into the filth and mire of capitalist exploitation of helpless women and little children. The stench of the horrible conditions which he and his agents of the bureau exposed smelled to high heaven. And some of the worst conditions were found in the states of North and South Carolina. The worst conditions of child labor and the greatest degree of exploitation Neill showed to exist in these states. Compared with some of his revelations the city of Lawrence, Mass., is a model industrial community.

It is a coincidence that the Hon. Benjamin R. Tillman is a senator from South Carolina, and the Hon. Lee S. Overman is a senator from North Carolina. And these are the men who are raising their hands on high and declaring that never—no, never—if they can help it, will such a wicked, bad person as Charles P. Neill be permitted to occupy the post of commissioner of labor statistics in the new administration.

When Neill's reports were ready to be printed, the utmost opposition appeared in the Senate. Pressure was brought to bear on the joint committee on printing and the report was held up for weeks. Finally, after sharp debate on the floor of the Senate, a very limited quantity of the reports was allowed to be printed, to be distributed by senators. It is a fact that the Bureau of Labor had practically no copies of the various sections of its report which it could distribute. It is with the utmost difficulty that persons interested in the matter have been able to obtain copies—the supply is so limited.

We can get a splendid forecast of just what the new Department of Labor is and is not to be permitted to do under the new "progressive" Democratic administration through this Neill incident. This is a warning to every conscientious government official that if he does his duty and publishes facts which are unpleasant to the capitalist system of industry as represented in the United States Senate, he may expect the vigorous opposition of capitalist senators. If he is "good" and does not take his job too seriously, there will be no opposition to reappointment when his term expires. This is the way capitalist politics works and always must work. Members of Congress faithfully represent the interests which send them to Congress. Having been chosen on capitalist party tickets, running on capitalist party platforms, and avowedly in the interest of the capitalist system of production—the present system—we must expect nothing else than honest, conscientious service in the cause of capitalism.

The Democratic party stands for "small capitalism"—individualism, return to competition, low tariff capitalism. The Republican party stands for trustified, high-protected, centralized capitalism. The Progressive party stands for trustified, but "regulated," high-protected capitalism. BUT ALL ALIKE STAND FOR CAPITALISM, FIRST, LAST AND ALL THE TIME.

The Socialist party alone stands for the PEOPLE'S TRUST; the cooperative ownership, democratically controlled, of the principal means of production and distribution, and its operation in the interests of the producers instead of the parasites.

BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM!

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

By Agnes H. Downing.

While all can see that women are sold for sex commerce, until very recently it was believed that the women were themselves the sellers. It was thought that either for love of luxury, or discouragement after seduction, or through their hunger needs women have consented to sell themselves promiscuously. But in late years and through accumulated evidence, it has been proved that the great business of supplying inmates for evil institutions has been and is carried on by persons who make a business of securing the girls for this traffic.

Our own Bebel, in his great work, "Woman," tells how the finding of German girls in evil resorts in the far away countries of the East, as well as scattered over North and South America, helped to make clear the fact that the girls had not traveled, but had been shipped by others who were to make profits from their lives. Similar facts had been proven of the daughters of other European countries.

Dr. O. Edward Janney, in his book, "The White Slave Traffic in America," says:

"This business has become established in America. It is more or less clandestinely, but extensively carried on in the United States, where some of the shrewdest and most unscrupulous traders have harvested large profits from a sort of brokerage system of trafficking in women. It is a business carried on for profit."

After the facts were well established, and after much importuning by many organizations, the governments of western Europe were prevailed upon to enter into a treaty, which they did in 1904, for the suppression of this traffic. In 1908 the United States joined in this treaty.

Up to that time a white slave traffic seemed to most people but a sensational story—a figment in the brain of some reformer or overcritical Socialist. Investigation following, though by no means as thorough or as far-reaching, and not at all followed up by the curative measures that the gravity of the case demanded, yet went far enough to convince the most skeptical that there was indeed a slavery of women more cruel, more complete and more threatening in its consequences than any slavery of a whole people that has ever existed. For if a nation was enslaved, the members at least had the comfort of each other's companionship and hopes of regaining freedom. But for these girls, taken when very young, shamed in the minds of those near and dear to them, anathematized by all society, there is little hope of freedom or release but in death.

Edwin W. Sims, United States district attorney of Chicago, says:

"Things are being done every day in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other large cities of this country in the white slave traffic which would, by contrast, make the Congo slave traders of the old days appear like good Samaritans."

Bebel says ("Woman," page 157):

"The traffic in female flesh has assumed mammoth proportions. It is conducted on a most extensive scale, and is most admirably organized in the very midst of the seats of civilization and culture, rarely attracting the notice of the police. A swarm of brokers, agents, carriers, male and female, ply the trade with the same unconcern as if they dealt in any other merchandise."

In 1907 the United States government, through a special committee of the Immigration Commission, made an investigation of the importation and harboring of women for immoral purposes. This report says (Senate document 196, pages 8 and 9):

"The procurers, with cunning knowledge of human nature, play upon the weaknesses of vanity and pride, upon the laudable thrift and desire to secure a better livelihood, upon the praisworthy trust and loyalty which innocent girls have for those to whom they have given their affection, even upon their sentiments of religion, to get their victims into their toils; and then, in the pursuit of their purposes, with a cruelty at times fiendish in its calculating coldness and brutality, they exploit their attractions to the uttermost. If the woman is young and affectionate, as often happens, the procurer makes her acquaintance, treats her kindly, offers to assist her in securing a better livelihood. Her confidence and affection won, she is within his power, and is calculatingly led into a life of shame. . . .

"The procurer may put his woman into a disorderly house, sharing the profits with the madam. He may sell her outright; he may act as an agent for another man; he may keep her, making arrangements for her hunting men. She must walk the streets and secure her patrons, to be exploited, not for her own sake, but for that of her owner. Often he does not tell her even his real name. She knows his haunts, where she may send word to him in case of arrest. She knows the place given her to which she must come every night and give him all her earnings. She must deny her importation, must lie regarding her residence, her address and the time she has been in the country. If she tries to leave her man, she is threatened with arrest. If she resists, she finds all the men about her leagued against her; she may be beaten; in some cases when she has betrayed her betrayer she has been murdered."

They secure such power over the girls, first, because the girls are young and ignorant of their legal rights, and again because a girl is always suspicioned for being led into such a place. Though she be perfectly innocent, people are not ready to believe her. Lastly, when the punishment is beating or death, girls and men, too, can be forced into almost anything.

The awful, though illuminating, graft exposures in New York, for instance, proves that the unhappy girls have not only their one master, but officialdom all the way up to battle against. Small wonder that they fail and are lost.

Remember, it is always poor girls who have no friends powerful enough to pursue and save them. They must be saved by a movement of the whole working class.

I know of nothing so calculated to arouse the workers to the necessity of radical changes in our present institutions than this shameful slavery in which a large number of their fairest daughters are kept.

The honored name of August Bebel is found as a writer in the tracts of the English Abolition Society, a society for the prevention of state regulation of vice In the midst of his busy career for the full emancipation he has not hesitated to use much of his splendid energy to combat sex slavery of woman.

It is just as much the duty of Socialists here and now to combat the white slave traffic as it is to strive for higher wages, rights of asylum, universal peace, or any of the other measures for which we all contend. It is in this broadness of spirit that our best good is to be found.

LOW WAGES AND PROSTITUTION.

By W. M. Feigenbaum.

The findings of the Illinois Minimum Wage Commission are the most startling that the country has heard in a long time. Not that the connection between low wages and prostitution was not known before, but that this probe puts that belief squarely upon the solid foundation of official demonstrated fact.

We do not have to comment upon the findings. They tell their own terrible story, and they indict the cursed capitalist system more pointedly than any Socialist could. But there are two or three phases that have come out that need to be publicly commented on.

The old story is that the inherent wickedness is the cause that drives women on the streets. The preachers preached upon that theory. The "religious" descanted upon it. And now, that theory is reinforced from a most unexpected source, from the women themselves. Not their own wickedness, but the wickedness of men.

It is related that several prostitutes have been writing to the Chicago papers, bitterly resenting the idea that they were driven out by their low wages. One of them writes that she was living on $8 a week when men lured her away from virtue.

"Girls don't go wrong because they are hungry or because they need clothes. They go wrong because they are tempted by lies and overpowered by the evil in men. They listen to the fair and pretty things that men tell them, and they fall because they think they can trust themselves and trust the tempters. It is not the employer. I was a good girl and I worked in a store.

"I didn't get much money, but that didn't matter. I lived on $8 a week and would be living like that now—but I was thrown in contact with men who seemed to consider me their prey."

Another woman wrote: "You are looking for the things that make women wicked. Low wages, dance halls, hunger, cold. They all helped a bit, but they were not entirely responsible. You are afraid to look the thing in the face and afraid to learn the truth. Why don't you make the men be good? All the wages in the world won't help us. Make the men good and the girls will be good."

These things are of the deepest interest and importance. That low wages drive girls onto the streets is too well-known a thing to be refuted at this time and by these women. They are filled with the bitterness of their lot and the deception of the men who ruined them. They have forgotten the bitter struggle to make ends meet. They have forgotten that it was the awful grind that weakened their backbone and made it possible for them to listen to the siren call of a "good time."

And here is the crux of the whole situation: If there were not millions of men in every walk of life, who patronized the prostitutes, then all the poverty in the world would not corrupt a single girl, then the poverty that they suffer would but starve them to death, as it does to the men victims of capitalism. It is the men who offer a good time to the tired, overworked, underpaid girl who is the menace. It is the wickedness of the slimy reptiles who make a business of ruining girls that drives them down. But there would be few victims of the cafés if there were not the market for the girls after they are ruined.

Of course, there is the abnormal person who will crave an abnormal sexual life, regardless of social conditions. Such women will always find ways to do as they choose. But such women do not constitute a social problem. They are well able to take care of themselves. They have only their consciences to answer to. It is the large, terrible question of prostitution that concerns us here. And the victims of prostitution are the victims of our social system as directly as is possible for them to be. Those unctuous creatures who insist that the girls who go wrong do so because they like it, may be right if they refer to the abnormal ones who prefer sexual looseness, and gratify their desires; but this class is hardly large enough to supply the great demand for women that has assumed the proportions of an organized business.

The great point is not that women get pitifully small wages. Men do that, too. The point is that there is the great demand for prostitutes among men that constitutes the great social problem. And the great demand for sexual life outside the family bond is a phenomenon that can be placed right at the door of the capitalist system. It is the uncertainty of the economic conditions of the mass of the young working class, the uninviting picture of of the married life of their elders, with its ceaseless, dull grind, its carking cares, its petty annoyances that are as mountains of worry when added one to the other, day in and day out, the year round, that makes the young working class a little timid of entering the bonds of holy matrimony.

There are other things, of course; the suggestive plays that profit-seeking managers put on the stage, the double standard of morality that is taught, that add thereto, but in general, the young men of the working class are anxious enough to enter the married state, but cannot. That is the cause of the great demand for prostitutes. The rich, with their mistresses and their wine suppers, and all the rest, can take care of themselves. That is a spectacular, but not too important part of the story. The real meat of it is the selling of hundreds of thousands of girls into slavery to poor young men, who would rather not.

The committee of the New York Senate that will investigate the situation next month, has been receiving letters from women of the underworld that display a remarkable amount of intelligence and understanding of the social problem. They recognize that it is the great demand for their services (which demand they do not analyze), together with low wages, dreary home lives, bitterness instead of sweetness as their lot that make girls easy victims. There are those who can hold out and eat out their hearts. But there are those who cannot. And just as the man who remains true to his ideal, and refuses advancement and preferment, is called a fool by the money-worshipping sycophants of capitalism, so is the girl who remains true to her honor subjected to awful pressure. She may withstand it. Many do. But the cost in wasted lives and blasted happiness and health is terrible.

And now, as if to prove the Socialist contention, comes Henry Siegel, a great department store owner of New York, with a learned disquisition on this question. The gentleman in question employs over 6,000 women in his store. After a lot of junk about the inherent goodness of good women and the badness of those who are bad, etc., he makes the following startling statement: That if the minimum wage law is passed, as suggested by the O'Hara investigators, it will make for immorality, for rather than pay women $12 a week, as fixed by law, they would rather get men at the same amount and fire the women. Henry Siegel is calm about it. Possibly he does not see the terrible import of his suggestion. He does not see that he has produced a more terrible indictment of the system that he supports than any Socialist could with his facts and figures. But he says that he will drive 6,000 girls, who, he says, are thoroughly moral, onto the streets rather than pay a certain living wage.

There's your capitalist system for you, with its crime and wickedness, and its vice. Pass a law, patch up the system a bit, try to make it fit to live in, and the thieves who profit by the system drive our sisters and our daughters and our sweethearts to the brothels rather than lose a few dirty dollars. There's your system that the working class votes for year after year. There's the system that Socialism will utterly overthrow.

THE WOODTICKS.

By Agnes Thecla Fair.

The spying system having failed, and suckers, like oysters and starfish, being void of any gray matter and all detectives, more commonly called "detectives," being unable to cope with that sturdy giant, Labor, a new species has come to light, namely, the woodtick. The woodtick is a small gray bug, whose fangs come from the serpent family, and when one gets a woodtick on their body, you cannot remove the same without its fangs are filled with blood, and it also takes, like capitalism, its quota of flesh.

Horses realizing that with all their brute strength it is impossible to remove woodticks from their body, jump into a creek or brush fire to burn them off. So we roughnecks must use the intelligence of horses and question Labor's woodticks.

One specie of Labor's woodtick is paid by brokers Ireland and Fortune Ryan to go into the labor unions, and after a whirlwind (emphasis on the wind) talk; say that Debs employs a Jap valet and incidently scab labor, a la "Brother" Collins.

Another specie of the woodtick is the I. W. W. bleeders, or leaders, who robbed the safe in Goldfield of the miners' watches, and write how one of the Western Federation officials bought a large ranch in California, the object being to employ peons. These specie associate and employ the patched-pants shysters who go around telling about Darrow having a secret interest in the Fairmount and Palace hotels, and how Darrow is only long on the plea. Believe me, these shysters dream to be a Darrow, but their vision is too narrow.

We also find the female specie, a la woodtick, who, like Mrs. Shirc Bobbins, "gave up" a life of luxury to help us working girls, whose soul mate put the Chicago daily on the bum with their champagne account. The hell of it all is the strong-armed roughneck claps the callouses off his hands when these woodticks arrive with their capitalistic free advertising, when he should swell their eyes out even with their nose.

The time is right here—now—that active, intelligent men and women in Labor's army must be let alone by these scalawags, even. Even tho as the dock workers in London had to protect the suffragettes, the members of the miners' union may have to protect those who are worth while. The men and women who have actually accomplished something or prevented encroachments of cannibalistic cussedness from destroying their class should be given a respectful hearing by all roughnecks and not the paid emissaries of capitalism. Take away the salary and "prestige" of the lime-lighters and most of them would be on the other side of the fence shouting, "Vive la capital!"

Why carry excess baggage in woodticks who are so busy throwing bricks at workers? Not the former positions of these woodticks, whether they were "dice" presidents of labor and hobnobbed with the fathead who just went out of the presidential chair or their acquaintance with the little college runt who just went in; but how many educational facilities did they provide their "brothers" with? None; absolutely none.

The American Federation or any other organization of labor has no educational department, because of the valuation placed on the hot air of these woodticks.

Brother Roughnecks, these woodticks, like the specie from whence they spring, cannot spread spotted fever as they hope, tho they may exact a small piece of worthless flesh here and there, but your sister, Agnes Rachel, knows that labor has a healthy body and a clean mind, and after all, there is nothing like these two things. They have withstood all the onslaughts of capitalistic cussedness, and will surely stand the fangs of the woodticks who greet one with a capitalistic grin like the panther they represent, and jingle the shekels of toil.

THE WELL IN THE DESERT.

Before the cadi of an eastern city there came from the desert two torn and bruised travelers.

"There were five of us, they said, "on our way hither with merchandise. A day's journey hence we halted and made our camp, when following us there came a crowd of ill-conditioned fellows, who demanded entrance to our camp, and who, on our refusing it, used to us violent and threatening words, and, when we answered not their threats, set upon us with force. Three of us were slain, and we two barely escaped with our lives to ask for justice."

"Justice you shall have," answered the cadi. "If what you say is true, they who assaulted you when you had not assaulted them shall die. If what you say is not true, your own lives shall pay the penalty of falsehood."

When the assailants of the merchants arrived they were brought at once before the cadi.

"Is the merchants' story true?" he asked.

"It is, but—"

"I will hear no more!" cried the cadi. "You admit having reviled men who had not reproached you, and having assaulted men who had not assaulted you. In this you have deserved death."

But as they were being carried off to execution the prisoners still tried to explain.

"Hear them, cadi," said an old man, "lest you commit injustice."

"But they have admitted the merchants' words are true."

"Yest, but their words may not be all the truth.

So the cadi heard them, and they said that when they came to the merchants' halting place they found that the merchants had pitched their camp around the only well in that part of the desert, and refused to let them enter and drink. They first remonstrated, then threatened, and then, rather than die of thirst, rushed upon the merchants' camp, and in the melee three of the merchants were slain.

"Is this also true?" asked the cadi of the merchants.

The merchants were forced to admit that it was.

"Then," said the cadi, "you told me truth that, being only part of the truth, was really a falsehood. You were the aggressors by taking for yourselves alone the only well from which these men could drink. Now the death I have decreed is for you."—Henry George.

BRANN BRAIN FLASHES.

(Excerpts from the Brann books.)

The basis of optimism is foreordination, the foolish faith that before God created the majestic universe and sent the planets whirling about the blazing sun; that before the first star gleamed in the black, o'er-hanging firmament or a single mountain peak rose from the watery waste, He calmly sat down and mapped out every act of mortal man—decreed every war and pestilence, the rise and fall of every nation, and fixed the date of every birth and death. That may be excellent "orthodoxy," but it is not good sense.

Gall is sublimated audacity, transcendent impudence, immaculate nerve, triple-plated cheek, brass in solid slugs. It is what enables a man to borrow five dollars of you, forget to pay it, then touch you for twenty more. It is what makes it possible for a woman to borrow her neighbor's best bonnet, then complain because it isn't the latest style or doesn't suit her particular type of beauty. It is what causes people to pour their troubles into the ears of passing acquaintances instead of reserving them for home consumption. It is what makes a man aspire for governorship, or to air his asininity in the Congress of the United States, when he should be fiddling on a stick of cord wood with an able-bodied buck saw. It is what leads a feather-headed fop, with no fortune but his folly, no prospects but poverty—who lacks business ability to find bread for himself—to mention marriage to a young lady reared in luxury, to ask her to leave the house of her father, and help him fill the land with fools. Gall is what spoils so many good ditchers and delvers to make peanut politicians and putty-headed professional men. It is what puts so many men in the pulpit who could serve the Savior much better planting the mild-eyed potato or harvesting the useful hoop-pole. It is what causes so many young ladies to rush into literature instead of the laundry—to become poets of passion instead of authors of pie.

THE WAYS OF THE WEALTHY.

Sums Squandered on Gorgeous Luxuries While the Workers Starve.

It is sometimes said that during this grotesquely hideous march of civilization from bad to worse, wealth is increasing side by side with misery. Such a thing is eternally impossible; wealth is steadily decreasing with the spread of poverty. But riches are increasing, which is quite another thing. The total of the exchange values produced in the country annually is mounting perhaps by leaps and bounds. But the accumulation of riches, and consequently of an excessive purchasing power, in the hands of a class, soon satiates that class with socially useful wealth, and sets them offering a price for luxuries.

The moment a price is to be had for a luxury, it acquires exchange value, and labor is employed to produce it. A New York lady, for instance, having an elegant rosewood and silver coffin, upholstered in pink satin, for her dead dog. It is made, and meanwhile a live child is prowling barefooted and hunger-stunted in the frozen gutter outside. The exchange value of the coffin is counted as part of the national wealth; but a nation which cannot afford food and clothing for its children cannot be allowed to pass as wealthy because it has provided a pretty coffin for a dead dog.

Exchange value itself, in fact, has become bedeviled like everything else, and represents, no longer utility, but the cravings of lust, folly, vanity, gluttony and madness, technically described by genteel economists as "effective demand." Luxuries are not social wealth; the machinery for producing them is not social wealth; labor skilled only to manufacture them is not socially useful; the men, women and children who make a living by producing them are no more self-supporting than the idle rich, for whose amusement they are kept at work.

It is the habit of counting as wealth the exchange values involved in these transactions that makes us fancy that the poor are starving in the midst of plenty of jewels, velvets, laces, equipages and race horses; but not in the midst of plenty of food. In the things that are wanted for the welfare of the people we are abjectly poor, and England's social policy today may be likened to the domestic policy of those adventuresses who leave their children half-clothed and half-fed in order to keep a carriage and deal with a fashionable dressmaker.

But it is quite true that while wealth and welfare are decreasing, productive power is increasing, and nothing but the perverison of this power to the production of socially useless commodities prevents the apparent wealth from becoming real. The purchasing power that commands luxuries in the hands of the rich would command true wealth in the hands of all. Yet private property can make—the great accumulation of so-called wealth it points so proudly to as the result of its power to scourge men and women daily to prolonged and intense toil, turns out to be a simulacrum. With all its energy, its Smilesian "self-help," its merchant princely enterprise, its ferocious sweating and slave-driving, its prodigality of blood, sweat and tears, what has it heaped up, over and above the pittance of its slaves? Only a monstrous pile of frippery, some tainted class literature and class art, and not a little poison and mischief.—Bernard Shaw.

SURPLUS VALUE.

One of the objections many make to the Socialist is his tendency to use big words. There is merit in the objection we acknowledge, still as the science, like all others, has a vocabulary of its own, or rather as its interpretation of words differs from those given by bourgeois, or middle-class economists, there must arise at times confusion in the minds of those whose knowledge has been obtained through the educational channels controlled by the capitalist class.

Again there is the conceit common to many of us of taking a certain measure of pride in our ability to use several-syllabled words. This, however, we should endeavor to combat, or at least to govern ourselves according to the mental and educational abilities of those to whom we wish to impart information.

There is often heard the remark: "He is talking over the heads of his audience." This is unfortunately a common occurrence with some orators; the difficulty is, that, having been schooled in a certain style, it is no easy task to change it. The marvelous sale that Robert Blatchford's books have had is because of the simplicity in which he clothes his language. This is a gift which but few enjoy. Still to him or her who does wish to learn, there is always an opportunity of doing so if he or she will persevere.

Our object in beginning this article was not intended as a homily, although we think it is not out of place, but to make at least an attempt to explain some of the meanings of those words which form a part of the stock-in-trade of every Socialist writer and speaker.

The word "profit" conveys a meaning that is readily grasped by the ordinary individual; use "surplus value" and, although there is a certain misty idea that surplus means "extra" and value may mean "worth," the combination as understood by a student of economics is an unknown quantity to one who is not. As it is the latter, more than the former, that this article is intended to reach, we will make a few general observations before going into the kernel of the subject.

We will now turn our attention to the questions, "value" and "surplus value." Quite often some wiseacre will talk about two men working so many hours over a piece of work, and because one is 50 per cent better workman than the other that the "value" of one's labor is not as great as the other. This is quite correct. No Socialist economist claims that the labor value of each man is equal. Here's what Marx says, and if there are any words, or if the sense of any portion is not understood because of the language, then it is only necessary for the puzzled one to write to us, and we will try, in a later issue, to make it still plainer.

Marx says: "In saying that the value of a commodity is determined by the quantity of labor worked at or crystallized in it, we mean the quantity of labor necessary for its production in a given state of society UNDER CERTAIN SOCIAL AVERAGE CONDITIONS OF PRODUCTION, WITH A GIVEN SOCIAL AVERAGE INTENSITY, AND AVERAGE SKILL OF THE LABOR EMPLOYED." Note the words "Social average." They are important.

If a man could grow oranges in Fernie under glass and the time and money expended figured them as costing 10 cents each, and oranges shipped in from California could be bought in the local stores at 50 cents a dozen, the value of these commodities is not $1.20 a dozen to the Fernie producer, because in a given state of society, under certain "social average conditions of production, they can be placed on the market at a lower price. That is, the favored climatic conditions of California does not require that glass should be used for the growing of oranges—the laborers can be hired for much less in California than one would have to pay in Fernie, due to the differences in the cost of production of the laborer's commodity—his labor power.—District Ledger, Fernie, B. C.

CATHOLICISM AND SOCIALISM.

At the ceremonies attending the laying of the cornerstone of the new club house of the Knights of Columbus in Seattle, one of the chief spokesmen of that Catholic organization, District Deputy John D. Carmody, expressed the hope that the new building may be regarded by the people as pledged to the protection and defense of the country, as a protest against Socialism and anarchy, and that always from the members of the order the city, state and nation may receive citizens of worth.

Such sentiments as these are an insult and a challenge to the millions of men and women throughout the world who are avowed Socialists. In the first place the speaker links Socialism with anarchy, and leads his hearers to infer that Socialists are foes to the well-being of the nation against whom Catholics protest.

Why this attack on the part of a religious organization against another organization which is economic in theory, political in practice and assails no individual's religious belief or faith? Nor is this an isolated case, for the Catholic church has taken a decided stand against Socialism, its church dignitaries and officials preaching, lecturing and writing against this doctrine and its followers constantly, and then when replied to, seeking to make it appear that Socialism is against religion.

The truth concerning the hostility of the Catholic church towards Socialism is that Catholicism stands for the existing economic system of society, and senses in Socialism a foe to privilege and power.

How well the Catholic church estimates the real situation and the strength of social-democracy may be seen in the many utterances of its leaders. For instance, about a year ago, in speaking before the Catholic Club of New York, Rev. Terence J. Sheady, S. J., stated: "We are face to face with a new situation, unlike anything in history, a situation arising out of an acute sense of contradiction between economic development and civil liberty and equality, and expressing itself in doctrines and schemes both reconstructive and revolutionary. . . . Socialism presents itself to the world panoplied as a science, with a new philosophy of human relations. . . . In its political side, for it has a political side and a political party ever in session, it would destroy the present state, which it calls the class state, and erect in its place the work state—which is intended to administer and not to govern, for the superman of the future will not need to be governed, and will not submit to government. It would use political power to destroy capitalism, which alone makes political power possible and a necessity. To the Socialist the present political state is but a huge instrument of slavery, the bulwark of the dominant and exploiting classes. There will be no need or no reason for it when the classes cease, and there will be nobody above and nobody below—no master and no servant."

What is herein quoted is sufficient to show that a very correct understanding is had by learned Catholics of the real significance of Socialism, and therefore the head of the Catholic church, who claims temporal power and authority as well as spiritual, naturally opposes a real democracy.

In so far as Catholicism confines its teachings and activities to religion proper, having to do with matters of faith and belief in Deity, Socialism has no quarrel. In fact, Socialist representatives in European governments have resented acts of aggression directed at Catholics on religious grounds, and have taken the same course in those cases where Jews have been persecuted for similar reasons. But whenever the Catholic church as an organization, or any of its members organized, undertakes to interfere in temporal affairs they must reckon with opposition and it is cowardice then to claim that their religion is being assailed by their opponents. Catholicism claiming temporal power stands for the principle of economic class and caste distinctions in society, and seeks to bolster up its claim on religious grounds.

Socialism can afford to smile with indulgence upon the pretensions of the Knights of Columbus and Catholicism, for it realizes that all they stand for is in keeping with the feudal past, that their sun is setting, while that which they assail, International Socialism, is the spirit of the new democracy, born of a scientific and self-dependent mind, determined to establish a civilization in which the ethics of authority shall be forever void, and men shall live in the spirit of unity, brothers and comrades, without fear, and full of a spirit of exaltation which only freedom and wisdom knoweth.—Seattle Herald.

USE YOUR IMAGINATION.

One of the most significant things in the world, from a working-class point of view is the steady extension of industry to what are known as western countries. The term "western" is, of course, purely relative, and simply means a part of the earth which lies in a westerly direction from those countries which during the last century have been the industrial centers of the world. In other words, it means those countries which lie west of Europe.

The nineteenth century in Europe witnessed the birth of the industrial system in which we live, and at that time, and until comparatively recent years, most of the commerce and manufacture of the world was carried on in and from those countries. The early days of the nineteenth century witnessed the birth of these things in England, and the discoveries which resulted in the application of mechanical power to the processes of industry rapidly changed the countryside of rural Europe into one gigantic factory, and at the same time changed the habits and customs of millions of people to suit the new conditions.

In those days the tide of working-class immigration and money for investment was towards European countries. Today the tide of both is away from Europe and towards these western lands. This is chiefly due to the fact that the possibilities for investment in Europe have become practically exhausted. That does not mean that industry in Europe is played out, but it does mean that the profits which the capitalists of Europe are continually receiving from their enterprises cannot be reinvested in the lands where they have been produced and that consequently new fields for investment and capitalization must be discovered.

Those new fields are in the western lands which are rich in natural resources, such as forests, fisheries, mines and arable land. However, the facts that European capitalists had money to invest and Canada had great natural resources would not of themselves be sufficient. And if it were impossible for the capitalists to secure the necessary human labor power they would be helpless in so far as their ability to make profits in this country were concerned.

But the same set of economic phenomena which have enriched them beyond the dreams of their fathers, have also made the necessary supply of labor power available. The constant extension of the application of machinery to industry and the constant centralization of production and management, have finally produced an army of unemployed labor power which must either seek hire in other lands or die. The latter method of solving the problem is attended with so many disagreeable and unbecoming possibilities that the innate respectability of the masses has up to now prevented them from embracing it as a means of escape from their dilemma. So they come to the new lands, and thus complete the list of things necessary to modern methods of wealth production.

And this is the point at which the problem of the organized labor movement of this country commences, and what is needed at this particular time more than anything else is, men in the movement who have the necessary imagination to grasp the significance of the present moment, and the requisite mental equipment to lay down plans for the future in the economic interests of our class.

But imagination such as can recognize these facts is not over abundant among the workers, and we should only be building a fool's paradise by giving our vanity the momentary satisfaction which might come from efforts to believe otherwise. The narrow lives of the workers are not conducive to the development of faculties capable of conceiving the stupendous task and possibilities which will confront us as this mighty industrial drama gradually unfolds itself. Their existence is an everlasting struggle for bread, which leaves them too tired with overmuch physical labor to be fit for such a task.

But some few there are—and they are an evergrowing number—who can glimpse the work which the future years hold for the movement, and it is a duty in which they cannot fail to make known to those who see less clearly, the nature of the struggle which is coming, and to point out as well as they are able the means and methods by which the workers may secure for themselves a greater share of that wealth which is theirs by right of being the only indispensable factor in its production.

When we come to realize the size of Canada and the fact that it as yet only contains about as many people as are in the one city of London, England, and knowing what we do of the natural resources of this country, it is obvious that the industrial life of Canada is as yet, only in its infant, or embryonic stage.

We in our day have an advantage over the founders of our movement. We are able to trace step by step the measures adopted by them in their struggles for freedom, and we can also—if we will—profit by their failures. and nothing short of absolute apathy and ignorance is any excuse for not doing so. And as the industrialization of Canada gradually proceeds it will reproduce in many of its essential features those very same problems which so perplexed our forefathers.

They had not so many advantages in the way of being able to read and write and general education which the working class of today have, but they accomplished a work which will leave us few idle moments if we intend to take up that work and apply to its extension and development the superior knowledge which we imply when we so loftily say: "What was good enough for our grandfathers is not good enough for us."

The essential thing is that we should grasp the tremendous advantage which organized labor has in these new countries by being in on the ground floor. And it is not for us to be wasting time counting our hosts or exchanging boquets, but to be out among the uninformed workers spreading a knowledge of what the movement means to them and their class.—B. C. Federationist.

MEDICINE AND ECONOMICS.

Last week at their annual meeting the Baltimore Association of Physicians invited speakers, and gave addresses on the subject of economics and medicine. It was an unusual subject for a medical society to give addresses upon, but the profession is continually coming up against the results of our economic mismanagement in the form of poverty and industrial diseases. And it recognizes that in sickness at least the interest of the individual is the interest of the community. People cannot keep diseases to themselves. Even the poor, segregated as they mostly are, will be sharing their germs. To keep the community healthy the social body must be treated as a single patient—so much is certain, say the doctors.

Moreover their profession, by its training, is one to go to the bottom of things. Nothing is so abhorrent to them as a superficial diagnosis. Here are the three great social ills which so far they have been helpless before—tuberculosis, alcoholism and prostitution. Their sanatoria, their advice about the drinking water, their temperance unions and vice crusades have left all three more flourishing than ever. They must have mistaken the cause. What is the real root difficulty? The cause is mainly one—poverty. But can the doctors cure poverty?

What is the scientific remedy? Eminent speakers made suggestions. Our commissioner of public health, an intelligent man with a hobby, said that before this present merciful form of civilization the unfit were got rid of by a natural law of selection, but now that we had interfered with that law, the only thing left was to make the unfit as fit as possible—by which he meant a wholesale application of the new science of eugenics, to prevent feeble and unhealthy people from having children. Eugenics seems not to have appealed to Dr. Howard A. Kelly. There was but one cure, only one cure, contended the valiant vice crusader—a general application of the principles of religion. A distinguished Jew present agreed with him, if he meant by religion to love one's neighbor as one's self. A professor of economics rose to set them straight.

Dr. Hollander, no medicine man, but a Johns Hopkins professor, a member of reform committees, a very active and practical economist, got up and told them that if the medical profession was as interested in economics as it professed itself, it would never have allowed the Greif strike; it would not have allowed the stevedore strike; it would have done a good deal to have prevented the importation of 600 girls into Boston to break the Telephone strike. In those three instances, he said, enough harm had been done to cancel years of medical progress. Tuberculosis, alcoholism and prostitution grew and spread out of them. The poor food and poor clothes of strike times, the idleness and discontent, caused both consumption and the drink habit; while leaving 600 young girls, whether strikers or strikebreakers, without jobs when the strike was over, would utterly undo all the work of the earnest and energetic Boston vice commission. So Dr. Hollander suggests that compulsory strike arbitration have the backing of the medical profession.

The doctors disagree. Here are three remedies, but will they cure poverty? Eugenics, religion and compulsory strike arbitration.

The science of human breeding is an Utopian science, Utopian in a sense Socialism never was.

The principles of religion are spiritual principles and (though a stimulus to the individual) no more applicable to an economic problem like poverty than to a problem in mechanics.

And compulsory strike arbitration would be an obstacle in the way of the workingman's advance, for which all the good health in the world would scarcely compensate him.

All this makes a Socialist rather impatient. Still it is no bad sign when the doctors meet together to discuss economics.—Public Ownership.

THE PLACE FOR THE YOUTH.

Is In the Revolutionary Labor Movement, Whose Task It Is to Solve the Problems of Today.

"Who has the youth has the future" was long ago recognized as being true. To none should this fact appeal with more startling force than to those active in the labor movement. The youth of today are the citizens of tomorrow, and the social conditions of tomorrow will be what the youth of today make them.

The working class propaganda of today—the propaganda of Socialism and industrial unionism—should be directed more particularly to youth rather than to old age. By this we mean no disrespect to those of more mature years. We recognize that in their day and generation they performed meritorious service. We can recognize, too, that even today there are numbers who have progressed with the exigencies of the time and are in the forefront of the movement.

But we recognize, also, that with years, generally speaking, comes conservatism, and it is difficult to convince the grand old pioneer of yesterday that the methods of overnight will not serve this smiling morn.

We can lift our hats in reverence and homage to those sturdy pioneers, but we refuse, whilst paying that just homage, to be dictated to or controlled by the obsolete. We of today have the problems of today and of the future confronting us. Those problems can best be met, not by old-fashioned ideas and methods born of older times, but by methods created by the present.

For that reason our movement, as has been very truly said, is concentrating upon the youth of today. It is the youth of today that will carry still further up the heights the standard so ably borne by the warriors of yesterday, and it is the youth of the future that will take from the hands of the youth of today the emblem of Liberty and plant it firmly on the topmost pinnacle of Progress.

Our hope is with the youth. To them our message should be particularly directed, and it is fitting that throughout the world today the working class movement is being guided more and more by young men. This is a sign of the times, pregnant with hope—it is the evidence of the New Spirit advancing in proportion to the New People claiming allegiance; the New Spirit arresting the attention and demanding the investigation of the young of our ranks.

This is as it should be, and the more the young people investigate the world-wide movement of Labor, the more profound will be their admiration of the pioneers of the past, and the more determined will they be to carry on the work entrusted to them.

The past is gone. The present is here. The future is before us. To realize the potentialities, worshipping ideas that are dead, methods that no longer serve, is foolish. The position created today demands the highest form of organization and intelligence, and this can be found in the intelligent application of the principles of Socialism and Industrial Unionism as the basis of our organization.—Maoriland Worker.

POETICAL

HUSH-A-BYE, BABY.

The Revised Version.

"Husb a-bye, baby, on the tree top,
When you grow up you shall work in a shop;
And when you get married your wife shall work, too,
That the rich may grow richer, with nothing to do.
Hush a-bye, baby, on the tree top,
When unemployed your wages will stop,
And when grown old your wage will stop, too,
That the rich may grow richer with nothing to do.
We hush-a-bye babies, hear what you say,
But hush-a-bye babies, we are not made that way;
We are calling new music for the industrial hop,
And wealth without work must shut up its shop."

THE BARGAIN COUNTER.

By Bertha Braley.

Bargains in dress goods and bargains in lace,
Bargains in garments of beauty and grace,
Here are the offerings piled in a heap—
Bargains on bargains—remarkably cheap!
Wait, let's see whence these bargain goods came,
E're we plunge into the bargaining game!
Look at the exquisite waist—it was made
Down in the slums by a woman ill paid;
Glorious plume for a wonderful hat?
Little child hands gave the beauty to that!
Bargains in goods? Why, they're bargains in pain.
Bargains in bodies and bargains in brain,
Bargains in manhood and womanhood, too,
Bargains in childhood here offered to you;
Bargains in hate and oppression and greed,
Bargains in hearts that must suffer and bleed;
Bargains from sweatshops and pestilent holes,
Bargains in labor and bargains in souls.
Here on the counter together they lie.
Bargain sale! Bargain sale! Come on and buy!

LET WELL ENOUGH ALONE.

Don't disturb the bowlegged bulldog that is gnawing at a bone,
Don't disturb a sleeping tiger for amusement of your own,
Don't disturb a mule to witness how its hind feet may be shown;
They live longest who remember to let well enough alone.

Don't disturb the bird that warbles a gay ditty in the tree,
And the bumblebee goes humming, "Kindly do not bother me;"
When the baby's sweetly sleeping do not bother it to see
What the unproclaimed condition of its appetite may be.

Don't disturb the gun that's rusty, but discreetly shy away;
Though its trigger may be missing, let the poor old weapon stay
Where your great-grandfather put it; they live longest who delay,
When it comes to hunting troubles they may find some future day.

Don't disturb it when you find a peaceful stick of dynamite,
Don't disturb the low-browed bully to see whether he will fight,
Don't disturb the busy burglar whom you hear downstairs at night,
For the world is full of promises, and the future may be bright.

—Chicago Record-Herald.

I PAY MY "RAYSHPECTS" TO MULCAHY.

(W. E. Hanson, Butte, Montana).

I'll indite a little ditty
To an editor of our city,
  Who is gifted with a most loquacious tongue,
All the osophies and ologies
Are only mere apologies,
  Whose praises or demerits by this editor are sung.
Sometimes he is erratic—
Believes ideas democratic,
  And the argument advances that he alone is right;
He again grows pessimistic;
Cusses, damns things Socialistic;
  "Arrah, Mulcahy, yer the divil whin Socialists ye foight."

He is versed in Greek and Latin,
Quotes from Emmett, Tone and Grattan;
  He fights the wars of Erin o'er and o'er,
And for pastime cuts a caper
With his "independent" paper,
  Which no one reads nor heeds, which makes him sore.
He has made a resolution
To quell the coming revolution,
  For he, like others, sees the writing on the wall.
His editorials idiotic,
Which he calls "patriotic";
  "Arrah, Mulcahy, ye arr the divil wid yer gall."

In language rich and voluble
He tries to tell the gullible
  That he is the reformer that can this crisis meet;
So he prints a mass of stuff
That is obscene, rotten guff
  In his "patriotic," "independent" sheet.
So this modern Alexander
Stoops to serve and longs to pander
  To the powers who rule the world—the master class,
But Socialists do not heed him,
Only pity, do not hear him
  "Arrah, Mulcahy, yer the limit, av yersel' ye've made an ass."

On one point I'm a-bearin',
Every honest son of Erin
  Honors womankind wherever they are found;
We their honor ne'er assail,
Wherever else we fail;
  "In the editor's mind the idea don't abound."

THE REASON.

(W. E. Hanson, Butte, Montana).

Why do I dwell on the lives of the poor,
  And why do I mention their wrongs,
And why do I touch the minor chord
  That throbs in their plaintive songs?
I know what it is to eat the crust,
  And to sit at the board with Want,
And feel the heated and hated breath
  Of Poverty, grim and gaunt.

I know what the pangs of hunger are;
  I have felt the winter's chill;
I have had the mad desire to steal,
  And the keener one to kill.
When I saw there was enough and to spare,
  While I suffered with hunger and cold,
Then the longing desire to work and live,
  And the story again is told.

I have seen my gray-haired mother sit
  With lips that were pinched and dry,
With tear-spent eyes dim and glassy,
  And praying that she might die.
She had faith in a God in a Heaven,
  Reckoned not of a man of earth;
She believed in God's love and mercy
  Of which there is ever a dearth.

I have felt the lash of a master;
  Have been given the pitiful dole,
While he lived in peace and plenty
  On my substance which he stole.
I have clothed my shivering body
  With covering ragged and thin,
And toiled from dawn to nightfall,
  This pitiful dole to win.

The woes of the poor are many—
  Have become a part of my life,
And 'tis only those who have suffered,
  Who can tell of this harrowing strife,
All our sorrows we share in common;
  Our joys? Great God! they are few!
The past, it is dead, but the future—
  Thank God, we know what to do.

Note.—I have been asked repeatedly why I do not write cheerful things; why I pictured the wrongs, the troubles and sorrows of the poor; the reason is given above, faulty and without literary merit as they are, if only one in twenty who reads them sees and thinks, then acts, I am well repaid.—W. STAY AWAY FROM BINGHAM, Utah. No worker but a traitor will take the place of a striker!

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

Stay away from Britannia mines, Howe Sound, B. C. The strike is still on.

THE BELGIAN STRIKE has cost $20,000,000. The strikers won a victory that cannot be computed in dollars and cents.

THE EMPLOYER who pays his female slave in his department store $5 per week for her labor, does not demand that his daughter shall limit her expenditures to $5 per week. In the language of "Gripe Nuts," "There's a Reason."

DURING the past several weeks laboring men have been going to Juneau, Alaska, in the hope that they would be able to secure employment. Hundreds of idle men are already there and the editor of the Miners' Magazine has been requested to urge men out of employment to keep away from that part of Alaska. Labor and Socialist publications will please make note of industrial conditions at Juneau.

JUDGE POLLOCK of the Federal Court has sustained the demurrer in the case of the owners and editors of the Appeal to Reason. The defendants were indicted a year ago by a Federal grand jury for sending obscene matter through the mails, but as Pollock was forced through the showing of the defendants to dismiss the charges, capitalism has been delivered another jolt in its efforts to strangle a journal that dares to tell the truth.

SHOULD THE GROWTH of organized labor become rapid in the near future and the membership of the labor movement become class conscious and unite politically, there is reason to believe that Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison will be acquitted.

Courts are made up of men, and men clothed with the judicial ermine are not sightless or deaf, but know when labor is able to resent injustice.

WILLIAM WOOD of the Woolen Trust, who was charged with Planting dynamite during the strike at Lawrence, Massachusetts, and who gave bond in the sum of $5,000 has not been brought before the courts as yet to answer for the crime alleged against him.

Had he been a striker, he would have been tried long ago, but as Wood is a multi-millionaire there is no haste on the part of our upholders of the majesty of the law to disturb the "pillar of society," who became an outlaw in defense of his economic interests.

"Equal before the law" is receiving some severe jolts in these days, when might makes right.

EUGENE V. DEBS sent the following telegram to Senator John W. Kern:

"Senator John W. Kern, Washington, D. C.:

"The whole working class will back you in calling Hatfield's bluff. Hatfield is himself one of the mine owning lawbreakers who have nullified the constitution, established bull-pen rule, and inaugurated anarchy and a reign of terror to Mexicanize West Virginia. A congressional investigation would arouse the nation and put an end to their criminal misrule. Give us the chance and we will prove that peonage exists and that newspaper correspondents and labor organizers without number have been assaulted and driven out of West Virginia. Turn on the light.

(Signed) EUGENE V. DEBS."

ORGANIZED CHARITY in California is on the war path against the movement to grant a pension to mothers. The professional distributors of charity funds, have declared that a Monther's Pension would mean the parting of the ways, or in plain language, "a plunge into socialism."

Socialism is something horrible, when it contemplates a pension fund to lessen the burdens of impoverished mothers, whose strength and health have been wrecked in the struggle to live.

All the alms for the poor and unfortunate, should go into the hands of the promoters of charity, who see to it that the greater portion of charity funds are paid out in salaries to those who are so fortunate as to be identified with organized charity.

Statistics in California show, that it requires 65 cents in salary to distribute 35 cents in charity.

In other words, two thirds of the charity fund is used up by the professionals in distributing the other third to the hungry and distressed.

It is no wonder that organized charity is up in arms against any movement that would wipe out the jobs held by hypocrites and parasites.

THE FOLLOWING DISPATCH from Washington, D. C., last week, shows that the contempt charges against Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison are still before the courts and it is probable that a large percentage of the present generation will have passed away, ere our highest judicial tribunal will deliver its ultimatum, should the cases be reviewed on an appeal.

"Washington, May 5.—Contempt of court judgments against Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell and Frank Morrison, the labor leaders, for their violation of a courts injunction in the noted Bucks Stove and Range case were affirmed today by the district court of appeals, but the jail sentences imposed were held to have been too severe. The court reduced Gompers' sentence from one year to thirty days and declared that Mitchell and Morrison merely should be fined $500 each.

"The Supreme Court of the United States undoubtedly will be asked to again review the decision.

"Unlike previous decisions in this case, which have been unanimously against the labor leaders, the court of appeals was divided. Chief Justice Sheppard dissented, held that contempt of a federal court was a criminal offense and that the statute of limitations had run in the case."

WITHOUT A CARE and assured of three hearty meals a day and a suite of six carpeted, communicating cells in the Los Angeles prison, life has become a succession of comfortable rest days to Ortie McManigal, confessed dynamiter, who was to have been the state's star witness in the trial of the McNamara brothers. Meanwhile the McNamaras are laboring eight hours a day in prison stripes at San Quentin penitentiary. While the McNamaras are ceaselessly laboring in the dusty prison jute mill, McManigal spends his few waking hours fashioning flimsy paper doilies, which he slits into fantastic designs with his well kept hands. McManigal has been Los Angeles county's star boarder for two years. From a drawn faced man of 150 pounds he has developed into the aldermanic size of 230 pounds. His pale, round face is complacent and satisfied. Occasionally McManigal is given a day's outing. Recently he was absent from jail all day. The records indicate that he had been taken to the District Attorney's office —but at night he returned with three tiny mackerel and a smelt. He had been fishing. McManigal will be released soon. This was made certain by a statement issued by Deputy District Attorney Ford. "McManigal undoubtedly is entitled to liberty by the government, and it will be given him in a short time," he said.—Cleveland Citizen.

THE BELGIAN WORKINGMEN have won a peaceful victory. It augurs the downfall of European royalty, following universal suffrage in the old world.

All the republics of the world are founded on the blood of martyrs for liberty, including the two most recent ones, Portugal and China, but it is predicted that the prospective republic of Belgium will be organized without slaughter.

King Albert of Belgium saved his throne for the present when, on Tuesday, he conferred with his premier and agreed to yield to the demands of his people for single votes for all men.

Heretofore, the rich and privileged classes overwhelmed that country at the polls by plural voting In other words, money and aristocracy ruled.

Now the people will rule and they are resolved to overthrow royalty. Thus the seed sowed in America gradually is bearing the fruit among the nations and the initiative taken by the Belgians may soon be followed in Russia and in all lands where the common people are oppressed and robbed of their lawful rights.

The leaders of the Belgian revolt deserve the congratulations of peace and freedom-loving Americans for the wisdom and diplomacy displayed in their wonderful compaign against plural voting.—Amalgamated Journal.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR DAY was duly observed by the miners of Hancock, Michigan. It was estimated that more than 3,000 marched in the parade. A local paper had the following report of the May Day celebration:

"A long parade was one of the main features of the observance of International day in Hancock Sunday by the local branch of the Western Federation of Miners, assisted by members of other copper country branches of the organization. The parade formed in East Houghton, marched to this city, going to West Hancock and retracing its steps to Kansankoti hall, where addresses were head in English, Finnish, Italian, Croatian and Austrian.

"Heading the parade on mount was William Toppari of Hancock and Miss Willmes of Superior mine. Banners were carried by some of the marchers, giving voice to the feeling of the union. The banners were emblematic of a desire for an eight-hour day law and an attack on the one-man drill now used in most of the mines. The Kaiku band furnished music.

"The auditorium of Kansankoti hall on Sunday afternoon was too small to seat the assemblage and the crowds extended out onto the sidewalks and streets. Political and economic legislation was discussed by the speakers, Vice President Mahoney of the Western Federation of Miners scoring the Michigan Legislature for not passing the eight-hour bill introduced in the last session."

A NASTY SCANDAL has developed in Pittsburg that is creating much talk among the workers. A writer in Justice presents a facsimile copy of a subscription list showing that well-known enemies of organized labor were solicited and contributed money to the Union Labor Temple Co. H. C. Frick is down for $2,000, George T. Oliver, $1,500; Wm. Flinn, $1,000, Kaufman brothers $1,000, and others for similar or lesser amounts. It is further charged that $22,410 was raised by the begging process, of which amount $12,000 was pocketed by the solicitors. Some of the latter are said to be in jail, where the rest properly belong.—Cleveland Citizen.

The above editorial paragraph in the Cleveland Citizen, proves conclusively that men crawl into the labor movement and become prominent for the sole purpose of prosituting organized labor to serve their personal interests.

Men who use the labor movement for personal aggrandizement, as a general rule, are far above the average man in point of intelligence, and after having won the confidence of their fellowmen, use the cause of labor as a personal asset. All the weak spots in the armor of orgnized labor can be traced to the "higher ups" who frequently barter principles for dollars.

These types of men are found in all movements, for even in the temples of God, the pulpits are prostituted by hypocrites who become strangers to manhood and honor in the presence of Mammon.

Every labor official who accepts a dirty dollar, should not only be behind the walls of a prison, but his very memory should be loathed by every honest man and woman whose heart beats for the economic freedom of the race.

THE FOLLOWING in the local columns of a daily journal of Denver shows that the officials of charity organizations are following in the footsteps of those financial potentates, who have learned that in combination, waste is eliminated.

"A movement to incorporate every charity association in the city into one association to be called the Denver Federation for Charity and Philanthropy, has almost been completed, according to W. E. Collett, executive secretary for the United charities of Denver.

"At a meeting yesterday afternoon in the Club building, the representatives of the various organizations that compose the United Charities, voted unanimously upon the project, and the charities endorsement committee of the Chamber of Commerce state that the other independent charities look favorably upon the co-operation.

"The completed association will be modeled after the plan perfected by the Cleveland, Ohio, philanthropies, installed after twelve years of opposition.

"Each charity organization will have one representative on the board of trustees, having an equal voice in the distribution of any general fund, or in the business of the federation at large, the board being the governing power. The incorporation will systematize the work of the different societies through co-operation. The features presented to the philanthropists are that it will relieve the business man of the care of investigating a charity whose worth is unknown to him, and that it will save money that would be spent on worthless charities."

The majority of people who have failed to probe the system that gives birth to the trusts, are loud in their denunciation of combinations that bring about the concentration of wealth. But the trust is but the natural product of the system, and regardless of all the condemnation that may be hurled against centralization, combines are becoming more gigantic in their proportion.

Industry, commerce and finance are being monopolized, and it is but natural under our present system, that charity should likewise resolve itself into a trust.

WEST VIRGINIA, the Siberia of the United States, is to be investigated by Congress. Senator Kerns of Indiana has announced his intention of forcing the Federal Government to probe the infamies that were perpetrated under the forms of law and order. Martial law is to be investigated and peonage will be looked into, and the responsibility of lawlessness placed where it belongs, if the senator from Indiana can secure a favorable hearing.

Senator Kerns, after receving a plea from Ex-Senator Watson of West Virginia begging that the investigation be dropped, concluded that it was about time for an investigation, when it became known that Watson who pleaded against investigation was one of the largest coal operators in the state.

Senator Kerns in his speech, said:

Peonage is the question.

"Reports of the hunting of men across the hills as though they were escaped convicts, or wild beasts is the question and we are going to have an inquiry. Charges of violation of contract labor laws and use of martial law are among the things we will probe.

"I propose to have it shown that when federal experts investigated the conditions last year, whole pages of the report were suppressed by the department of commerce and labor.

"Do you realize that down there, within 250 miles of the national capitol, a drumhead courtmartial has for the past 30 days been trying "Mother" Jones, a woman 80 years of age, who for 40 years has been engaged in humanitarian work and is one of the very greatest women in this country. She is said to know more people than any other American woman.

"There are a few things that a congressional investigation of West Virginia peonage should consider."

It is no wonder that a coal baron should raise his voice against a congressional investigation This coal-baron as well as the other arrogant and lawless exploiters in the coal fields of West Virginia, know that terrorism, peonage and the suspension of civil rights have prevailed in West Virginia and that the strikers have been subjected to outrages, that make Russia look like a paradise, "Mother" Jones, against whom the venom of the coal barons has been hurled, may yet see the tyrants of West Virginia begging for mercy, for if signs do not fail, the time is close at hand, when even the economic master will tremble before the rising indignation of men and women who love liberty and loathe tyranny.

Some Day

"MOTHER" JONES in writing to the New York Call on date of April 29th from the Military Bastile at Pratt, W. Va., says:

"I wish you could have been here when they took Brown and Boswell away to Clarksburg. I stood from out my prison walls looking at these milltary bloodhounds when they took my brothers away. At the depot stood the wives and children of these men. They screamed and wailed. They begged the right to see them and the cold blooded governor turned them down.

"Oh God! What a scene! If you could but have heard the wails of the babes; if you could have heard the groans of the mothers! It seems to me it could have made the stones rise and speak. I could not sleep that night.

"I am the lone prisoner in the military bastile. Imagine your being torn from your loved ones tonight and they had no knowledge of what was to be done with you. What a terrible feeling it would be?

The Fight Will Go On.

"I do not care for myself. I care only for my dear comrades. This brave fight will go on and on until freedom's banner floats from shore to shore. I do not know what the pirates are going to do with me and, to tell you the truth, I do not care much. I am only interested in the outcome of this brave battle and my brave comrades who are incarcerated with me.

"If intelligent men knew this thing as it really is I believe there would be an uprising.

"Just think for an instant of the drumhead court trying out eleven weeks ago and none of us yet have got our summons. I do not know what they are holding me here for. They would let me go if I would go to Ohio, or if I would quit speaking in this state.

"I simply replied, 'You bring your guns and put me up against that tree outside of this bastile and riddle me with bullets, but I will never surrender my rights to remain in this state as long as it suits my bnsiness to do so. Nor will I surrender my right of free speech nor the right to a trial by jury to any living individual. I don't care whether he is governor, judge or president. I shall rebel to the last against his action.

" 'My head may be white and my eyes growing dim with years, my step may be slowing up, but my heart beats true to a mighty cause, to the cause of freedom and justice.'

"I know that they have it in for me because I rose in the court and protested against them assuming the right to try me. I did not belong to the military because I was arrested where the civil courts were in session. I was kidnapped into the military martial law zone and there held and tried since, but I will defy them to the very end.

"The American republic has long since died out. We have an oligarchy now of big interests." '

The above letter from an aged woman who has reached the fourscore mile-post in life, can scarcely be interpreted as a tribute to the government that prevails in "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

When a woman in the sunset of life is denied every boasted right that is said to be guaranteed by law, it is idle to prate about our Declaration of Independence and it becomes a grim joke to speak of our glorious consititution.

The dictum of a governor dominated by privilege, is more potent than all the lauded principles of democracy, and the starry flag that we hail as the banner of liberty has become but an ensign under whose folds the despot can outrage his victim.

Corporate lawlessness has made a corpse of freedom in west Virginia.

The slave in rags and pinched by poverty, is but a peon in a domain that is absolutely under the control of coal barons, whose economic power towers above laws and constitutions.

Anarchy in broadcloth is law in West Virginia, and the man or woman who speaks for humanity and justice, is guilty of treason and branded as a rebel. Some day the rebels will rise in their united strength and end the brutal system that puts a woman 80 years of age in the custody of cossacks.

The Alien Land Law in California

FOR THE PAST SEVERAL WEEKS there has been war and rumors of war, and the press of the country has kept the people in a nervous condition as to what might result from the passage of the alien land law in California.

President Wilson became alarmed and after burning the telegraph wires between Washington and Sacramento in vain attempts to halt the California legislature, dispatched the "Peerless Billy" to the Golden state to plead with the lawmakers to hesitate, ere enacting into law a measure that might involve our patriots in a carnival of slaughter.

California has discriminated against the Japanese. Her law makers do not want the Brown Man to own or lease land in California. The Brown Man has shown that he is a brilliant success as a fruit raiser and farmer, and the white man or native son has discovered that he cannot compete with him, and for that reason, he must not be permitted to get a foothold on the Pacific Coast. The matter of profit. and profit alone lies at the bottom of the enactment of the alien land law. Had the Japs engaged in some pursuit or occupation that did not jeopardize the commercial or agricultural interests of "our best citizens" of California, they would be welcome to remain within the borders of California, but when a Jap threatens the supremacy of the American exploiter, he must be crushed by law.

As long as the Jap only bid for the job of the American wage slave, he was welcome to Western America, but when he dared to invade territory that was sacred to our generous and benevolent American labor-skinners he must be exterminated even though the nation is to be precipitated into a war where labor that has been skinned by capitalism, will do all the fighting.

The Cat Out of the Bag

THE EDITOR of the Miners' Magazine has frequently felt it incumbent upon him to refer to the I. W. W. and in doing so, the editor has used language that could not be considered as complimentary to the leaders who have brought the labor movement into disrepute through the tactics and methods utilized in securing funds to carry on the infamous work of disruption and to keep the larders filled for an aggregation of professional bums, to whom dollars are more valuable than personal honor. The editor stands for the principles of industrial unionism, but there is as much difference between industrial unionism and I. W. W.ism, as there is between a true Christian and a church member wearing the mask of religion to conceal his hypocrisy.

Our pity goes out to the poor dupes who are victimized by the howling soap-boxers, whose bombastic utterances and inflated denunciations of capitalism, have deluded men and women who have not taken the time to analyze the fallacies of superficial propagandists.

Noise on a soap-box is not logic.

Oratory made up of words and bereft of reason, does not appeal to men and women who read and think.

The mobs that gathered at Spokane and San Diego, under the pretext that free speech was being throttled by privilege, did not advance the cause of the working class.

But the editor will permit one of the war-horses of the I. W. W. to speak through the columns of the Miners Magazine, in order that the readers of the official organ of the Western Federation of Miners may become more thoroughly acquainted with the disreputable methods of the chronic howlers, who officially control the "Bummery."

William E. Trautmann has been identified with the I. W. W. since its birth. Trautmann was its first secretary and has written many pamphlets upholding the doctrines preached by the travelling Ciceros of the I. W. W. Trautmann, in an article to the New York Call of the issue of May 2nd, under the head, "Free Graft Fights," unbosoms himself as follows:

Editor of The Call:

A few days ago you published an account of the "San Diego Free Speech Fight." by Ralph Korngold, in which there is contained a charge that the full and correct accounting of the handling of the funds may never be given by those in charge of affairs.

We should withhold judgment as to whether the charge is true or not, yet similar occurrences in recent months demand that the contributors to "Free Speech Fights" or "wildcat strikes" engineered for ulterior purposes should insist that they be given an accounting, the same as when Robert Lawrence, of Clinton, Mass., was allowed, in behalf of the socialists, to watch the handling of the funds in the great Lawrence strike, because two-thirds of the contributions were solicited by socialists or through their efforts, and the advertisement given to the strike by real socialist publications. These are facts, indisputable.

Now again there will be an appeal for funds to support the "free speech fight" in Denver, pulled off by those who never will work, who will always be there when the general secretary and the general organizer of the Industrial Workers of the World call for volunteers, to live on the funds collected for the support of real militants and struggling toiler. They never fail to come when the bugle sounds. The rank and file has nothing to say, so has it been decreed by the few who engineer the affairs of the strikers and free speech fights.

As a member of an organizations to whom again an appeal for support of the free speech fight has been sent, the Workmen's Sick and Death Fund, I have to insist that better precaution be taken before support is given to affairs over which the contributors have no control. Bona fide strikes, free speech fights to maintain guaranteed rights will always be supported, no matter whether these strikes, fights and rights are maintained by the socialist party, socialist labor party, anarchists, industrial unionists or others. But it is criminal to exhaust the resources and energies of the proletariat to further designs of elements who in their philosophy and psychology are anti-proletarian, although they have and play with a vocabulary of revolutionary phrases.

I am prompted to write this because it is evident that a clear explanation can never be obtained by an appeal to the centralized official and publicity organs of the Industrial Workers of the World.

One important case in instance: By special request of Ettor and Giovannitti, then awaiting trial in Lawrence, I was made secretary of the Ettor-Giovannitti defense fund, after the termination of the successful strike in Lowell, Mass., because no efforts had been made to arouse general interest in the cases. Immediately after assuming charge I found that thousands of dollars had been misused, for purposes not intended by the contributors and the band of "volunteers" who arrived immediately after the termination of the Lawrence strike were paid out of that fund. For lack of funds a motion to postpone the trial of Ettor and Giovannitti had to be made by the lawyers of the defense, as only about $85 was on hand, and only by a special appeal to an ex-governor of Massachusetts and to the governor personally, was such postponement granted.

This can be verified by Attorney Mahoney and Judge Hilton, at present attorney for the Western Federation of Miners.

Finding such appalling conditions, it was necessary to enlist support from prominent socialists, and the personal telegrams to Eugene Debs, Charles Edward Russell and others, as well as the personal appeal by the undersigned to Julius Gerber, the secretary of the socialist party, and the editor of The New York Call, as both can testify, brought about an organized effort to save the lives of the accused comrades. The Italian Socialist Federation was made the central agency, by a certified publication of the fact in all Italian daily newspapers, of the funds collected among the Italian workers, and its organ, Il Proletario, was to give a full account of all transactions in money affairs, as letters which were then kept on file certify. But all these parties, and all these socialists mentioned, gave their moral and active support on the condition only that the Lawrence Defense Committee would have supervision of the funds.

Such a committee was immediately formed after the return of the undersigned from New York, after the objects outlined above had been consummated. And said committee was to stop the outrageous misuse of the Ettor-Giovannitti Defense Fund. But by telegraphic order from the general office of the Industrial Workers of the World, the investigation on the nine charges made against those who previously handled the funds was stopped, and an order was handed in to prevent the supervision of the finances by a committee of workers. An emissary from the general office of the Industrial Workers of the World, Fred Heslewood, was dispatched to Lawrence, and it was left to him and his discretionary powers how the funds were to be disposed of.

To the demands submitted to the last convention of the National Union of Textile Workers of the I. W. W. by the undersigned to give the socialists who contributed four-fifths of all funds an answer as to whether the books were tampered with, in fact, the original cash book was destroyed to cover up the evident and proven misuse of funds, no answer has been received. Nor have the two official papers of the Industrial Workers of the World been allowed to publish the letter of the undersigned in which the nonacceptance of an official position was declined, one of the reasons being the outrageous handling of the funds of the Ettor-Giovannitti Defense Fund by the self-elected individuals who took the control of the funds and the right to investigate from the committee elected by the workers.

The only recourse therefore, to prevent repetitions, and appeals to the credulous for the support of affairs over which they never are allowed to have control, is to publish this warning against falling prey to the schemes of individuals, or those who use the socialists only to feed the papers to attack them, as the issues of the Industrial Worker of Spokane, clearly show.

This write-up should, though, not be construed as casting a reflection on the Industrial Workers of the World membership or on those supporting the organization, as they, by the denial of democratic administration throughout the whole organization, are not aware of the state of affairs. The editorial in The New York Call some time ago, in which the general office of the Industrial Workers of the World called for volunteers all over the country to fill the jails in Little Falls, will never be replied to unless additional facts are brought out to prompt all the adherents of revolutionary industrial unionism to force their mandates upon the supposed-to-be servants of the movement.

All labor papers and socialist publications will only do the movement a service if they insist on full publicity of all such affairs.

WILLIAM E. TRAUTMANN.
Member I. W. W.

Pittsburg, Pa.

The above article from the pen of William E. Trautmann to the New York Call, needs no elaborate comment from the editor of the Miners' Magazine. The statements made by Trautmann, if based upon fact, and there is every reason to believe that Trautmann is telling the truth, should forever ostracize the shameless grafters and fakers, who cold-bloodedly and deliberately launch strikes and free speech fights, with no object in view save to gather funds to promote the interests of that inner circle, whose dictums seem to be the laws that govern the I. W. W.

There is no democracy in the Bummery.

It is a government from the top, down, and the common herd must revere and observe the mandates of the coterie of bosses, who make strikes and free speech fights, the avenues through which flow the revenues that make life pleasant for the professional bums in office.

The editor of the Miners Magazine has declared in a previous editorial, that the I. W. W. kept no books, and the Trautmann article in the New York Call, verifies our declaration. Those who have been in sympathy with the I. W. W. should give the Trautmann article due consideration, and if they have been contributors to the Bummery, should demand an accounting.

The spokesmen of the I. W. W. have been indulging in filth and abuse of everyone outside the realms of their so-called labor organization, and it is about time that the professional calumniators and scurrilous maligners, should be brought under the arc-light for inspection.

No Protection for Labor

ACCORDING TO A PRESS DISPATCH in the Butte Miner of May 1, Senator Thompson, "who has made a thorough study of the bill" briefly gives the theory of the Webb alien land act as follows:

"Only citizens and those eligible to become citizens may be proprietors of land. They may employ Japanese and Chinese if they desire, but they cannot lease or otherwise give such aliens an interest or share in their proprietorship."

You notice that "those eligible to become citizens" may be or become proprietors of land. The Englishman, the German or the Frenchman may still live in his native land and retain his proprietorship in millions of acres of the fertile soil of California and employ Chinese and Japanese workers to compete with the American working class.

Well, the working class of California elected Attorney-General Webb; they are getting what they voted for; they ought to be satisfied.—Montana Socialist.

The workingmen of California as well as the workingmen of every other state of our union, are without protection. The workingman, as a general rule, permits his vanity to be tickled by the fulsome adulation of the chronic spell-binder, who in every election campaign, elaborates on the dignity of labor," "the horny-fisted son of toil" and the callous hand that makes it possible for the earth to fill the warehouses with the necessaries of life.

The average workingman feels his bosom expand and his head swell, as the wind-artist paints the prowess of labor in all the gaudy tinselry of rhetories most beautiful flowers. As he listens to the paid hireling of capitalism, he forgets that he is a slave and again marches to the polls to register his vote to maintain a system that keeps the exploiter in a mansion and the exploited in a hovel. He forgets the wrongs and outrages that have been inflicted on him for 364 days in the year, and on the only day that he can redress the wrongs from which he suffers, he generally casts a ballot that gives joy to a boss and poverty to himself. Ignorance is the great enemy of the working class, for if labor had wielded an intelligent ballot, there would be no "Mother" Jones in a military bastile in West Virginia, nor would there be thugs and cossacks armed with weapons of murder, to execute the orders of plutocracy.

Legislation in Arizona

THE EDITOR of The Miners Magazine has frequently called the attention of the members of the Western Federation of Miners to the progressive work of organized labor in the state of Arizona. The constitution of Arizona is considered one of the most democratic documents of any state of the union, and the most advanced and aggressive features of the organic law of Arizona are due to the tireless and energetic work of the representatives of the labor movement. The legislature of Arizona has passed a bill governing cases of contempt of court, and the ordinary citizen, who may wound the dignity of a judge, has the legal right to demand a trial by jury, except where the offense is committed in the presence of the court. The law as passed by the lawmakers of Arizona, is as follows, and is worthy of the careful perusal of the members of organized labor.

AN ACT.

To prescribe the punishment for contempt of court and to regulate the practice and procedure in such cases.

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona:

"Sec. 1. Any person who shall wilfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any Superior Court of this State by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of this State, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 2. Whenever it shall be made to appear to any Superior Court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any county attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue an order requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which order, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court; Provided, however, that if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the order to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this Act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected, as provided by law, to attend at the same time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and empaneled as upon the trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prescribed by indictment or upon information.

"If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the County Treasurer or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them, as the court may direct; but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the County Treasurer exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of one thousand dollars, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

"Sec. 3. The evidence taken upon the third trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, statement of facts, or reporter's transcript, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon appeal in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified, as justice may require. Upon the taking such appeal, execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any judge of any Superior Court in this State.

"Sec. 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the State of Arizona, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within Section 1 of this Act may be punished in conformity to the usages now prevailing.

"Sec. 5. No proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this Act.

"Sec. 6. All Acts and parts of Acts in conflict with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed."

One of the most important measures that came before the Legislature of Arizona was Senate Bill No. 19 and is known as the three cent fare bill.

This bill met the opposition of the railroads, regardless of the fact, that a bill similar in character was referred to the people in November 1912 and was carried by a vote of 14,823 to 4,835, receiving a majority of 9,988.

The railroads, as usual, invaded the Federal Court and asked that the law ratified by the people, be declared unconstitutional on the grounds that such legislation was confiscatory. The action of the railroads appealing to the Federal Court, resulted in the bill being introduced in the Legislature and carried by the following vote:

Ayes: Babbitt, Ball, Barker, Bradner, Brooks, Cocke, Craig, Crofoot, Curry, Duncan, Ellis, Graham, Hall, Irvine, Jacobs, Jacobson, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Lewis, Murphy, Whipple, Wren, and Mr. Speaker—24.

Nays: Buchanan, Drennan, Gonzales, Kelton, Lynch, Mattox, Moore of Yavapai, and Moore of Pima—8

Absent: Kane—1.

Excused: Maddock, and Saxon—2.

Upon request of the Legislature the Attorney General handed down the following opinion on the three cent ear fare bill:

Phoenix, Arizona, April 24th, 1913.

To the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Arizona:

Gentlemen:—

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your request for an opinion relative to Senate Bill No. 19. Your request is contained in two resolutions which are, virtually, as follows::

1. Do the provisions of said Senate Bill No. 19 come within the contemplation of an emergency as declared by paragraph 3 of Section One of Article IV of the Constitution?

2. Does a bill carrying an emergency clause become a law when passed by either House with less than a two-thirds vote?

Before passing on these questions I desire to explain to your Honorable Body the purpose of the introduction of said bill at the request of the Corporation Commission and the Attorney General. At the first special session of the Legislature there was passed what is commonly known as The Three Cent Fare law, which law was a copy of the similar provisions of the Oklahoma Constitution. The railroads of this state caused said Three Cent Fare Law to be referred to the people at the election held on the first Monday in November, 1912, at which election the law was ratified and adopted by a vote of 14,823 to 4,835. The people, therefore, at the polls, declared in overwhelming numbers in favor of the bill. The railroads then took the law into the Federal Court. Among other points raised their were two of a serious nature. One was a decision rendered by Judge Sanborn of the Federal Court of Appeals that the Oklahoma law was unconstitutional because it did not provide for the suspension of the law pending an investigation as to the reasonableness of the rate before the Corporation Commission. The other point raised was that the law did not give the carrier time to file their change of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission. In order to avoid any question on these two points in the future, Senate Bill No. 19 was drawn and introduced and is now before your body, it being the same bill as adopted by the people amended to meet the technicalities heretofore referred to.

As before remarked, the people having declared they wanted a Three Cent Fare by ratifying and adopting the Three Cent Fare bill at the polls, I deemed it my duty as their attorney to obtain it as quickly as possible and to attempt, with the aid of the Legislature, to brush aside the technicalities which were obstructing the people's expressed will.

Having expressed my interest in the bill resulting from my relationship of an attorney and client, in this instance the state being my client, I shall now answer the queries propounded in your resolutions.

1. "Do the provisions of said Senate Bill No. 19 come within the contemplation of an emergency as declared by paragraph 3 of Section 1 of Article IV of the Constitution?"

I wrote your Honorable Body at the time you requested an opinion on the same question relating to chapter 2 of the Laws of the Regular Session of the Legislature of 1912, which chapter relates to the prohibition of the sale of spirituous liquors near public works, etc., that the question as to whether or not an emergency exists is a question of fact and not of law and the only body which can determine that question is the Legislature itself.

See Cadderly vs City of Portland, 74 Pac. 720.
Brown vs. State, 106 Pac. 795.
Oklahoma City vs. Shields, 100 Pac 559.
State vs. Bacon, 85 N. W. 605.

Such being the case, neither the courts nor this department can pass upon the question. The Constitution has placed that power in the hands of the Legislature. I can, properly, however, call your attention to the fact that the people have already expressed themselves favorably in regard to the principle of the bill and that the only change made in the new bill is to sweep aside the technicalities in an endeavor to give the people of the state, quickly and effectively, the thing they have demanded. I can further say, I think, with strict propriety, that in my personal opinion and unofficially, Senate Bill No. 19 is, technically and morally, as clearly an emergency measure as said chapter 2 of the laws of the Regular Session of 1912, passed over the Governor's veto or as one of the following bills passed by the First State Legislature with the emergency clause attached thereto.

Chapters 12, 22, 48, 65, 69, 74, 77, 90 and 93 of the First Session of the Legislature, and chapters 20, 44, 51, 59, 65 and 78 of the laws of the Special Session of the Legislature of 1912.

In view of the fact that I have said that in determining an emergency measure the Legislature is the sole judge as to the propriety or the legality thereof, it being purely and simply a question of fact, and for that reason, therefore, if I were a member of the Legislature, knowing the history of its legislation I would, unhesitatingly, vote for Senate Bill No. 19 with an emergency clause.

Your second interrogatory is as follows:

"Does a bill carrying an emergency clause become a law when passed by either House with less than a two-thirds vote?"

This question is a very close one and will depend largely upon the ultimate construction placed upon the clause of the Constitution relating thereto by the Supreme Court of the State. I can only give you the opinion of this department unsupported by any authority. I say unsupported by any authority for the reason that I can find no other State Constitution containing a provision similar to ours.

This provision of our Constitution provides that "no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the Legislature unless it shall state in a separate section why it is necessary that it shall become immediately operative and shall be approved by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the Legislature," etc.

If the Constitution provided that the measure should not become immediately operative unless it received the votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the Legislature (which is practically the language of the Oklahoma and Oregon Constitutions), the question could be quickly answered by saying that in the event the bill received a majority but less than a two-thirds vote, it would become a law at the expiration of ninety days after the adjournment of the Legislature at which it passed, but the language of our Constitution is peculiar, in this, that it provides that "no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the Legislature unless it receives a two-thirds vote to the members elected to each house."

Until I discovered the difference between the Oklahoma and Oregon Constitutions and our Constitution I was rather inclined to a different opinion than the one now given herein. In the States of Oklahoma and Oregon a bill carrying an emergency which fails of a two-thirds vote but receives a majority vote, becomes operative and effective in ninety days, but, under the wording of our Constitution, the measure (which means the whole bill) cannot be considered passed unless it receives the requisite two-thirds vote of the members elected to each House.

I am, therefore, constrained to believe and advise that if the measure carrying an emergency clause fails to receeive the necessary two-thirds vote in each House, it then does not become a law. A majority, however, can always save the substance of the bill before final vote by amending the same to strike out the emergency clause. If this is done the measure does not then carry an emergency clause and would be passed by a majority vote as any other bill to take effect in ninety days after adjournment.

Yours very respectfully.

G. R. BULLARD, Attorney General.

He Is Now a Syndicalist

GAYLORD WILSHIRE was once known in Ameriea as the 'Millionaire Socialist."

Men and women in the socialist party once looked upon Wilshire as sincere and earnest, and a number of members of the socialist party, with rubber for spinal columns, pandered to the gentleman whose questionable methods furnished him ducats to cut a swath on "Easy street."

Wilshire was proclaimed by a number of socialist publications as a wonderful man and as one of those unflinching champions of human rights, who was making history for the cause of labor.

The publications that paid glowing tributes to Wilshire, made it less diffieult for the trickster to sell his gold bricks.

Wilshire, according to his own statements and advertisements that appeared in his magazine, had a great bonanza in California, and this generous and big-hearted socialist yearned to share his bonanza with the struggling millions of poverty-stricken wretches, whose hovels were menaced by hunger and want.

Wilshire heralded to the world that his mines in California contained mountains of Gold, and that he would generously permit his poorer brothers and sisters to purchase stock in mines, whose product in the near future, would demonetize gold.

Wilshire was so generous, that he even made donations to struggling socialist publications, because he felt that contributions to journals that were dying for lack of nourishment, would have a wholesome effect on editors whose salaries were more priceless than their conscientious scruples.

For a few years the "millionaire socialist" had a mint, and was coining money out of the gullible, who swallowed the bait of the confidence artist who wore the mask of Socialism while skinning his dupes.

The Miners Magazine punctured the get-rich-quick schemes of the "millionaire socialist," and when the gold-demonetizer gazed at the page of the magazine that refleeted on the honesty of the socialist wildcat promoter, there was an earthquake in the headquarters of the Wilshire jobbing department.

The editor of the Miners Magazine was notified that he must retract or face an action for criminal libel, but the editor refused to retract, and then the socialist bluffer sent a whine to all the local unions of the Western Federation of Miners, complaining of the slander, and libel that had been heaped upon him by an editor who did not grasp the magnitude of the wonderful resources of his (Wilshire's) mines in California and his rubber (robber) industry in South America.

The exposure of the magazine stopped the flow of money to the coffers of Wilshire, and this exposure started an investigation that forced the "millionaire socialist" to "pull his freight" across the Atlantic to escape the federal authorities.. Wilshire is now operating a measly rag in London, England.

The 'millionaire socialist" who once challenged Bryan and offered to give him $10,000 to debate socialism with him on a public rostrum, has abandoned socialism, and is now upholding syndicalism as the salvation of the working class.

Syndicalism has about as much merit in giving economic liberty to laboring humanity as Wilshire's mines in California had in yielding fabulous dividends to the Rubes who have mourned their losses.

Wilshire may have another mine or another rubber (robber) plant and by advocating syndicalism he may work off some stock on the syndicalists of Europe.

Survey of the Great Belgian Strike

BY A VOTE of four to one the representatives of the Socialist unions of Belgium ratified the act of their leaders in parliament and the most remarkable strike in history came to an end in the surrender of the Belgian government to the demands of the strikers.

The one-fifth that voted against calling off the strike represents the more radical element. This element favored continuing the strike until the government was forced to immediate surrender.

The conservative element in the trade unions all over the world will laud the action of the four-fifths who voted to give the government time to make the necessary changes that will bring to the Belgian workers the one man one vote system.

The radical element in the trade unions all over the world will laud the action of the one-fifth who voted to continue the strike until the government was forced to immediate surrender.

We believe that history will show that the four-fifths were right and the one-fifth were wrong.

We believe that the four-fifths displayed a higher degree of intelligence and self-discipline than the one-fifth.

We believe they acted in that supremely wise manner that lays the foundation for premanent results.

Just at the moment that they discovered that they possessed a power really greater than the government, they refrained from using it abruptly to overturn a hostile government, but gave that government a chance to make changes and modifications in the direction of justice and democracy.

The main object of the strike had been accomplished: the working class had made a demonstration of power and capacity never before dreamed of in the history of the world. To follow this with a demonstration of self-restraint, patience and self-control unparalleled in the history of the world, constitutes in our estimation the most impressive thing in the history of labor.

Such an example of self-discipline impresses the ruling class far more with a sense of working power than even the solidarity that won the strike.

FOR THE POWER BY WHICH YOU MASTER YOURSELF IS FAR GREATER, FAR MORE IMPRESSIVE, FAR MORE USEFUL TO SOCIETY AND CIVILIZATION THAN THE POWER BY WHICH YOU MASTER YOUR FOES.

Confronted by this double manifestation of power. the ruling class of Belgium understands in no uncertain manner what it will have to face if it fails to redeem its pledges; for in refraining from pushing to the limit its new-found power, the Belgian working class has made its position doubly strong for the future. It will be far easier to launch a general strike in the future; a second call will bring a far larger and more immediate response.

By their act of self-control in the hour of triumph the Belgian workers have laid the true and only foundation of permanent power solidarity—confidence in themselves and the unmeasured respect of their enemies.

If the Radicals Had Won.

Suppose, instead, the radical attitude had prevailed and at the moment when the government had promised to take steps with its slow and cumbersome machinery to reform the suffrage of Belgium, the unions would have thrown into their teeth, "We accept no compromise, we demand immediate surrender. You will have to immediately abandon all your own laws and constitutions and break them yourselves in order to give us what we demand."

In the first place, the example of an entire class by its economic might demanding an immediate abdication of government and law—asking the government to break the existing laws, would in all likelihood have precipitated upon it the opposition of international capitalism.

Such a demand would be considered by the prevailing opinion of the world as an act of irresponsible outlawry. With the cry that order and law was threatened by a mob, the neighboring governments would have easily found excuse to render such aid as was necessary to crush the working class of Belgium.

In the second place, such an attitude would have alienated all that large class of workers who now waver between the old society and the new and it would have cut off the support of that element in Belgium outside the workers who supported the strike.

Thus weakened, had they failed to force their demand, they would have had to face a defeat that would have put the working class movement of Belgium back almost a generation.

A second general strike would not have been possible for many years and this splendid engine of power that has been built up by a generation of labor and sacrifice would have gone temporarily to smash.

Now the engine is intact; it can be used at any time, and it is stronger than ever.

THE WINNING OF THE SOCIAL REVOLUTION BY THE WORKERS DEPENDS UPON THE BUILDING UP OF AN INTELLIGENT AND SELF-DISCIPLED MAJORITY; SUCH A MAJORITY CANNOT BE BUILT UP WITHOUT GAINING THE ALLEGIANCE OF THE LARGE NEUTRAL ELEMENT THAT HAS A SOCIAL RATHER THAN A CLASS INTEREST. THIS ELEMENT IS BOUND TO JOIN THAT CLASS THAT DISPLAYS THE GREATEST SENSE OF SOCIAL JUSTICE AND SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Lessons From the Strike.

The Belgium strike is an historic example of what the working class can do when it is class conscious, well organized and has developed a constructive policy and an element of strong, wise and thoughtful men.

It is an example of that condition to which all labor is growing It is a glimpse of the future of even benighted American Labor, for we are all passing through the stages through which Belgium and German labor has passed.

We are all slowly and painfully rising to that mature development that spells the quiet self-contained power that accomplishes bloodless revolutions and re-makes the world.

By means of their unions, their Socialist party and their great co-operative movement, the Belgian workers have attained something that all the workers will yet attain.

To reach this point of power is to reach a point in the inspiring drama of world transfiguration toward which all the forces of the world have toiled since the beginning of time.

For the power of organized labor, when it is intelligent, constructive and self-controlled is so great that it is the only power on earth capable of achieving world changes without violence.

The strike is the most grossly misnamed thing in the world, for it does not consist in striking or smiting but in the very opposite—in peacefully refusing to be worked.

It is the useful element simply withdrawing from production until the world makes terms with it.

It is the new way of fighting simply by folding the arms and doing nothing.

That the time has come when conflicts can be won simply by folding the arms speaks eloquently of the advance of civilization.

The wonderful thing about the Belgian strike is that it worked true to this program and that a half million workers wrested a political victory from the master class that could not have been so won in any previous period of the world's history without an armed uprising.

An equally wonderful feature of the strike is that violence had been rendered impossible simply because the government's volent arm —the army—had been rendered powerless by the propaganda of Socialism.

No strike has ever happened before has so clearly shown the utter and essential weakness of the owning class and the utter and essential strength of the working class in a struggle where the working class has really reached a condition bordering on matured development.

With the workers in the industries class conscious, and solidly united and the workers in the army and navy equally class conscious, there is no possibility of bloodshed in such a conflict and no possibility of the master class winning. The individual capitalist will surrender any principle to escape immediate loss of his property through the complete suspension of industry.

This is a lesson particularly to those American workers who have been taught by selfish and blind misleaders that Socialism means violence and unrestrained radicalism and the destruction of real trade unionism, for here we have an example of what matured Socialist unionism really means.

It is the only kind of unionism that makes war, violence and bloodshed impossible and makes the bloodless change of the world and the emancipation of labor possible.—The Inter-Mountain Worker.

FOR AN EDUCATIONAL DEPARTMENT.

Sacramento, California.

Dear Brother—Just received a copy of the "Knocker," and must say it fills a long felt want. Is it possible for the literature bureau of the Western Federation of Miners to publish some pamphlets or booklets that would sell for 5 or 10 cents? I could sell all you could print, the proceeds to go to the boys.

The "bunk" that is at present put out is misleading and leaves the worker in a dilemma. It keeps him jumping in and out of various organizations, and finally makes him nurse a grouch—or an imagniary one. We have fifty-seven varieties of revolutionary unionism; seven of revolutionary Socialism; a world of jawsmiths and strong-arm men; but no one in the educational department—something that has long been needed and will support itself and head off the vast army of fellows, labor-bound, who won't work or let any one else if they can help it.

We are facing no end of faction fights and squabbles that could be headed off by a stream of literature that not only would have ready sale but give employment to many women, who today are busy strengthening the capitalist position by their ability and talents.

I have a personal acquaintance with many such girls and women. The stacks of dust-covered literature in all labor temples makes me cry out: "Let's not print literature for firewood; let's sell it!"

THE BRITANNIA STRIKE.

The management of the Britannia Mining and Smelting Company will refuse to negotiate with the Britannia Miners' Union, consequently the members of this local are still on strike.

The property of the Britannia Mining and Smelting Company is located in a place where the company has always had an advantage over the union. To rustle a job at Britannia one had to take the boat at Vancouver and after three or four hours' ride disembark at Britannia Beach and at the office of the company, get a permit or rushliner card, before one could proceed to the mine. The mines are about four miles up the mountain, at the head of a precipitous gulch, the mines being located at the head of the gulch and the offices, mill, etc., at the bottom.

The strike was called on the eighteenth day of February, when the men found that a system of discrimination was to be proscribed against union men.

The company had taken the first aggressive step the previous summer when they refused the secretary of the union the privilege of paying his monthly visit to the mine. To comply with the laws of Canada, an arbitration board was applied for, which, after sitting, turned in a majority report in favor of the men. Steps were taken to thoroughly organize the camp and by February the company, evidently fearing the strength of the union, started discriminating. The secretary, K. McNeil, was fired, and a special meeting was called the same day, where eventually a strike ballot was taken and all the members present voted to strike. At the meeting a committee had been appointed to see the mine superintendent to find if he had any reasons for firing McNeil. None were given, so the strike was called. Shift bosses who quit with the men had been told to fire certain union men, the mine superintendent saying he intended to get rid of the agitators!

Most of the scabs at present working have been hired through the employment sharks in Vancouver, though so far, to judge by the shipments, very little work is going on at the mine. Only one shipment has been made since the strike. Ordinarily one shipment per week was made.

FOR A MINERS' HOME AND HOSPITAL.

Wallace, Idaho, April 14, 1913.

Wallace Miners' Union No. 17, W. F. M., sends greeting to all local unions of the Western Federation of Miners.

Dear Brothers—For several months this union has had under consideration the possibility of establishing a miners' home and hospital for the members in need of medical attention and a home in their declining years.

The Typographical Union has such a home at Colorado Springs, Colorado, and this home has proved a grand success. We believe if all the unions would join hands in this movement and establish a home it would be a big saving to the individual unions and a benefit to all members. We believe by organizing a benevolent association to look after the miners' home and to take care of the sick benefits and funeral benefits all of this could be paid from the funds of one treasury and the local unions would be in better shape for organization funds. This would be working on the same basis as the insurance companies, and the local dues would not be more than at the present time. Each union would pay a per capita tax to the Hospital Association to take care of its sick and injured members and pay funeral benefits. This union has appointed a committee to draft a circular letter to be sent to all local unions of the Western Federation of Miners asking their advice and co-operation in this movement.

We believe this association should be a separate organization and under the control of a board of managers elected by the stock-holding unions, subject to recall by the benefit members of the association.

Our plan is about as follows: Each union elects the delegates to the next convention of the Western Federation of Miners as delegates to the Miners' Home convention. This convention to appoint a committee to organize a stock company and devise ways and means to establish a Miners' Home and Hospital. We would like to hear from every union; have their suggestions, and also see discussion through The Miners Magazine.

Respectfully submitted,

J. S. HALL,
HERBERT JOHNSON,
SAM KILBURN,
Miners' Home Committee.

URGING THE COMMITTEE TO ACTION.

The Joplin local of the Socialist party of Missouri, believing that the national executive committee of said party has been negligent of its duty in that it has taken no action in behalf of "Mother" Jones, the white-haired "Angel of the Miners," who is now confined in a military "bullpen" in West Virginia, respectfully requests that the following open letter to the national executive committee be given space in your esteemed paper:

To the National Executive Committee of the Socialist Party:

We, the members of Local Joplin of the Socialist party of Missouri, beg leave to call your attention to a fact that you have apparently overlooked, i. e., that "Mother" Jones, the gray-haired apostle of working class emancipation, now lies in a military "bullpen" in West Virginia for no crime other than her loyalty to the working class. And as the Socialist party is supposed to stand for the rights of the workers, not only on the political but the industrial field as well, we are at a loss to understand this silence on the part of our executive committee; why it has apparently abandoned "Mother" Jones to her fate, leaving her at the mercy of the capiatlistic thugs who rule with an iron hand the coal fields of West Virginia. Is it possible that the national executive committee has cold feet and is afraid of the powerful interests that now hold our old "Mother" in the toils? Or is it possible that there is a more sinister motive? Is it possible that in leaving her to her fate they are actuated by a desire to get revenge for the noble womanhood "Mother" Jones displayed in daring to stand for cleanliness in the Socialist party, and in her fight against the moral lepers who now infest the party and who have prostituted themselves and the party for the purpose of advancing their own personal aims and political ambitions? Again we ask, is it possible that in order to satiate their desire for revenge, and also as an object lesson to the rest of the workers, "Mother" Jones is to be sacrificed?

Let us ask you, Mr. National Executive Committee, if one of you were in "Mother" Jones' place what would your actions be? Would you sit supinely by and abandon a member of your committee to his fate? Or again let us ask if J. Mahlon Barnes, the man that you so copiously whitewashed, and in so doing did as we believe all in your power to blacken the character of an aged woman who has dedicated the services of a lifetime to the cause of humanity, had you been placed in her position would your actions have been the same? If not, why this distinction?

This local hereby calls upon the national executive committee to take some action looking to the immediate relief, and to do all in its power to bring about the speedy release of that grand old lady whose life has been one continual round of sacrifices for the toilers.

MAY DAY CELEBRATED IN ARIZONA.

Globe, Ariz., May 5, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

The labor unions of Miami and Globe got together and held a picnic on May first and an account of the same and its object may prove of interest to the membership of the Western Federation of Miners, so here goes:

This picnic was the culmination of the efforts of some of the unions that think that those that labor should have more of the time that should belong to the members of the same and in fact all workers for their own enjoyment and education.

The picnic, held at Fuller's ranch, between Miami and Globe, was a success in every way, and there were between 4,500 and 5,000 people on the grounds. There were no stands or games outside of lunch and ice cream or refreshment stands of this character as it was held that the picnic was not given that some one with commercial instincts should go to it and make money out of his fellow workers and had it been possible for the unions to finance it as it should have been, even the lunch stands who have been refused and a free lunch and refreshments been furnished to all.

There was amusement furnished for all in the shape of ball and cricket games, sea-saws and swings, egg and spoon races and thread-winding contests for the ladies, foot races for the boys and girls, pie-eating contests, etc. For those who wished to improve their time there were speeches by State Senator A. A. Worsley of Tucson, Harry M. McKee, Lyceum speaker of the Socialist party, and Organizer Jacob Judich of the W. F. M.

The talk of Senator Worsley came as a surprise to many of the workers when he advised them to get into the unions and work for industrial unionism, not alone for the power that it would give them on the industrial field, but that then they—the workers—would have a machine that they could use to initiate or refer any law that they wished and in this way bring about the collective ownership of the tools of production and distribution for the benefit of all and not the few.

McKee's talk, mostly on the San Diego free speech fight, was new to many present, and he was thoroughly competent to handle the subject, as he has to return there to serve a three months' sentence for his part in the same, and at that not a member of the I. W. W.

Judich's speech, I for one, could not understand, but from the applause that he received from those who spoke Austrian or the Slavonian tongues, it must have been interesting.

The spirit that was shown at the picnic was what looks the best to those interested in unionism, for in the contests there was that lack of partisanship usually shown, and all seemed to go at it to make fund and not for the glory of either camp or any individual union.

This was especially noticed in the ball and cricket games, where not the different teams were applauded or rooted for on account of their different localities, but good plays were applauded universally.

There was not a fight or an arrest during the day, and behind this lays a story, for not only were the saloons closed during the day, but all business houses, schools and mines of both districts.

May we have many another such, and may the unions of other places get together and take a day off, not alone for their amusement, but because more of their time belongs to them, and by getting together at these times and comparing notes with one another, they come closer to the conviction that their interests are identical, and that an injury to one is an injury to all.

Yours fraternally,
E. B. SIMANTON.

RESOLUTIONS FROM ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

St. Louis, Mo., May 7, 1913.

To Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States:

To the Hon. Governor Hatfield of West Virginia:

To the Honorable Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

Gentlemen:—The Socialist party of St. Louis, Mo., in general meeting assembled, by unanimous vote, ordered the undersigned to forward to you the following resolutions, together with the urgent request for immediate action:

Resolution.

Whereas, Civil law has been suspended in the coal mining regions of West Virginia and military despotism has been substituted to uphold the capitalist corporation anarchy under which the working people are oppressed and persecuted in a manner which seems to be much worse than the tyrannical methods of Russian Czarism in Siberia:

Whereas, Gray-haired "Mother" Jones, the noble soul of womanhood, in spite of her eighty years, together with Charles H. Boswell, Paul J. Paulson, John Brown, Fred Merrick and others, have been unlawfully and inviolation of the state constitution, seized by the military rulers and mercenaries of the mine owners, subjected to insult, indignities and inhuman treatment, tried by court martial and sentenced to imprisonment for no other cause than trying to organize 50,000 poor miners of West Virginia and endeavor to secure for them the same or more tolerable conditions of work than are enjoyed by their colleagues and comrades in the other mining states where the United Mine Workers of America succeeded in their organization.

Whereas, The seizure or military kidnapping and prosecution of "Mother" Jones and others is in violation of the state constituption of West Virginia which says, under Article 3, Section 5, that "No citizen unless engeged in the military service of the State, shall be tried or punished by any military court for any offense that is cognizable by the civil courts of the state"; and the State Costitution further says, in Article 1, Section 3, that "The provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of this state, are operative alike in a period of war as in time of peace, and any departure therefrom or violation thereof, under the plea of necessity or any other plea, is subversive of good government and tends to anarchy and despotism."

Whereas, The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, guaranteed in Article 3, Section 4 of the West Virginia constitution, has also been suspended by the military despots and coal barons in that state;

Whereas, The military kidnaping and incarceration of "Mother" Jones and others in violation of the state and federal constitutions is an outrage on American citizenship and must lead to general corporation anarchy such has has been practiced for months in the coal regions of the great commonwealth of West Virginia; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Socialist Party of St. Louis, in general meeting assembled this fourth day of May, 1913, demands the immediate release of "Mother" Jones and others from the military bastile;

Resolved, That we demand an investigation of the West Vriginia outrages and we heartily approve the action of United States Senator John W. Kern in calling for such an investigation by Congress;

Resolved, That we hereby call upon the national committee of the Socialist party to immediately organize a national campaign of protest against the incarceration of "Mother" Jones and others, with a view of securing the freedom of the brave old woman—the Angel of the Miners—and those imprisoned with her;

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the daily papers of St. Louis, to the Socialist and trade union papers, to the President of the United States and to the members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

By order of the Socialist party of St. Louis, Mo.

W. M. BRANDT,
Secretary.

DARROW'S PLEA.

The following are the stenographic excerpts of the plea to the jury of Clarence S. Darrow, in his second trial at Los Angeles:

I was sorry for the McNamaras; I am sorry for them today. I would give a great portion of my life to have those two boys understood; and I want to say to this jury, even if it costs me my liberty, that the placing of dynamite in the Times alley was not the crime of the century; it was not even a crime, as crimes are understood. I want to make myself plain upon that, if it costs me the vote of every man in this jury box. I was sorry then, and I am sorry today, for those boys. I took my life in my hand to help save their lives, because they were my clients, and I understood them. And I will take my life in my hands again to have them brought back to society, as I think some time they will be.

Now let me tell you—you may take it against me or for me: First, they never morally committed murder. They made a statement which was delivered to the district attorney and is on file in this court, that J. B. McNamara placed sixteen sticks of dynamite in the alley—about four pounds—four or five pounds. It would not have destroyed the building, and it did not. It did not even stop the printing presses; but, unluckily, he placed it beside some barrels of ink, dropped it down and it exploded; and it lighted the ink and the horrible catastrophe followed. Neither one of those boys would have taken human life, and it was an accident; but under the laws of man, which takes little account of motives, they were guilty of murder. Under the laws of God, which considers motive everything, they were not guilty of murder. But I want to go further than that and to tell you the truth as to how I feel. This might be the las time I would have a chance to address a jury, and I have been talking to them for thirty-six years; and I have generally told them the truth; possibly not always; but I will tell you that, for it might be the last opportunity. You may hang every one of those men to the highest tree; you may hang every labor official in America and the world how I feel. This might be the last time I would have a chance to address a to the highest tree; you may drive them into their holes like rats; you may destroy the last spark of courage in their breasts, and you may leave the injustice and the wrong that exists in the world today, and new men will be born to take their places. Do you want to know who is responsible for these acts of force? It is the men who have reached out their hands and taken possession of all the wealth of the world; it is the owners of the great railroad systems; it is the Rockefellers, it is the Morgans, it is the Goulds; it is that paralyzing hand of wealth which has reached out and destroyed all the opportunities of the poor, and this is a protest against the strong. And you may kill, and kill, and kill; you may destroy every man who in a blind way has reached out with dynamite or anything else to fight against the social system; you may kill them, and you may send me and every other lawyer that dares to speak for them—you may send me to the penitentiary for life, and you may leave this injustice in the world, and other men will come to take our places forever and forever, until the blind world sees and the dumb world speaks.

Let me tell you: Here is J. B. McNamara. If there is no other man on earth who would raise his voice to do justice to him, I will do it, even if I am pleading for myself. Let me tell you something about him: Admitting he did wrong. I never believed in violence in my life on either side. That is the reason why I would never prosecute a human being in a court. I don't believe in the violence that everywhere abounds on earth; I don't believe in the violence of the poor and the weak, who think they can obtain their rights by fighting the rich and the strong. I think they cannot; but I look for the motives of men. I know that higher than anything else in man is the conscience which God gave him. I know that the noblest men who have ever lived and died are those who have followed the light of their own conscience and their own conviction, even when that light led to death. Was J. B. McNamara personally interested in the placing of dynamite in the Times building? You know he was not. He was a workingman. He was a fanatical trade unionist. He believed in force. I do not. I believe the law of love is the only law that can conquer in the end, but he believed in force. He did not do that for himself. Imagine him now: Here a man comes down from San Francisco with a suit case with sixteen sticks of dynamite in it. He places it in this alley—for what? Suppose he succeeds and gets away—he cannot even get glory. J. B. could not have that. If he failed he lost his life, unless some fanatic like me would come here and imperil his own in disposing of his case to save his life, as I did. If he failed he lost his life and yet he did not. Why? Out of willfulness or wickedness? No. Because in his brain was burning the thought that he was doing great good to the poor and the weak. Concede he was wrong—as I believe—still, he was thinking of others. Biddinger says he wanted to kill Chandler. There is not a man on this jury that if they had to choose between those two men, if they knew J. B. McNamara, would not fly to him and run away from Biddinger—not one. Why did he do it? His brother was a structural iron worker. He had seen these men who were building these skyscrapers, going up five, seven, eight, ten stories in the air, catching red-hot bolts, walking narrow beams, handling heavy loads, growing dizzy and dropping to the earth; their comrades picking up a bundle of rags and flesh and bones and blood, to take home to a mother or a wife, because the Erectors' Association and the steel trust and the powerful would not waste the money to carry up floor after floor as the structure grows, so that when they fell they could save their lives. He had seen their flesh and blood ground into money for the rich. He had seen little children working in factories and mills; he had seen death in every form coming from the oppression of the strong and the powerful; and he struck out blindly in the dark to do what he thought would help the poor. He listened to the cries of the weak, and he could hear nothing else. And he did it; and serious as the consequences have been to me, much as I have been misunderstood, even by my friends, I shall always be thankful that I had the courage to take that step to save his life, and do what I could to help make him right before his fellow-men.

Some time the world will understand. I may be in the penitentiary, or I may be dead; but some time the world will understand that you cannot settle the great conflict between capital and labor; that you cannot settle it by sending men to jail and hanging them by the neck until they are dead. You may be upon one side or the other, but men don't act in this world without a cause; and while the cause is here the victims will be here, and here forever and forever.

REPORT OF C. H. TANNER ON THE STRIKE AT EL PASO, TEXAS.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

Dear Sir and Brother:—In order that the members of the Western Federation of Miners may know something of the conditions that confront their organization at El Paso in this their fight against the smelter trust, I have prepared the follwing statement of conditions for publication in the official organ.

The smelter, the employés of which are now on strike, is the largest custom smelter in the world. It is the property of the Guggenheims, or, rather, they are credited with owning a majority of the stock, and, like all of their properties, is run on a basis of huge dividends and starving workers. The plant itself is equipped with eight furnaces of one hundred and fifty ton capacity daily, which are used for the reduction of lead ores mostly from Mexico.

Two furnaces of three hundred and fifty to four hundred ton daily capacity used to smelt copper ore and concentrates. Two reverberatories of six hundred ton capacity each, used for copper reduction.

A little over three weeks ago the employés of the smelter walked out almost to a man, and let it be said to the credit of the craft unions of El Paso that they came out with them. Not only did they do this, but they went further and donated funds and supplies to the striking workmen and advised with them, recommending to them that they organize under the banner of the Western Federation of Miners and become a part and portion of the American labor movement.

When I arrived I found a body of men, many of whom had slaved and toiled for that one company sixteen and seventeen years twelve long hours a day, every day in the month, every day in the year, and they had resolved that the end had come. They were Mexicans, who, of their own accord, had decided that they would strike for better conditions, shorter hours and more pay. They pitted their empty stomachs and their moneyless hands against the might of the Guggenheims. They had decided that they would starve but never yield. This was the bunch of men I met and saw. I spoke to them. I told them of this great trust, of its numerous smelters, its many mines. I told them it was useless; they couldn't win. I told them they should have to be organized everywhere—at Santa Rita, at Hurley, at Hayden, at Ray—before they called the strike; that they were not a part of our union; that they could not expect support. I tried them. Their answer was: We will starve. We will never go back. We have the smelter closed. They can not produce the metal. We do not ask much, they must give in.

And right they are. They have the smelter closed. April the 30th I watched the slag dump practically all day. They brought out one little pot of slag. This from the greatest custom smelter in the world; this from the plant that employs as high as sixteen hundred men. This from a plant that when working at full capacity, turns out a stream of metal four inches in diameter twenty-four hours a day, three hundred and sixty five days a year. Truly the Guggenheims, three weeks after the strike had been called, were in a sorry plight. Not a furnace running, nothing but one reverberatory containing any metal and it only being kept warm.

Truly here was material for organization. Here were men who needed aid and who deserved it. They had demanded so little, and yet the master said he couldn't afford it. Yesterday (April 30) the superintendent of the plant told a committee of the strikers: We would be glad to reinstate all our old employés with an increase of twenty-five cents a day, or about that, with the bonus provision attached.

I am going to give you the strikers' version of their grievances as they themselves saw it before anyone appeared to advise or consult with them. Their statement, which was printed in circular form and distributed in the streets of El Paso follows:

The Smelter Workingmen In Strike.

"Because it is intolerable, the treatment and exceedingly hard work forced by the company at the local smelter, the workingmen at the Bascules department have declared a strike that is supported and approved by the laborers of all the other departments, because they think the former's demands just, and have abandoned their labors in sympathy with the other workers.

"Some slavers that will please the smelter chiefs say that they have enough workers to cover the vacancies, but we expect that nobody will do this work, because the excessive labor of twelve hours per day, is too much, and it is not used in any manual works, and ought not to be enforced in smelting works, where the insalubrity of the metal fumes is enough to disgrace permanently the workers.

"Nobody but a slave will work twelve hours per day, and for that reason the smelter workers have declared a strike against the smelter company to finish such abuse, in benefit of all the workers that are ill-treated; that pay for hospital service which they do not receive properly and which are in every way exploited.

These are the strike bases:

"First—Eight hours' work instead of twelve as is done now.

"Second—Raise of twenty per cent. in the actual salaries.

"Third—Change of the present doctor because of his incompetency and because they charge us too much for his salary.

"We have named special delegates to go to the Mexican Republic and neighbor towns so that every worker will know the reasons of our strike and all will recognize and honor it.

"We ask every Mexican to not take our places, because it is anti-patriotic to take places left vacant by others in strike and because it will be against them all. If all do this way we will win in everybody's benefit.

"We have already nominated the delegation that will present these bases as stated above."

A few days ago a great smoke was seen coming from one of the stacks—the largest in the works. Investigation proved it to be a company ruse to discourage the men. They had hauled many loads of old wood and lumber to the base of the stack and then set it afire, thinking the smoke would bring the tired and worn slaves back to their tasks. To keep these men out requires that they be fed and housed; to do that means that individual members and local unions of the federation must come to their aid. We are about to send out appeals to the organized labor movement of all crafts, and we want every union and every individual to contribute all they can, because if we can win this battle with the great trust we will have done the deed that will enable us to organize the great Mexican camps of the Southwest.

When we have won this strike we will have won Ray and Hayden and Santa Rita and Hurley and Clifton and Morenci to a recognition of our worth—and why can't we win? Surely scabs cannot be hired for one dollar and forty cents per day of twelve hours! I can understand that if we asked for four dollars and eight hours how they might purchase the manhood of enough ignorant creatures to work their plant, but for the miserable wage and long, weary hours of toil, they demand they can never break this strike. The proof of it is in the utter demoralization of this plant at this time, after one month of effort on their part to start it up. Already it is being rumored that the company will be glad to grant eight hours next year, which is simply a subterfuge, as they figure if they could get the men back they could discharge or bribe the more active among them and the rest would make no trouble, hence they could forget their pleasing promises of eight hours. The men have but to stand firm to win. This I am satisfied they will willingly do, not only for increased wages but for shorter hours and for the recognition of their union. For once it seems to me the great smelter trust has bit off more than it can chew, and if ever we had a chance to win we have it here. The union had drafted an entirely new set of demands as follows:

First—Reduction of hours of labor from twelve to eight.

Second—Flat increase in wages of forty per cent.

Third—Recognition of the union.

Fourth—The check-off and closed shop.

Fifth—A voice in the management of the hospital they support. All that remains at this time to be done is to keep the strikers from going hungry. Surely the local unions will respond to our appeal. Those unions that have no funds available should lose no time in giving a dance or devising other means to raise funds for the support of the striking members of No. 78. The winning of this strike is a matter of tremendous strategic importance to us, fraught as it is with the potential possibility of the complete organization of the great Mexican mining camps of the Southwest. LOW WAGES AND WORKING GIRLS.

El Tuerto, in Coast Seaman's Journal.

The allegation of Uncle Trusty's press organs that starvation wages have nothing to do with driving girls to prostitution shows how little imagination and understanding of human nature the average high-salaried editor possesses. It may be, of course, that his shortcomings in that respect constitute the raison d'etre for his high salary, which would be quite in keeping with Uncle Trusty's reputation as a shrewd business man.

But, to come back to the question at issue, if hunger, cold, loneliness, insults, the contempt of the world which poverty invariably begets, are not enough to make the average girl view the "primrose path" as the lesser evil, what, then, do you suppose drives so many of our girls into lives of shame? You surely do not mean to insinuate that it is the "total depravity" with which our learned friends, the theologians, have so generously imbued human nature! What, then, pray, keeps yourself in the straight and narrow path? Will power, eh? High ideals? Hum, I would like to see a bunch of you strong-willed idealists placed on a raft in the middle of the ocean without water and provisions. and watch how long you would abstain from cannibalism! We can all of us philosophize calmly on the troubles of others, but before you pass judgment on poor girls who go wrong, try for a while to maintain your body, soul and self-respect by working ten or twelve hours a day for a wage of $5 a week. Just try it; that's all.

Remember, that it is only the exceptional girl whose ideals have attained those heights from where suicide looks more inviting than prostitution. In the average healthy girl the love of life is stronger than any and all considerations of morals. The law of self-preservation is supreme with her, as it is with every healthy animal. And with wages insufficient to keep body and soul in health, can you, Mr. Worldly Wiseman, tell me what under our present "Christian civilization" is left for a girl but to choose between suicide and prostitution? Until you can show me that there is another and better alternative, you will never in God's world convince me or any other sane man that low wages have nothing to do with girls going wrong.

"THERE'S A REASON."

Those readers of advertisements who are of an inquiring turn of mind may have wondered wherein lay the secret of the marvelous properties that have been ascribed—by the manufacturer—to Grape Nuts. It is admitted to be but a combination of wheat and barley, and yet we have been told that this combination is a "special food for brain and nerves," is good for appendicitis, "loose teeth" and various other unpleasant conditions. The manufacturer has at last explained. "There's a reason." Naturally enough, he makes this explanation in the pages of scientific publications, to-wit, medical journals. Thus we read in current issues of some medical journals:

"To estimate the 'calorie' value of whole wheat and barley would seem (in the laboratory) to be a correct computation of the dietic value of the well-known food (made of these two cereals)—Grape Nuts.

"But, professional accuracy of observation from a clinical standpoint, and confirmed in an empirical way by many of the more intelligent laity, has shown in many cases during a decade or more that Grape Nuts, for some reason, possibly not readily demonstrated hy the mathematics of chemistry, supplies in a prompt and practical way far more real nutritive value than the laboratory chart gives to mere wheat and barley."

After thus destroying the idols of science, the iconoclastic advertisement writer naively remarks: "The above is well worth looking into. . . . " Yes, indeed. So also are the conservation of energy and immutability of the elements and indestructibility of matter and Newton's law of gravitation and a few other fundamentals that scientific men fondly imagine to be fairly well demonstrated scientific facts.

It would seem to he the apotheosis of advertising misrepresentation when it becomes necessary for the exploiter of a breakfast food to try to convince the public that 2 plus 2 equals 5. The Journal of the American Medical Association well asks, why should medical journals and newspapers be willing to "fall for" this sort of pseudoscientific twaddle? Doubtless, "There's a reason."—Exchange.

VERY STRONG WEAPONS IN A LABOR WAR.

Banishment From Social Intercourse Is the Most Poignant of Social Pains—Word "Scab" Is Shunned.

"There is a weapon which is more cruel and more powerful than dynamite, and which freely invoked hy the contestants," says Samuel P. Orth in his article on "The Battle Line of Labor," in the World's Work. "No one realizes the effectiveness of ostracism as a war measure until he has come into touch with its victims. It is the subtlest and deadliest of poniards. Banishment from social intercourse is the most poignant of social pains. Many workmen have told me that they joined the union because they wanted to be in fellowship with their neighbors, a perfectly natural instinct.

"'Scab' is the death brand that union orthodoxy places on the brow of the militant non-conformist. An experienced 'strike-hreaker' told me that he has seen men shrink from this word who were not afraid of guns and cudgels.

"The ban extends to the 'scab's' family. The word itself is the most horribly expressive in our language. It suggests running sores, ahhorrent festers, revolting stenches. During the fever of a strike this potent expletive has shattered friendships, split congregations and broken promises of marriage.

"The boycott extends this ostracism to the town and the neighborhood heyond the limits of personal acquaintance. The necessities of life are often denied strike-breakers; dairymen have been known to refuse them milk. bakers to deny them bread, bartenders to withhold them heer, even the chruch has hesitated to offer the consolation of faith to the dying and undertakers to refuse the burial of their dead."—Exchange.

THE UNION SPY.

There is no more despicable creature, not even among the heasts and reptiles, than the spy who worms himself into the confidence of a trade union membership during the period of stress and trouble just preceding or during a strike. It is the business of this human jackal to make trouble, for the detective agency which employs him must earn a retainer, and its tool must report plots and counterplots, and if none exist he must manufacture them, and also the evidence to sustain his allegations.

Unfortunately, the organized wage-earners, more especially those having their employment in the rougher industries, are peculiarly liahle to deception, if the "operator" is smooth-tongued and plausible, and the detective agency sees to it that their vulture has these attributes.

A newspaper of world-wide reputation for its slavish support of capital, right or wrong, has recently glorified one of these "brave, cool, courageous" union spies who had his more particular and recent opportunity for displaying his talents in the Kanawha country mining district in West Virginia. This paper's special correspondent recounts with satisfaction the dismay among his former comrades when the spy unmasked himself. It was a heart-warming scene for the mine owners of West Virginia, who have a national reputation for their regard for their miners. Martial law had been declared.

"Frank A. Smith will take the stand."

Now we quote from the newspaper account:

"Nearly one hundred prisoners have been taken, altogether, hut those at this time before the court were charged with conspiracy to murder.

"They heard this command of the judge advocate without any unusual demonstration of interest, but suddenly there was a stir among them. Closely guarded hy militiamen there came into the room a smooth-faced, dark-skinned young man, his square shoulders thrown back and his rather slender figure set off hy a natty suit of the kind not usually seen in this rugged part of the country.

"It was when he inclined his head slightly and smiled toward the group of striking miners that they stirred uneasily in their chairs. They knew him for the facile-tongued and iron-nerved man who had lived for five months among them as a miner and a union agitator.

"Greater still was their consternation when in answer to the questions put to him he said that he was an operator for the William J. Burns detective agency, and that he had been sent into the mining district to learn what he could of the men back of the strike and the methods they have employed in the long-drawn-out struggle against the mine owners.

"They knew he carried a union card, that he had attended their councils of war and also that he knew them as well as they knew him. In his well-set jaw and steady eye there was no promise that he would not tell all that he knew. Their friendship for him and the confidence they had reposed in him flamed to hatred and the looks they gave him were full of menace."

There is no need of telling the rest of the story here. The newspapers have attended to that, fairly or unfairly, as the press agencies decreed. Our object now is to utter a word of warning. Not all of the union spies have been or will be unmasked. The miners' unions in West Virginia do not circumscribe their activities. Courts of law or courts martial are not always necessary to their purposes. There are other ways to disrupt or paralyze a union, so as to defeat its legitimate activities. Constant watchfulness, prompt action, keen analysis, exercised at union meetings by all the members, these are the antidotes for the machinations of the union spies and employers' agents.—The Typographical Journal.

NOTHING NEW.

Vice President Marshall's declaration that no man should inherit more than $100,000 has raised an awful row. Our "molders of public opinion" once again show their ignorance by denouncing the Indiana statesman, just because he said society had the right to take over property of a deceased and use it for the public good.

Marshall's views are as old as the hills, and have been expressed in one form or another since the dawn of time. Under the Mosaic law all property reverted back to the state every fifty years. Under this system no member of the Jewish nation could hold land longer than that time, regardless of wills or the wishes of deceased.

Blackstone, in his "Commentaries on the Laws of England," drew a sharp line between the rights of property and the rights of inheritance by showing that while a man has the right to hold property, when he dies, society is sovereign. "When a man ceases to be," declares Blackstone, "he ceases to have any dominion, and if he has a right to dispose of property one minute after his death he would have that right for a million years, which would be highly absurd."

Lord Coleridge, chief justice of England, said: "The right of inheritance is purely an artificial right. Laws of property, like all other laws, are to be changed when the public good requires it."

Men have talked about "the rights of the individual" and the "sacredness of property" so long that they have become blinded to the collective idea that binds us together, in spite of ourselves . We imagine that when a man dies he can will his property as he sees fit, just because he has the right to dispose of it without hindrance, when alive.

The opposite is true. Any authority on law will tell you that the principles of jurisprudence do not recognize the wishes of a dead person. It has no claims, even though its views are respected and concurred in. The right to inherit property and the right to will property are not inherent. These "rights" are only privileges, conferred on citizens by the state (society).

Despite these facts, which no thinker will deny, a lot of yawpers are howling at Marshall, just as though he discovered some new theory. Among them are Chauncey Depew, ex-United States senator and ex-president of the New York Central lines, who has crawled out of his cave, where he was driven several years ago, and who now solemnly assures us that any monkeying with the laws of inheritance "would cause a wave of drunkenness."—Toledo Union Leader.

"MAGNANIMITY" OF THE BOURGEOIS.

A Man of Merit Occasionally Recognized by the Ruling Class That It May Appear Righteous.

Sometimes we think that two words which suffer most from that regrettable desire for sensationalism which affects modern journalism are "hero" and "heroism." To say nothing of the application of the terms "heroism" to some of the cowardly and despicable deeds of modern warfare, this noble word is frequently used in up-to-date journalism to describe deeds of the most ordinary nature—deeds requiring but a modicum of courage, combined with moderate presence of mind; deeds worthy of praise, but not to be described as heroic without gross exaggeration or a grave impoverishment of the word itself. True heroism is exhibited in self-sacrifice to the utmost for a noble cause. Sometimes deeds of heroism—like that of Captain Oates—occur under such dramatic circumstances that the whole world's attention is arrested and does homage to the hero. But much more often, it must be noted, the deeds are done in ordinary walks of life and often the doer thereof—the genuine heroes—go unhonored and unsung.

The gallant deeds of one such hero have just been brought to light on account of the British government having "rewarded" him with a knighthood, just before he goes to a living death. If "honors" were only given to such men as Dr. George Turner, we should welcome wholeheartedly the institution. We delight that his heroism has been acknowledged before death brings him relief from his terrible suffering, but at the same time the utter inadequacy—indeed, the paltriness—of knighting such a man as Dr. Turner will appeal to all our readers. He was a knight, a prince among men, before ever any government conferred the title of "Sir" upon him. He has honored the institution of knighthood.

Dr. (now Sir George) Turner was medical officer of health for Cape Colony. A few years ago his attention was drawn to the leper asylum at Pretoria. This asylum contained about 100 patients (half Dutch and half natives). In reading what follows it should be borne in mind that hy the average white man in South Africa the Kaffir is regarded as little more than an animal. Dr. Turner commenced to devote the whole of his spare moments to the service of these human outcasts, "doing all he could to alleviate their lot and prosecuting a tireless research into the nature of the disease. For three years he labored at this work without any extra pay of any sort. He saw the lepers early in the morning and again when he came home in the evening. Saturdays and Sundays he gave to them his entire time. In addition to this, he made as many post-mortem examinations as possible in his lahoratory, rising at dawn in order to have time for his work."

After retiring from his official post, he resumed ihs bacteriological research into this awful scourge of humanity, always hoping to find it a cure. Two years ago, while shaving one morning in his home at England, he noticed some marks on his hand which showed him at once that he was himself a leper. Since then he has lived in seclusion in Exeter, cut off from kith and kin, under the shadow of the leper's fate, pursuing without pause his studies, hoping against hope to be able, before he passes away, to point the way at least to some remedy for the loathsome disease. Failing in this, he has now decided to devote the remainder of his life to the service of the lepers themselves, and is going to South Africa or India with this object in view.

We have all read how in days of old in the East the lepers were compelled to cry their mournful plaint: "Unclean, unclean," as they approached fellow-creatures. As we think of Dr. Turner's utter self-forgetfulness, his complete self-abandonment to the service of the outcasts of humanity, we feel that were we to meet him now we should be impelled ourselves to cry, "Unclean, unclean," instead of the noble leper.—Moariland Worker.

THOUGH THE HEAVENS FALL.

There is at least one Democratic senator who has the courage of his tariff convictions.

Senator Henry F. Ashurst of Arizona does not share the view of the tariff question held by the Texan whose possessions consisted of a band of sheep.

When the Wilson-Gorman act was pending and the proposal to place wool on the free list was under consideration, the sheep man wrote to his representative, Mr. Bailey, to protest against the destruction of the sheep industry. Just before the bill reached a vote in the house, Mr. Bailey received the following telegram:

"Don't mind about keeping a tariff on wool; I've sold my sheep."

Senator Ashurst, in a letter to the Leader, says that he has been misrepresented and placed in a false position by Washington correspondents who have assumed that he places greater stress upon Arizona sheep than he does upon the sanctity of Democratic pledges. The senator writes:

"I am one of the senators who believe that every promise made to the American people should be sacredly kept and that the tariff should be revised downward."

To indicate precisely where he stands, Senator Ashurst has favored the Leader with a copy of a reply that he made to the Flagstaff Board of Trade, which importuned him to remember that cattle and sheep and figs are Arizona products. The senator in his reply stated:

"In asking me to oppose any reduction in the tariff on beef, mutton, cattle, sheep, raw wool, woolen goods and leather goods, you surely must have been under the impression that I was a standpat Republican instead of a progressive Democrat. The Democratic party is committed, so far as faith and honor can bind men, to reduce the tariff on the necessaries of life; and I could not take the action you request me to take unless I turned traitor to every principle I have been advocating since I reached majority. Every person in the world is a free trader after he gets his own interests protected. The cattlemen want cattle, meats and hides protected, but want to buy everything else as cheaply as possible. The woolgrowers want wool protected, but naturally desire to purchase everything else as cheaply as they may. The pineapple growers want everything on the free list but pineapples; the sewing machine manufacturer wants sewing machines protected and everything else on the free list, and so on down the line. I am always glad to please my friends in Arizona, but I cannot do what you ask. I shall not vote to permit one set of men to make money improperly at the expense of the whole public. No legitimate business should require a gift, bounty, or largess from the government. If the Democratic party, after the promises it has made to the people to reduce the tariff, should then begin to equivocate, it would be the end—and ought to be the end—of the Democratic party."

We have an idea that the senator from Arizona is right—that if the Democrats do not revise the tariff substantially downward, the Democratic party will be compelled to wander in the wilderness and subsist as did the prodigal son upon husks thrown to the swine. There is likewise the prospect that if it shall keep its pledges it will fare even worse. But we congratulate the senator. He is brave enough to have ridden with the gallant six hundred. —Milwaukee Leader.

AN EDITORIAL MIX-UP.

Doctor Friedmann, inventor and discovered of the turtle serum exterminator for tuberculosis, has made a lucrative deal with a New York drug corporation by which he transfers to them the right to prepare and distribute his remedy in the United States. The doctor, it is stated, received some $125,000 cash, and may get perhaps $2,000,000 altogether out of his proprietary rights in the remedy in the United States alone. Which, everything considered, is doing fairly well.

Strange to say, however, our contemporary, the Tribune, seems dissatisfied with the arrangement, and in its issue of yesterday cartoons Dr. Friedmann as a prisoner standing behind iron bars and holding in his hands a plethoric bag of dollars. In front of his cage the symbolic turtle from which the serum is procured hobbles slowly along, his naturally dilatory pace being further reduced by a ball and chain attachment on his hind flipper. The cartoon bears the inscription, "SOLD," from which we infer that the Tribune considers the transaction in some way offensive to the moral sense. When Friedmann is depicted as a modern Judias Iscariot with a bag, the opinion that the cartoon is not a complimentary one is fairly justifiable.

Probably the Tribune imagines that the doctor should have given his remedy free to humanity without any monetary consideration, or that in some way the community is rightfully entitled to the product of his scientific research, and that there is something degrading in bartering it for money. The idea of the cartoon is quite "Socialistic" in its way, for under Socialism, as every one knows, the result of the inventor's genius would become public property.

But evidently the Tribune, though apparently dissatisfied with the moral and ethical aspects of the transaction, does not mean to criticize it from the Socialist standpoint, for on the same page in the column next to the cartoon its editorial quip writer has the following gem of anti-Socialist thought:

"Speaking of Mr. Morris Hillquit and his 'Socialism Summed Up,' we once visited a community where all the residents kept the same hours, did the same work, ate the same food, wore the same clothes. Yet we seemed, nevertheless, to detect the spirit of dissatisfaction, and several of the older inhabitants told us they were about to leave.

"That community was our state reformatory at Elmira."

What does the Tribune mean, anyhow, by its cartoon? Its editorial writer discerns Socialism behind bars in the Elmira reformatory and scents dissatisfaction among the community there, who have everything on the same terms. Then its cartoonist sticks Dr. Friedmann—who isn't a Socialist, and who has acted in approved capitalistic fashion—behind bars also, presumably for not letting the community have his turtle serum on equal terms, as he certainly would if he regarded the community from the Socialist standpoint. But the Tribune is dissatisfied in both cases. Neither Socialism nor anti-Socialism meets its approval.

Granted that under a Socialist system all things would be equally distributed on the same terms to all, such as work, clothes, hours of labor, etc., why does the Tribune object? Does it think that the community should have nothing whatever on equal terms except turtle serum? What reason or justification has it for assuming that Friedmann should have done otherwise than he did? What has he done that is shameful in selling his own property? Has he not acted as any capitalist, any practical man, any true individualist would act? What is there wrong with "the incentive of gain?" Does not the Tribune understand perfectly that Socialism would destroy that incentive, discourage the inventor and shackle initiative just as it represents Friedmann's turtle in shackles? Doesn't it know that Friedmann could never have had the patience, the perseverance, the genius and intellect necessary to discover a cure for tuberculosis unless he had the blessed vision of that Holy Grail before him—the big bag of dollars that the Tribune depicts him so eagerly grabbing?

Possibly it does know all this. But the Tribune should be careful to see that its editorial writer doesn't make a liar of its cartoonist. Accidents will happen, of course, even in the best regulated journalistic families, but a contradiction of this sort is altogether too glaring to be overlooked.—New York Call.

ARMS AND THE MAN.

When George Bernard Shaw, in "Major Barbara," gave to the world a dramatic portrait of a modern cannon king, in Sir Andrew Undershaft, he no doubt imagined that the picture was complete and up-to-date in every way. But at that time such an occurrence as the exposure of the Krupp concern by the Socialist deputy, Karl Liebknecht, which is now agitating Germany, was unforeseen by the dramatist, and this particular characteristic of the modern armament manufacturer, the drumming up of trade, by deliberately sowing hate and suspicion between the nations, with a view to prospective customers, was overlooked. There is still another clause to be added to the creed, which Shaw recites as comprising "the true faith of an armorer."

"What on earth is the true faith of an armorer?" asks Cusins, his prospective son-in-law, to which Undershaft replies:

"To give arms to all men who offer an honest price for them, without respect of persons or principles; to aristocrat and republican, to Nihilist and Czar, to Capitalist and Socialist, to Protestant and Catholic, to burglar and policeman, to black man, white man and yellow man—to all sorts and conditions, all nationalities, all faiths, all follies, all causes and all crimes. The first Undershaft wrote up in his shop, 'IF GOD GAVE THE HAND, LET NOT MAN WITHHOLD THE SWORD.' The second wrote up, 'ALL HAVE THE RIGHT TO FIGHT; NONE HAVE THE RIGHT TO JUDGE.' The third wrote up, 'TO MAN THE WEAPON; TO HEAVEN THE VICTORY.' The fourth had no literary turn; so he did not write up anything; but he sold cannons to Napoleon under the nose of George III. The fifth wrote up, 'PEACE SHALL NOT PREVAIL SAVE WITH A SWORD IN HER HAND.'

The sixth, my master, was best of all. He wrote up, 'NOTHING IS EVER DONE IN THIS WORLD UNTIL MEN ARE PREPARED TO KILL ONE ANOTHER IF IT IS NOT DONE.' After that, there was nothing left for the seventh to say. So he simply wrote up, 'UNASHAMED.'

There was no provision in this creed for a possible slacking up of business, and therefore no injunction to go out and drum up trade in the face of a growing anti-militarism. The Undershaft philosophy relied upon the natural inclination of mankind to slay one another without any particular urging from the armorers, and assumed it to be eternal in duration. It was merely a question of Arms and the Man—no particular man, but man in general, who it was assumed would always want arms, and the armorer's whole duty was comprised in supplying him without asking questions. It was assumed that there would be an eternal stream of customers, and no necessity of going out to seek them, or inveigle them into purchasing, by carefully and sacretly inculcating the belief in their minds that their fellows were ready to spring at their throats, and it was therefore necessary to purchase an outfit so as to be ready for them.

This need, however, has been discovered by the Krupps, and there is now room for a new clause to be added to the "true faith of an armorer." The final motto in the original—UNASHAMED—does not wholly round out the creed. There is yet something lacking—though no doubt the Krupps are unashamed — something stating the necessity of fomenting secret strife among mankind to induce them to purchase weapons of destruction; something bearing the admission that the character of the amrorer, represented merely as a cynic philosopher, is not wholly complete; that, in addition, he must become an active, lying, unscrupulous, scoundrelly, murderous, profit-seeking capitalist.

Something to that effect would complete the creed. But it will never be publicly added to by such a statement. Not because the cannon kings of the world are in the least ashamed, but because they are afraid.

It is perhaps too much to hope that the exposure of these murderous criminals by the German Socialists will have much immediate effect in putting an end forever to the diabolical trade which they have sought to encourage, but the very fact that such boosting has been found necessary is satisfactory proof that the spirit of murder through war is dying out gradually. The exposure, at least, does something to bring nearer the day when the Socialist workingmen of the world will cancel the entire creed of the modern armorer, and in its place write up the final announcement upon the walls of every one of the world's murder shops: "THIS ESTABLISHMENT HAS BEEN PERMANENTLY CLOSED."—New York Call.

GOVERNMENT OFFICE OF INTEREST TO MINERS, IRRIGATIONISTS AND INVESTORS.

Department of the Interior, United States Geological Survey, Washington.

Realizing the need for making easily accessible to the people of the Rocky Mountain states the results of the various lines of its activities, the United States Geological Survey maintains an office at No. 300-304 Chamber of Commerce Building, Denver, Colorado. Complete files of all the Survey publications are available to the public for reference. The stock of many of the older publications is exhausted and the information contained in them is available only in this way. These publications contain information regarding general geology, mineral resources (including coal and oil deposits), topography, records of the runoff of the surface waters and occurrence of underground waters, in many portions of the United States.

Irrigation and water power development along conservative lines are recognized as prime factors in the upbuilding of the western states, and the surest way to insure such conservative development is through reliable information of the most important element—the water supply. Such information for many streams is found in the publications of the Geological Survey. Of especial importance to those states rich in minerals is the work of the government geologists, whose reports are also found in the publications of the Geological Survey. The good-roads movement, which is attracting public attention at this time, is greatly aided by the topographic maps which show the best locations for such roads.

FROM THE BUREAU OF MINES, WASHINGTON, D. C.—THE WASTE OF GAS.

The history of the natural gas industry of the United States is an appalling record of increditable waste, according to Ralph Arnold and Frederick G. Clapp, authors of Technical Paper 38 of the United States Bureau of Mines on the subject, "Wastes in the Production and Utilization of Natural Gas and Means of Their Prevention."

In this technical paper, which has just been issued by the bureau, are the following statements from the authors:

"There was evidently no great waste of gas in this country before 1873, as no large gas fields had been discovered, although gas was always wasted in oil production. In 1878 a well of great volume and pressure was struck at Murraysville, Pa., twenty miles east of Pittsburgh, and the gas from this well was allowed to flow to waste for three years with no effort to check it. Up to this time the belief that natural gas was inexhaustible, seemed to be universal, just as in later years a similar opinion prevailed regarding the forests, coal and many minerals, and hence it was not until fifteen or twenty years after the first utilization of gas that the pronounced decline of production caused the truth to dawn upon producers and consumers—that the supply was indeed limited.

"The waste of natural gas has drawn the attention of the entire country, and because the waste threatens the life of gas fields, it has prevented many investors from building plants in the various fields, thereby depriving the localities of increased population and wealth. In considering the question of waste, it must be understood that the geologic occurrence of the gas in the sandstone, sand or limestone reservoirs is such that the flow of gas from one well causes a decrease in the flow of others and a reduction of the supply throughout the entire field.

"Instances are common where carelessness and indifference in drilling have resulted in waste of gas from formations penetrated above the regular sand. . . .

"In other instances, if the formations are loose, the gas sand fairly shallow, the pressure great, and the proper precautions are not taken in setting the casing, the gas may escape around the casing, loosening the ground rapidly, and ultimately gaining sufficient volume and pressure to blow the casing from the well. Such 'blowouts' have happened a number of times in the Texas and Caddo fields. They are likely to occur in the first wells drilled in any field, before the conditions attending the gas pockets are generally known. Some excuse may exist for the occurrence of one such 'blowout' in a new field, before the presence of the high-pressure gas pocket is known, but there is usually little reason for a second or a subsequent 'blowout' in a field, because precautions can be taken to prevent it.

"Waste in drilling is not so great as formerly, because at the present time drillers have usually every facility at hand to close a well as soon as completed. By proper preparation most wells can be packed, tubed and shut in within two hours. According to the conservation commission of Louisiana, the waste from the two principal 'wild' wells in Louisiana had its beginning more from a lack of knowledge of what precautions would be effective than from negligence or indifference. The waste from the first big gas well encountered in drilling for oil in the Buena Vista hills field of California was due to the unexpectedness of the great flow and to local inexperience in handling such pressures. This well was controlled only after a Texas operator had been engaged to do the work.

"The most notorious waste at present is in Oklahoma, Louisiana and California. The commission on the conservation of the natural resources in Louisiana, after an exhaustive examination of the situation in the Caddo field, found that the waste approximated '75,000,000 cubic feet per twenty-four hours, an amount equal to twenty times what the city of Shreveport uses now in the same space of time and equal to one-twentieth of the amount consumed by the entire United States.' It also found that the value of the gas wasted from a single 'wild' well in that state was in excess of $2,000 per day. There were three principal wells in the Caddo field from which the greater part of the waste occurred. They were known locally as the 'dry gas well,' the 'mud gas well' and the 'salt gas well.' Two of these have been closed by the owners, thus proving that closure is feasible. No attempt has been made to close the other, and when visited by Mr. Clapp in February, 1912, it consisted of a crater perhaps an acre in extent, in the center of which the gas was forcing a geyser-like mass of mud and water to a height of twenty to thirty feet. During much of the time this well is burning. The gas from this well has been going to waste for three years. Two other wells having an estimated volume of 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 cubic feet per day blew out and burned for one or two years. In the Caddo field at least 400,000,000 cubic feet of gas has at certain times been wasted daily, practically all the waste being preventable.

"McDowell states that the daily waste of gas in Oklahoma by escape into the air is equivalent to at least 10,000 tons of coal daily, and he states that 80 per cent of this loss is preventable."

POETICAL

MOTHER JONES.

By Oscar Langford.

They've put an injunction on old Mother Jones.
The language so stung
From the brave woman's tongue,
And her truth-telling words were so noisy in tones
That they've tried the suppression of old Mother Jones.

The court has imprisoned old Mother Jones.
She raised such a rage
About starvation wage,
The coal baron's greed and the coal miners' groans,
That they tried to get rid of old Mother Jones.

Do they think an injunction will gag Mother Jones?
It will certainly fail—
Though they've put her in jail
Or keep her surrounded by prison wall stones,
There are thousands to talk for old Mother Jones.

To thus make a martyr of old Mother Jones
Will encourage the strife
And will quicken the life
Of the struggling workers fighting the drones
Who put an injunction on old Mother Jones.

For the words and works of old Mother Jones
For downtrodden men
Will be eulogized when
The earth has enshouded her weary old bones,
And a monument built for old Mother Jones.

Then the wonderful spirit of old Mother Jones
May march up and down
Like the soul of John Brown,
Till justice shall vanquish our burdens and groans,
And oppression is buried like old Mother Jones.

Union Printers' Home, Colorado Springs, May 1, 1913.

THE BUM ON THE RODS AND THE BUM ON THE PLUSH.

By W. E. Jones.

One rides on the rods beneath the car
And one on a cushioned chair.
The one is clad in poverty's rags,
The other doth broadcloth wear.
One eats a back-door charity lunch,
For lack of the price to pay,
The other is served by a waiter skilled
In an up-to-date café.

The one sneaks into a concert dive
For an hour's cheap fun and laughter,
The other a box at the opera has,
With wine and women after;
One sleeps in the hay, or as best one may
Who has no place to dwell,
The other has a suite of rooms
In the city's best hotel.

The bum on the rods is hunted down
As an enemy of mankind,
The other is driven around to the club
And feted and wined and dined.
And those who curse the bum on the rods
As the essence of all that's bad,
Meet the bum on the plush with a sycophant's smile,
And extend the hand so glad.

The bum on the rods is a social flea
That gets an occasional bite,
The bum on the plush is a social leech,
Blood-sucking by day and night;
The bum on the rods is a load so light
That his weight we scarcely feel,
But it takes the labor of dozens of men
To furnish the other a meal.

So long as you sanction the bum on the plush,
The other will always be there;
But rid yourself of the bum on the plush,
And the other will disappear.
Then make an intelligent, organized kick,
And throw off the weights that crush;
Don't worry about the bum on the rods—
Get rid of the bum on the plush.

—Coming Nation.

A PRODUCT OF CAPITALISM.

The brothel is a necessary concomitant of the system of capitalism and cannot possibly be abolished nutil the system which breeds it is abolished.

The Western Woman's Outlook has this to say on the subject:

"The physicians of our insane asylums say: 'Forty-one per cent of insanity is due to diseases contracted in the brothel.' Other leading physicians say: 'Sixty-five per cent of the diseases of married women are the diseases contracted by the male at the brothel and transmitted.' A leaflet, issued under the authority of the leading alienists of the day says: 'Over the door of every immoral resort might truthfully be written: 'Incurable insanity may be contracted here.' "—National Socialist.

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

CHRISTIANITY and Capitalism cannot live together, no more than peace and war can live in the same home.

PRESIDENT MOYER returned to headquarters last Sunday, after visiting the local unions in Ontario and Michigan.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY has commissioned Debs, Berger and Germer to make a thorough investigation of conditions in Russianized West Virginia.

The report of this committee will make known the facts and the working class can rest assured that nothing will be smothered.

IT IS REPORTED that "Bro." Ortie McManigal is soon to be released from the Los Angeles county jail in order to star in that touching draymer entitled "More Sinned Against Than Sinning," in which he will play the part of the heroine. William Wood, the president of the woolen trust, has not yet been brought to trial, and the prosecuting attorney in his bailiwick says, "It's none of the public's business." And yet there is wonder expressed at the contempt for law on the part of the working class!—Seattle Union-Record.

THE JUNIOR LEAGUE has investigated the conditions that prevail in the schools of Brooklyn, New York. The investigation revealed the fact that 30,000 children attending schools in Brooklyn are suffering from lack of sufficient nourishment.

When the child at school is hungry, it is positive proof that we are afflicted with prosperity.

THE CAPITALIST papers of America have had no lengthy editorials congratulating the people of Belgium scoring a victory for manhood suffrage.

The capitalist papers of America are class-conscious internationally and know that the political victory achieved in Belgium will have its influence wherever manhood is struggling for liberty.

THE SILK MILL STRIKE at Hazelton, Pa., has been won by the United Textile Workers after the I. W. W. had made a failure of it. The charge is made that the latter collected funds ostensibly to support the strikers, but used it for themselves and that they still have $500 in the bank, which was contributed by the miners and which the striking textile workers demanded.

The I. W. W. have gained a national reputation for collecting funds and have established a record for holding on to funds to reward the Ciceros for their stunts on the soapbox.

The time is close at hand when bloodcurdling and thrilling circulars from the Indolent Willies will fail to drag the mazuma from the most sympathetic.

THE EXPOSURE of a syndicate of millionaires in Los Angeles who were engaged in the seduction and enslavement of young girls, has hit capitalism another jolt and gagged the "holier than thou" element who are continually howling "Socialism would destroy the home!" Had Socialists been engaged in this infamous traffic of white slavery and the ruination of innocent girls, the kept press of America would explode with denunciations of the unclean brutes who dragged womanhood into the foul cesspool of filth and debauchery. But as the millionaires are respectable Democrats and loyal Republicans, they must be treated with that leniency and clemency which their political faith and financial standing demand.

Pass the limburger!

THE SOCIALIST PARTY of Ohio in State Convention assembled passed the following resolution in condemnation of anarchy under forms of law in West Virginia:

"Whereas, Hundreds of our fellow-workers, in the Kanawha mining districts of West Virginia, have been subjected to the most outrageous treatment at the hands of the mine operators, their private guards, detectives, scabs, gunmen and the West Virginia guards, because the miners dared to revolt against poor wages, long hours and conditions inimical to life and health, and

"Whereas, Their agitators and advisers, Mother Jones, Boswell, John Brown and others have been thrown into a military bullpen and denied the right to a civil court trial, thereby establishing a most threatening precedent in labor troubles; therefore be it

"Resolved, By the Socialist Party of Ohio, in Convention assembled, That we most emphatically protest against the treatment meted out to these miners in West Virginia and the unjust and inhuman incarceration of their teachers and co-workers and call upon the governor of West Virginia to immediately remove all private guards and strike-breakers from the state and to issue orders to the National Guard of West Virginia, of which he is commander-in-chief, to protect the workers in their battle for bread and better life conditions."

A MEMBER of the Mailers' Union of Cleveland, Ohio, has made the following statement to the Cleveland Citizen:

"The I. W. W. teaches and preaches close affiliation and organization, but does not employ them, as the Mailers' Union of Cleveland, represented by Roy Anson, business agent, waited on them to get the mailing of their paper for that union. The mailers were refused the work, because the I. W. W. has non-union men handling their paper.

"This same inconsistent bunch is now sending out begging literature asking for funds to support the packing house employés, and none of it bears the union label. Do these people think that we are a lot of suckers and easy marks?

"Union men, we appeal to you to do nothing that will benefit the I. W. W. in any way."

The above needs no editorial comment.

BY A DECISION of the United States Circuit Court of Oregon, lands aggregating $30,000,000 in value will be restored to the public domain from the Southern Pacific land grant if the higher courts shall affirm the findings of the trial court.

The lands in question involve only a fraction of the vast territory granted by Congress to the Southern Pacific.

If all of the lands, granted to railway promoters were to be returned to the public domain, a territory larger than the original thirteen colonies would be involved. The value would mount up in the billions.

The government loaned its credit to the promoters, it granted them an empire from the public domain and squandered the heritage of future generations without any compunctions or consideration for the public welfare that looked beyond the then immediate present.

There was graft. Blaine was smirched with Credit Mobilier. But the dissipation of the public domain was due in part to the lack of vision by the people themselves and to the then prevailing individualism that made governors of grafters in reward for their industry, and applauded success whether Jay Gould or Jesse James initiated the enterprise — Milwaukee Leader.

THE LABORER of Dallas, Texas, under the head of "The problem of the Unorganized," has the following to say:

"The recent revelations of the methods of the I. W. W. strengthen our belief that the responsible labor unions of the country must act promptly in the matter of organizing the unorganized and unskilled workers. The American Federation of Labor has not kept pace with the advance of industrial development. We have been too much inclined to keep the skilled craft organization up and let the ever-growing army of unskilled workers go unorganized. We have spent more energy in discussing jurisdiction claims than organizing. And now that the growth of machinery makes still a matter of less concern, the unorganized, unskilled worker is undermining the skilled workers' organizations.

"Furthermore the vast army of unorganized men and women are so grievously exploited that they are ready to revolt and when they are brought out on strike by irresponsible agitators who counsel violence they bring serious injury upon the labor movement and so does strikes that are fostered for the purpose of securing donations for the benefit of an army of "volunteers" who are looking for nothing but free soup and adventure. The revelations of Trautman, one time general organizer for the I. W. W. and still prominent in their work, show that these are the conditions that exist. The A. F. of L. is largely to blame for such happenings because the A. F. of L. should be so well organized that it would be impossible to start "wildcat" strikes and speech fights that would attract attention."

"Are the steamship companies responsible for the large surplusage of laborers which are now flocking to Juneau?

"Is Juneau to be the victim of the same calamity from which Nome, Valdez and Cordova suffered in the hour of their prosperity?

"At this moment Juneau is filled with laborers who cannot find work.

"Every lodging house is filled to its capacity. Cots on the floor of the old dining room of the Occidental hotel are selling at 75 cents a night.

"The number of idle men in town is estimated at between 300 and 500.

"On the rturn of Mr. Thane and some expected material, two or three hundred more men will be put to work by the Alaska Gastineau Mining Company. Quite a number of men are now at work building houses in Juneau, and it is more than probable that this number will be augmented and there will be employment in the surrounding camps, but it will be several weeks before even the present number now in the city are put to work. And the arrival of every steamer brings more men.

"The gathering together of a large number of idle men is not a good thing for the community," said a well known man yesterday, and steps should be taken by the Commercial Club to apprise the steamship companies on the Sound of the labor conditions here."

ARCHBISHOP GLENNON of St. Louis is a pulpit orator of national repute and no one will deny but that he is a classical scholar, but the reverend gentleman with all his scholarly attainments seems to be blind to the conditions that are giving birth to sentiments that are demanding equality for woman at the ballot box.

Archbishop Glennon, in an address on the woman suffrage movement recently said:

"The true mother should be queen in the home, and a queen she will be as long as she remains there; but the moment she leaves her home to become more independent, she invariably loses her queenly title and becomes instead a mere nuisance or troublesome parasite."

According to the Archbishop, the woman who yearns for more independence and who demands that her voice be heard at the ballot box becomes "a mere nuisance or troublesome parasite."

The man leaves his home and mingles with his fellowmen at the polls on election day, and the question arises: does he become "a mere nuisance and a troublesome parasite?"

If not, why not?

If the man exercising the right of suffrage does not become "a mere nuisance and troublesome parasite," then upon what logical grounds does the Archbishop base his statement that the exercise of suffrage would convert the woman into "a mere nuisance and a troublesome parasite?"

The Archbishop declares: "The true mother should be queen in the home, and a queen she will be as long as she remains there."

What about the millions of mothers whom poverty has driven to the mills, factories, department stores and sweatshops?

Are they "queens of homes," these overworked and ill-paid slaves, who confiscate their health and strength to produce profit for a master class whose dogs have diamond collars and whose daughters through bank accounts can select husbands from royal degenerates? The archbishop may be a giant in moral philosophy and theology, but he is certainly an infant in his grasp of economics and social problems.

REV. PETER E. DEITZ, who has been one of the boosters and promoters of the Militia of Christ, has sent out a circular letter in which he appeals to the membership of organized labor to become imbued with the spirit of Christianity. Rev. Dietz in his circular bewails the conflicts that arise between employer and employé and feels that if only men would lift their eyes towards the blue-vaulted dome and think of the many "mansions in the skies" that are being prepared for the holy and righteous, they would forget the material things of life which precipitate so many conflicts between Brother Labor and Brother Capital.

Rev. Dietz, through the "Militia of Christ," is going to disarm Labor and Capital and the slave permeated with the joy of eternal happiness in the realms of everlasting glory for his contentment on earth is going to hug his boss in the deathless embrace of fraternity.

Strange that so many centuries have elapsed since Christianity dawned upon the world and yet it remained for Rev. Peter Dietz to launch an organization whose principles are presumed to bridge the broad and deep chasm that lies between exploiter and exploited.

Peter, thou art a rock!

But the wise and cunning Peter in his circular is merely trying to throw dust in the eyes of the working class, knowing full well that economic tyrants who hold labor in the fetters of wage slavery are not foolish enough to gulp down the drivel that flows from the shackled pen of a man who is up in arms against Socialism.

Dietz, by statements only, endeavors to impress upon Labor that Socialism is not only a menace to society, but an enemy to the real interests of labor.

Statements from Dietz must be followed by proof and argument.

The Catholic church, of which Dietz is a minister, has been the great and potent church of Belgium, and yet, what did the church in Belgium do for the working class.

Did the church demand manhood suffrage for the workers? No! The church was a partner of capital in denying labor an equal voice with capital at the ballot box, and Socialism, which Rev. Dietz denounces and condemns, solidified the workers of Belgium and won a strike that placed in the hand of labor a weapon that enables the worker to wage a bloodless revolution for the industrial emancipation of humanity. Rev. Dietz will discover in due time that the labor movement of the country is no longer in its swaddling clothes, and, furthermore, this clerical slanderer of Socialism will yet realize that the mentality of labor can no longer be drugged by verbal opiates administered by a spiritual physician.

THE EMANCIPATION OF LABOR is essential to the freedom of humanity. The struggle for freedom is the history of the race; the fruit of the struggle, the development of man. The civilization of Egypt, Persia Babylon, Rome, Greece, Assyria and other ancient nations, and the royal robbers and privileged parasites that ruled over them, had their day and passed away with the wretched slaves who built the pyramids and obelisks along the tracks of the early centuries of the race. The feudal nations of medieval Europe, whose lords and nobles inherited all the vicious and heartless characteristics of the ancient ruling class, especially their parasitic disdain and brutal contempt for their outraged slaves, have followed in the wake of their predecessors, and nothing remains but the memory of their bloody reign—the midnight horrors of history. The working class may be robbed, tramped upon, crushed, broken, sabered, imprisoned, shot full of jagged wounds, "poor dumb mouths" to bear witness to the crimes it has suffered, but its majestic march continues towards the sunrise. The master and slave, the lord and serf of past ages, are gone, and the capitalists and wageworkers of our day must soon follow them. It is the historic mission of labor to free the human race. To free itself is to free mankind Labor is life. Society would perish without the working class. The degree of labor's servitude is the degree of society's tribulation, defeat and shame. There can be no morals in any society based upon the exploitation and consequent misery of the class whose labor supports that society. There can be no freedom while workers are in fetters. Wage servitude is fatal even to the true freedom of its most favored capitalist beneficiaries. They may be surfeited with gold and powers, but they are not free. They cannot sever the ties that bind them to their slaves and soar alone into the realms of freedom It is written in the moral law with "iron pen in the lead and rock forever" that whosoever enslaves his fellow-man forges fetter for himself. When labor is emancipated, humanity will draw its first full and vitalizing breath of freedom. We are now in the transition period between individualism and collectivism; between brutality and brotherhood. Wealth will be for all; so easily obtained honestly that there will be no incentive to steal, and so abundantly that poverty will disappear; and ignorance, disease and crime will follow in their order. Profits and wages produce palaces for parasities and workhouses for workers. An awakening proletariat is pulsing with solidarity and turning its eyes towards the sunrise. Scarred and seamed are its rough and hardened features, and grim its determination, but no just man on earth need fear it. It has suffered a million crimes, but is animated by no spirit of revenge. Its mission of emancipation is darkened by no shadow of contemplated injury or injustice to its conquered enemy. It conquers that enemy but to free that enemy; and a victorious proletariat will celebrate the peace of the world.—EUGENE DEBS.

Disgusting Servility

A READER of The Miners' Magazine at Sutter Creek, California, has sent us several clippings taken from the Amador Ledger, requesting us to comment on the same.

The editor of The Miners' Magazine during the past several years has been called upon at different times to take notice of the snarls against labor that have appeared in the editorial columns of the Ledger.

The Ledger is a publication that grovels at the feet of a master class, and its condemnation of the efforts of organized labor to advance or promote the interests of the workers deserve the unqualified approval of such frothing fanatics as Kirby, Post and the Peerless Calumniator, General Otis of the Los Angeles Times.

Under the head, "The Proposed Mining Laws," the Ledger had the following editorial spasm:

The mining industry of California is not immune from the present freak Legislature. Among other vicious bills against the mining industry that have already passed the Assembly is Finnegan's mining inspector bill No. 752. The salary provided in this bill is only about one-half of the amount necessary to employ a competent mining engineer, and the employment of such a man is also sought to be prevented by requiring the appointee to have seven years' underground experience in California.

"Tamping with anything but wooden bars is prohibited, but the most vicious part of the measure is found in sections 17 to 38, where the bill dictates in an absurd manner how mines shall be operated. No one can ride on the skip when it contains anything. All shafts 200 feet deep must have two or more compartments with landings thirty feet apart; the landings must be closely covered; the ladderway in certain cases must be bulkheaded and in other cases drifts must be driven from the ladderway to the surface; guard rails must be kept across the shaft at all stations and all winzes must be surrounded with guard rails; all skips, where the shaft is over 350 feet deep, must be provided with sheet iron or steel casing with doors; pillars must be left standing on each side of the shaft; nothing but head-frames can be put over a shaft except a door and non-inflammable house. Further regulations are also made as to cables and boilers; and no person is permitted to ride upon the bail.

"If this bill becomes a law it will be a body-blow to the mining industry of California, and we especially call its vicious provisions to the attention of Senator Caminetti as the bill has not yet passed the Senate."

The above editorial condemnation of the Ledger, relative to the Mining Inspector bill No. 752 of California, shows conclusively that any attempt on the part of a legislative body to protect human life at the expense of exploiters, is stubbornly opposed by the servile sheet of Amador county, whose editor seems to be mortgaged to capitalism.

But the Ledger, as well as other subsidized organs, will learn in due time that a large and ever-increasing percentage of the working class are awakening to their class interests and are slowly but surely coming together to impress upon society the fact that human life is more valuable than dirty dollars.

The exploiter, as a genral rule is more interested in dividends than in the protection of life and rises in rebellion against any legislation that means a shrinkage in profit, even though such expenditure means safety for the human being out of whose labor the employer reaps his surplus.

The Ledger, with its weak squeal against legislation that insures the safety of laboring humanity, will ultimately be strangled by the sentiment that is growing and crystallizing throughout the world and which is demanding that a higher price shall be placed upon life than profit. profit.

Rewarded for Treason

ORTIE McMANIGAL, the Judas used by the steel trust and backed by the Burns Detective Agency, is to be given his freedom in the near future, according to the Associated Press. McManigal was the star witness in the trials of the McNamara brothers and was used at Indianapolis to give testimony against nearly two score of men against whom charges were brought by the combination of conspirators who decreed that the labor movement should be given a solar plexus blow. McManigal was the truckling tool and sleuth of an octopus that has waged relentless war against organized labor, and now that he has rendered service to a master class, he is to be rewarded with his liberty and probably compensated by sums of money as remuneration for his time in jail while rehearsing the part that he was to play in the conviction of officials of the Bridge and Structural Iron Workers.

McManigal is a criminal and a degenerate, senseless to shame and dead to every principle of honor.

He has openly confessed his infamy, and yet this moral pervert, used as a professional on the witness stand to convict officials of the Structural Iron Workers, is to be turned loose by the dictum of corporate combinations that used him to visit vengeance on men who gave battle to the despotism of industrial tyrants.

Our so-called "department of justice" is not to be consulted, for corporate anarchists and outlaws tower above courts and laws, and their mandates seem to command mute obedience from those in public life who have sworn to uphold the law and the constitution.

When the jail doors swing outward and McManigal is given his freedom as part payment for his treason to men of his class, the membership of organized labor will be furnished the indisputable proof that the courts, in the language of Baer, are "the bulwarks of American liberty."

Under No Obligation to Hatfield

ACCORDING to last week's dispatches, "Mother" Jones is no longer an inmate of a prison guarded by "the boys in blue" of West Virginia.

"Mother" Jones is under no obligation to Governor Hatfield for her liberty, for this official agent of the mine owners held her in custody until the voice of labor was heard in protest in the legislative halls at Washington.

The resolution offered by Senator Kern of Indiana to the Senate of the United States caused the Peabody of West Virginia to do some serious thinking, and as a result of his mental activity he concluded that it might be dangerous for him to play the role of despot much longer.

Labor throughout the nation was becoming aroused and Hatfield realized that the continued imprisonment of a woman who had committed no crime save to protest against corporate anarchy and paid thuggery, might place him in a position from which even his masters might be unable to extricate him.

When Hatfield succeeded Glasscock as governor, it was claimed that Hatfield would give labor a square deal, but Hatfield's suppression of the Labor Argus at Charleston and his seizure of the Socialist and Labor Star at Huntington, simply because these journals pleaded for justice, demonstrates beyond every question of a doubt, that the governor of West Virginia knows no law that conflicts with the mandates of the corporate interests.

The New York Call, commenting on the liberation of Mother Jones, had the following to say editorially:

"No justice has been done Mother Jones in freeing her from prison. There is simply an admission that a gross and unpardonable violation of all right was done in sending her there. She had as much right to be in West Virginia as any mine owner had. She was there as a law-abiding citizen but at a time when the strike district swarmed with criminals called guards. As Mother Jones had come to help fight the cause of the striking miners, she was instantly suspected and as soon as a military court could get to work she was seized and held as long as they dared hold her.

"There is now as much cause as ever for investigating conditions in Paint Creek and Cabin Creek. It is known that the detective thugs have been guilty of every species of violence and that many murders can be traced to their door. Some few facts about the strike have leaked out, but only part of the story. Those who have attempted to get the story have been driven out. Those who have attempted to tell the story have been suppressed.

"John Brown and others are still held by the military authorities. They must be freed. They probably could get out of jail if they promised to leave the state, but this promise will not be given, any more than Mother Jones will give such a promise. The only thing that can be done is to force the military authorities to release them. Then every effort should be made to hold the military authorities to an accounting of their actions.

"They acted under the direction of the mine owners. But the mine owners are not the law and have no right to assume these powers. Much can be made of this case, for it is one of the blackest in the history of the American labor movement. Mother Jones is to remain on the scene of action and her evidence will go far toward bringing out the truth about the crimes that have been committed in the name of law and order."

The Results of Our Industrial System

WE ARE LIVING in an age when the dollar is above the man. Dividends are more valuable than human flesh. Profit is the incentive which actuates the vast majority of people and profit is demanded even though homes are wrecked and honor dethroned.

Under our system vice commands a higher price than virtue, and this system that corrupts manhood and debauches womanhood is upheld by men and women who lay claim to Christianity.

The mills, factories and sweatshops are filled with women and children from whose lives joy and happiness have been snatched in order that Privilege may glut its appetite on the surplus proceeds coined from the misery and wretchedness of labor.

The "bad lands" are densely populated with social outcasts who have gone down in the struggle to live, and all the influences of the church have failed to halt the illicit traffic in the bodies and souls of women whose honor was sold for bread.

Millions of children have been snatched from the schoolroom and sentenced to the prisons of profit, whose innocence and childhood are outraged to appease the insatiable avarice of dehumanized greed.

Homes are wrecked and ruined through almost 100,000 divorces annually, and with all the agencies established by courts and legislative bodies, family ties are sundered and yet we pay tribute to a civilization that is wet with tears and blood.

In every part of the earth "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn," and yet, the moans of pain and sighs of despair are tolerated, even by those upon whose brows are written the lines of suffering and degradation. Wrong sits upon a throne while right is crucified and justice has become almost a stranger in this age of piracy that makes brutes of men.

The great problem of the future is to remove the causes that have made a jungle of the earth and to usher in a civilization that will open wide the gates of equal opportunity to all mankind.

Scabbery in the Y. M. C. A.

NO ONE WOULD for a moment charge that the Young Men's Christian Association was founded with the idea of supplying scabs and strikebreakers to employers in search of cheap labor, but it would be equally absurd to deny unqualifiedly that the institution can be used and has been used for that purpose.

When we see a Young People's Socialist League in Chicago, in the first issue of its journal, stating bluntly that the local Y. M. C. A. is being used for that purpose and openly denouncing its backers, like Morgan, the puritanical banker, and Julius Rosenwald, the philanthropist, who denies any connection between vice and low wages, it is safe to say they have some grounds for the accusation.

By the bye, what is a man with such a name as Rosenwald doing as a champion of the Young Men's Christian Association? But we may let that pass. Probably the question could be explained on the same grounds that another Chicago Jewish philanthropist, Max Pam, the millionaire lawyer, recently gave $25,000 to assist the educational propaganda of the Catholic Church.

Here in New York something similar has taken place. The seventy-five flyboys in the printing establishment of the Schweinler Company, on Hudson street, are complaining that the local Y. M. C. A. officials at West 57th street have furnished scabs to take their places while they were on strike for a weekly minimum wage of $12. The charge seems wll founded, and has not been denied.

However, the Y. M. C. A. is not different from other institutions that either emanate from capitalist necessities or are compelled to make friends with the plutocratic mammon of unrighteousness. There, for instance, is the organization of the Boy Scouts. When this thing was formed, there were all sorts of impassioned denials from the founders and promoters that there was the slightest taint of militarism about it, as the Socialists charged. Its object was solely to teach the principles of justice, truth, humanity, loyalty and obedience to the youngsters whom it attracted. The drill was merely a setting up exercise, a sort of physical culture, both necessary and coommendable. There was not the slightest intention to educate the boys in the art of war, and the charges of the Socialists and others were based upon misinformation, ignorance, prejudice or deliberate malice.

But what did we see the other day in this locality? Hundreds of these boy scouts skirmishing through the woods in the suburbs of the city, armed with obsolete carbines, and fighting sham battles with one another, attacking, retreating, defending, marching, counter marching and going through all the military maneuvers of regular soldiers. The columns of the newspapers and magazines were filled with reproductions of photographs, representing the boys "taking cover," dodging, lying and kneeling behind rocks and hummocks, and aiming imaginary pot-shots at one another through the intervening brush and scrub. Yet, we are assured that the object of this institution was everything else in the world except "teaching the young idea how to shoot."

We do not claim that the Y. M. C. A. "should" not do these things, nor do we expect them to do otherwise. Any institution that is financed and supported by plutocratic patrons, no matter what its name or avowed purpose, may naturally be expected to some extent at least to do the will of those patrons. Capitalists want scabs and strikebreakers, and there is nothing strange in the fact that these organizations should be used as a means of supplying them. In the class struggle, all such organizations have to take sides. With the "Christian" character of the Y. M. C. A. we have nothing to do, but its "scab" character is a matter of legitimate interest to us, even if we cannot prevent it.—New York Call.

All Hail the Union

WATER RUNS DOWN HILL. But water can be forced up hill. The tendency of wages among the unorganized is always downward. Organization among wage-earners not only checks this tendency but forces wages up.

Employers are endeavoring to make all the profit they can, and if their workmen are docile and non-union they pay them the lowest wages so that the employers' profits may ever be on the increase. The employer fears or respects the power of the union, for he knows that organization among his workmen will compel him to pay them decent wages and accord them better treatment.

Many schemes are being hatched, with the aid of unscrupulous employers, to induce workmen to keep out of the unions, because the employers are afraid of the combined action of their workmen. Employers have unions of their own, but they do not call their organizations "unions." They call them "associations, or corporations, or trusts." That sounds better to the employers. The workmen have the same right to organize as the employers. If an association is good for employers, a union is good for workmen.

Why do workmentn organize? Because—

When workmen are organized they always get better wages.

When workmen are organized they always have shorter hours.

When workmen are organized they always have better working conditions.

When workmen are organized they are not afraid of losing their jobs at the whim of a foreman or superintendent.

When workmen are organized they become convinced that there is no other plan whereby the workmen can be protected against avarice, greed, tyranny and injustice.

When workmen are organized they realize that the unions make independent instead of dependent men.

The American Federation of Labor has organized thousands of unions that have raised the wages of their members 100 per cent. since they were organized.

The organized coal miners last year secured an increase in wages of $8,000,000, and the organized metal miners got an increase in wages during that time of over $4,000,000.

The organized men who work on the railroads repairing the tracks got a raise last year of $2,000,000.

The organized seamen got a raise last year of $1,030,000.

The organized men and women in the clothing industry secured a raise last year of over $2,000,000, and they have secured more increases this year because their union is growing stronger.

These are only a few of the organizations that secured more wages, shorter hours and better working conditions. Every organization in the American Federation of Labor secured some benefit last year, and will get more this year.

But the non-union men and women are working for the same wages except where they have been given a slight raise to keep them from joining a union.

Laborers in unorganized industries now receive $1.50 to $2.00 per day of ten and twelve hours each, while organized mechanics in these same industries receive $2.25 to $3.00 per day for eight and ten hours.

Organized laborers employed in the construction of buildings average $3.00 per day for eight hours.

The wages given will be increased as the organizations of these men grow stronger and larger, and will never be decreased so long as the union is maintained.

The American Federation of Labor has no mission other than to assist the workmen to secure justice. The membership of organized labor is made up entirely of workmen and workwomen. Organized workmen know so well the value of the unions that they support the American Federation of Labor for the purpose of organizing the non unionists so that they, too, may derive equal benefits.

The union workmen want to help the non-union workmen but they cannot do so unless the non-union men and women make an effort to help themselves.

The dues you will pay into a union will be returned to you a thousandfold in higher wages and shorter hours.

There are over 2,500,000 union members in this country. Why? Because it pays to belong to a union. The union is for the wage workers, and them alone. Every man and woman who works for wages, irrespective of nationality, creed or color, is invited into the union and will be made welcome.

If you want more money for your labor—organize.
If you want shorter hours—Organize.
If you want better working conditions—organize.
If you have hope for a better day on this earth—organize.

In writing to your friends in your native country advise them to remain there until, you together with your fellow countrymen here, have organized unions that will protect yourself and them against low wages and long hours.

You are entitled to a living wage, but you cannot get it unless you organize. You want it NOW. Organize and get it. The American Federation of Labor will help you, but you must help by doing your duty—join the union. Yours for the union,

SAM'L GOMPERS.
President American Federation of Labor.

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

A Call Upon the Government

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE of the socialist party in session at Chicago drafted the following memorial and forwarded the same to the president of the United States:

To the President of the United States—Your Excellency:

The National Committee of the socialist party, in the name of more than 100,000 organized Socialist and almost 1,000,000 voters, and on behalf of the entire working class of America, respectfully directs your attention to the fact that in the State of West Virginia there exists a reign of terror, of officially protected lawlessness and anarchy, which has no parallel in the history of any modern nation with the exception of Russia. In and contiguous to the Kanawha district of West Virginia American citizens have during the past few months been deprived of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and that of the State of West Virginia itself.

In particular, the fundamental right of free speech and free assemblage have been arbitrarily suppressed by the guards and thugs hired by the coal barons of the feudal industrial State, protected and upheld in their lawlessness by the officials of the State.

Newspapers have been suppressed without any process of law, simply because they have presented favorably the claims of the striking miners. Plants of these newspapers have been seized and confiscated in violation of the constitutions and laws of the State of West Virginia and the United States.

Martial law has been established in West Virginia throughout the strike region and the civil power subordinated to the military power in open and in flagrant violation of the most explicit provision of the State Constitution, that the military shall at all times be subordinate to the civil power, and that no civilian citizen "shall be tried or punished by any military court for any offense that is cognizable by civil courts of the State."

By this illegally constituted military despotism which has usurped the powers of civil government, peonage has been established, citizens have been arrested without warrant, imprisoned without trial, held incommunicado, sentenced by drum head court-martial for alleged civil offenses, notwithstanding the fact the the civil courts having jurisdiction of offenses are open and unobstrueted.

Thus in the United States, in the State which this year celebrates its fiftieth anniversary of her admission to the Union, we find the popular sovereignty destroyed and a military despotism of the most brutal type established.

The doctrine which has prevailed among civilized nations for centuries, that the civil offenses may not be tried before military tribunals, is abandoned at the behest of arrogant corporations, and the State whose boast has been that "mountaineers are always free men," is reduced to the most degrading vassalage and servitude.

This matter is of vital concern, not alone to West Virginia, but to the entire nation. If such wanton destruction of civil government is to be permitted in one State, it may not be kept out of any or all other States in the Union. This is of especial importance in view of the growing number of industrial conflicts and disturbances.

Therefore in view of the facts that the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution to every citizen are being ruthlessly denied. we call upon you as the head of the nation to immediately use your power and the authority vested in you by the Constitution to suppress the outrageous military misrule in West Virginia and to restore the supremacy of civil authority, popular sovereignty and those rights of citizenship guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and of West Virginia.

We demand a searching investigation by the Department of Justice of the condition of civil war in West Virginia and the puishment of those officials of the State who so flagrantly violated their oaths of office and aided and abetted hired gunmen and guards of corporations in their assaults upon the lives and liberty of the working people of West Virginia.

We have this day elected a committee of three of our members to wait upon you at your convenience, to voice further our indignant protest against those outrages and to lay before you evidence of the truth of our charges

NATIONAL COMMITTEE, SOCIALIST PARTY.
MORRIS HILLQUIT, Chairman.
JAMES M. REILLY, Secretary.

The Meaning of the Strike

STRIKES, STRIKES—nothing but strikes, all over this country, and in other countries. It is the order of the day. What does it mean? It means that the working class is at last beginning to awaken from its long slumber. A new spirit has taken hold of those who toil, but have not. Those who have, but toil not, do not understand the real significance of the situation. And they are angry and desperate and confused and afraid.

What is the world coming to that the lower classes should have lost their humility? They no longer acquiesce in the general plan of things. They are dissatisfied with wages and hours of labor and the state of life which God in His infinite wisdom has decreed should be theirs, and with which they have been satisfied from the beginning. Even the government of the masters, used to keep the mob in subjection, no longer receives the respect of the working class. Nor do the clubs of the police, the rifles of the militiamen or the jail strike terror into their hearts. Even the old patriotism no longer has any effect. Wave a flag before a crowd of striking workers, and they will cheer and smile a wise, slow smile. Ask them to go back to their tasks in the name of this flag, and they will laugh outright at your stupidity. You may even trot out your false God, put words into his mouth of gold and greed and superstition—awfully terrifying words. and the workers will simply scorn you, and walk away.

Can you not see that times have changed, and that with the changed times the psychology of the people have changed too?

A revolution has taken place in the minds of the people, just as a revolution has taken place in machinery and methods of producing wealth. And the one revolution is co-related to the other.

The changed spirit as expressed in universal strikes and general discontent is simply the growing opposition to private ownership of public necessities. Contempt for ideas that were onee considered sacred is due to the same thing.

The idea that those who work hardest should have least and viee versa no longer is tolerated. To be meek and humble and poor is no longer considered a virtue. That there is something materially wrong with a system under which more highly developed and swifter machinery, as well as more efficient methods of produetion ereates greater hardships upon those who operate the machinery eannot but be observed, and even the toiling masses have observed this. Labor has awakened. When it has thoroughly shaken off the effeets of its long slumber, it will take eomplete possession of that which has enslaved it, (the maehinery of produetion), and instead of being slaves of the maehines and the owners of the machines, the maehines will be enslaved to the end that human happiness will be served.

This is the meaning of the strike. The workers are telling the masters to get off their baeks, and they mean what they say. If the masters refuse to listen, and in consequenee are thrown off bodily, it will be their own fault. Listen to what the workers say:

> Let us remind you, gentlemen, masters and eaptains of industry, that we, the workers, who bear the burdens of the world; we, without whose labor soeiety eould not endure for a day; we, who with brains and museles toil to feed and clothe and house the world, will not always eroueh on our knees and permit you to ride upon our baeks.
> Today you have the advantage. You are well fed, you are warm, you own the bread and the meat, the cotton and wool, the coal and iron, the eopper, gold and silver. You elaim all the lands, all the mines,all the forests, all the machinery and all the money.
> You own everything.
> At times our eondition becomes so intolerable we in self-defense are forced to strike. If we wring some concessions from you at one place, we lose at another. If we win on the railroad, you ineriease the freight rates and take from our brothers what we have forced you to eoneede to us.
> When it becomes neeessary for you to wage war in order to find new commerical markets for the surplus we produee, you eall upon us, wage slaves, to do your fighting.
> You have built ehurehes, colleges, and libraries with the wealth we produeed. You have employed preachers to teaeh us to be contented with our lot; professors to prove that you furnish us employment, and but for your wisdom and philanthropy we would starve.
> You are masters and gentlemen. We are industrial slaves and tramps. You are wealthy, we are poor. You are strong and on top. We are weak and on our knees.
> But from today on we fight you.
> Against your political eeonomy, and seienee, and philosophy, the law, the mortality, the art and ideals of your class, we submit our own political eeonomy, science, philosophy, law, morality, art and ideals. Againnst the present we offer the future.
> You put labor and capital upon the same basis. You speak of the "hog market" and the "labor market" in the same terms.. We want no more of it! Too long have we, with minds, hearts and flesh that ean suffer, been treated with less consideration than money. The time has come when the welfare of our families—men, women and ehildren—must be considered paramount to all that money means.
> Our women and ehildren need food, elothing, shelter and education, and we are going to seeure those things for them upon our own terms—the terms of labor. We create these things, that is why we insist upon our own terms.
> It is upon our shoulders, we workingmen, that the world rests.
> And remember, we are many—we are in majority. We can shake you off our backs. You only appear great beeause we are on our knees. We are going to arise. We have stood your system of robbery too long already.
> We are going to establish the Co-operative Common wealth, a system of the eollcetive ownership of the means of life, a system in which robbery will be abolished.
> You, gentlemen, masters and eaptains of industry—
> Get off our backs!—The Weekly Issue.

A Tariff Strike

THE TARIFF BILL has passed the House of Represenatives. After several months of eonsideration and "debate" in the Senate, it will go to the president for his signature.

The protected interests, recognizing that political power has slipped from their grasp, are showing their economic teeth. They are threatening a general strike.

They may "fold their arms!"

If the government purposes to lower the duties which privilege them to charge higher prices than under competitive conditions, well and good; let the government see how it ean get along with the mills closed!

President Wilson is disturbed. He does not eonsider the threat to close the mills and faetories an idle one. He is angry and threatens the malefaetors of money with the gibbet of publicity.

In speaking for the administration, Mr. Underwood said in closing the debate in the house:

> "I give you notiee now if any more attempts are made in the interest of the Republiean party to threaten labor, there is a bureau in this government, the bureau of foreign and domestie eommeree, ereated by the Demoeratie party, that will go into the faetory, make a thorough investigation and aseertain the reason why."

How feeble and futile the proposal to coerce manufacturers by investigating them if they shall shut down their plants! Is there any law by which a eapitalist may be eompelled to do business when he prefers to elose his establishment? Is it not his property to do with as he may please? If he shall deeline to operate under a Democratic tariff law, why should he fear an investigation to ascertain the reason?

Mr. Wilson and congress are powerless in such a situation as is threatened. The holders of economic power hold the whip hand. We have seen in Belgium what the workers have been able to do by a general strike. But how much more effective would a general strike of the eapitalists prove if they should combine to employ their eeonomic power to coeree the government. When the mill is elosed, the workers are forced into idleness. They may starve, and the sooner they starve the greater the pressure they will bring upon the political power to create eonditions that will permit of their re-employment. The government then must aceede to the demands of the rebellious capitalists or be overthrown by them and the workers at the next eleetion—either it must aeeede or seize the industries and, under the power whieh the executive may assume in time of insurreetion or rebellion, administer them for the public welfare.

Mr. Wilson and the Democratic party could not adopt the alternative of taking possession of the interrupted industries and operating them under governmental direction. They ean do nothing, exeepting to give utterance to idle threats of their displeasure.

The tariff beneficiaries—the proteeted trusts—may not, and probably will not, employ their economic power to force the government's hand. But the very threat to do so emphasizes the utter dependence of the administrators of government upon the possessors of eeonomic power, useless they shall be prepared to go to the lengths to which Lincoln went when, in contravention of the constitution and the "rights of property," he emancipated the slaves and stripped the slave oligarehy of the last remnant of its broken power.—Milwaukee Leader.

The Curse of Capitalism

By W. S. Morgan.

Capitalism is the eoncentrated quintessenee of crimes.

It is the eombination of abominations.

It is the power of hell clothed in the livery of heaven.

It is industrial damnation in full bloom.

It is the whip of the devil lashing the toilers to their daily tasks.

It is the monster master of man's destiny.

It is the stupendous granary of greed and the seething cesspool of crime.

It is the thief of opportunity and the destroyer of hope.

It reaps where it does not sow and inhabits where it does not build.

It grinds into golden dollars the brawn of manhood and the blood of ehildhood.

It robs future generations of the virtue and vitality of womanhood.

It has forced labor on the auction block and installed hatred into the hearts of men.

It bows before the church for protection and crucifies the teachings of the Nazarene on the cross of gold.

It engenders strife, preeipitates war and plunders the people.

It pays princely priees for pews from the proeeeds of its piratical plunder. It is the father of sin and the fruitful source of crime.

Its victims crowd the eemeteries, the alms-houses, the hospitals and the jails.

It has its apologists among the preachers, the philosophers, the politicians, the pirates and the police.

It is destitute of love and its heart is black with lust.

It is made up ehiefly of corporations and eorporations have no souls.

Having no soul, no love, no sympathy it recognizes no law, human or divine, except the law of special privilege.

Its ereed is the instinct of the brute.

In its operations it is arrogant, extortionate, mereiless.

It affects morality that it may hide its immorality.

It clothes injustice with charity, wickedness with hypoeriey, sits under the drippings of the church sanetuary, shouts amen with a loud voiee, but keeps the wheels of machinery that rob the toilers of their just reward well greased with deception.

It is the despoiler of homes and the destroyer of human happiness.

It stultifies manhood, debauches womanhood and depraves childhood.

It is the reservoir of superstition, the caldron of calamity, the climax of cussedness and the curse of civilization.

It has robbed humanity of its heritage, genius of its reward, and the toilers of the products of their labor.

War is its sacrificial altar, and there it satiates its thirst for blood and its greed for gain.

It is the fountain head of falsehood and the progenitor of deception.

It is the clearing house for crime and the depository for stolen goods.

It is the warehouse for pollution and the cesspool of disease.

It is a wart on the Universe and a Scab on Creation.

It is the hothouse of immorality and the school of dishonesty.

It permeates every phase of industrial life and leaves poverty, misery, sickness, suffering, death and despair in its slimy path.

It performs the dance of death on the platform of hell while it laughs at the tears of women, the pleadings of men and the pitiful cries of children who are its unfortunate victims.

Let the cursed thing be banished from the face of the earth.—National Rip-Saw.

MINING "EX"PERTS.

Agnes Thecla Fair.

Ever meet the School of Mines boys, with their Khaki clothes and Khaki minds, the fellows who want a separate table from the "Roughnecks," lest contact with the latter might cause them to use their brains and a serious thought might creep in and fracture their skulls? No, they are not strong for the union, not strong on education, know nothing of social or any other science, and last, but not least, when they open their mouths on mining us female prospectors have them "buffaloed."

It is true they know gold when they see it (in nuggets) or when they are asked to change a twenty-dollar gold piece. But let one talk sulphides, formation, porphyry or leads, and you are too deep for them.

The mining industry has been cursed and paralyzed, especially in the West. by these professors' sons, who profess to know all there is to be known—when they read one book on Trigonometry and another on The Geographical Lay of Gold Bricks, by Professor Need-em Coin.

The College Boys never discovered a mine, never opened up a mine, never developed a mine, would not know a mine from a subway, and draw their pay on pull, never on ability. Ninety-nine out of every hundred School of Mines mining "experts" were intended by Satan to be gravediggers!

Their reading matter, like their gray matter, is limited. They read the Saturday Evening Ghost, The Tribune and The Mining Unscientific Dress, all printed in rat shops. The grizzlied old veteran of the hills has more knowledge of mining in his corns or toenails than all the School of Mines boys have in their heads, and why the workers ever tolerate these slave-drivers on any job is a question soon to be solved, as well as letting them buy the foodstuffs and have charge of the commissary.

And all cooks in miners' boarding houses should be employed by the miners who eat the food cooked, and not the mining experts, whose knowledge of domestic science causes them to say to the employment shark over the 'phone, "If there are no cooks around, send a blacksmith or donkey tender."

The result is the cooking is like the mines these fellows expert

Brother Roughnecks, let the slogan on the job be, "Fall in with the times or get off the job!"

LABOR'S SOLOMONS.

Agnes Thecla Fair.

Labor has had its Judas Iscariots, its Moses, its Christ, and now we have a new type the fellow who is trying to out-Solomon, the ancient fellow with a thousand wives.

One of these Solomons is connected in an official capacity with the Iron Molders' Union; another has his haunts in the woods of Denver; two more are at San Francisco, and last, but not least, is the one at Seattle, who, while drawing $5 per day as a lecturer for the Seattle comrades, sold J. A. Wayland's reputation for 4 bits and two drinks of whisky, a gin fizz and a Hanford cocktail to the Seattle Daily "Crimes," a cannibalistic, capitalistic gutter sheet. That is, he was a "star" writer for this paper (though not on the payroll) when he was not "jollying" the violinist at the Moore theater or teaching the class struggle to the mistresses of shingle manufacturers of Puget Sound, while his own wife took in ironing to support his children.

We would not give a slam what these scape goats did, were it not for the fact they are getting bolder in their cussedness against young girls of the working class, and this we know from gumshoeing these scape goats around.

The Iron Molders' representative is for the Bull Moosers first, last and always, and when not on the street corner ogling girls, he is making the rounds of his concubines, of whom he has only seven in Kansas City alone, while a wife and children slumber peacefully a short distance away.

The Denver fellow no doubt has his public utilities job by this time, and the working girls whom he jollied into having faith in his sincerity as a faker are still juggling dishes.

The San Francisco fellows might be described as fat and sassy, and when they go into the Flood building or hurry to Sacramento to the law foundry, we rough-necks are well aware of the side of the fence they are on.

All of these fellows are men of families, and I have a personal acquaintance with the working girls they are taking advantage of and sending to the county hospital.

We wish to say to these would-be Solomons that the labor movement has no place for capitalistic cussedness, and any one holding a card or job can no longer hide behind their wives and children's skirts. We will not throw hints—but bricks—in a pamphlet for free distribution, and gives names and dates.

AN APPEAL TO PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Dear Sir—We the Socialists of Bisbee, Arizona, in session this, the 11th day of May, 1913, express our sentiment from the viewpoint of labor, be it political or industrially organized, and we firmly believe that we are expressing the sentiments of the laboring masses of America.

Mr. President, if the conditions at Paint and Cabin Creek, in Harrison county, West Virginia are as serious as reported, they are intolerable and must cease to exist.

From all reports at our command there are twelve laboring people held in prison, in violation of the constitution of the United States for daring to stand up for the rights of their class. And also Governor Hatfield has suppressed a labor newspaper known as the "Labor Argus" at Charleston.

We have endured such conditions for many years, until the laboring masses of this country have about reached the last point of endurance. It is useless to mention those in the past, but we call your attention to the ones under your administration, and we ask for an immediate investigation and a hurried report, and in case you should decline or delay this action, we, the laboring people will investigate it ourselves, and if the powers of the government will not protect us, then the powers need not expect our loyalty.

Mr. President, we firmly believe that you will carry out the principles of the constitution of the United States that guarantee a republican form of government in each and every state, as in your oath of office you pledged you would do.

If the industrial barons are permitted to violate, or cause it to be violated, these sacred principles and cause the law-abiding citizens to be incarcerated for months without a trial, the suppression of free speech and confiscation and suppression of a free press in West Virginia, then it can be done in any state in the Union.

The principles of freedom and justice must be upheld at any hazard. We hope you will not treat this matter lightly, and we most earnestly entreat you to act promptly.

Yours for justice, peace and happiness,

W. F. BURLISON,
W. E. HOLM,
G. POWELL.

TEACHERS DENOUNCE BOY SCOUTS.

By Mary Oreilly.

The Chicago Teachers' Federation appointed a committee to investigate the Boy Scout movement and report. A meeting to organize the Boy Scouts was called together in the office of General Frederick Dent Grant. I went and asked permission to attend that morning, but it was refused.

The organization was effected, details were planned and a future meeting was called. No delegates were called for from the labor unions. The representative of the Teachers' Federation was refused admission which she requested.

Thus the movement was placed in the hands of military and business men, and it was shown conclusively that their ideals were intended to prevail. I made this report to the Teachers' Federation, which passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, The press reports that 'Boy Scout corps' are to be organized among the boys of the public schools; and,

"Whereas, According to the plans of a self-appointed committee, military men and others having no professional training, teachers' certificates nor authority to teach, are to be permitted to organize these bands of scouts, to teach and control them, putting guns into their hands and destructive ideals into their minds; and,

"Whereas, The chairman of the committee of the Chicago Teachers' Federation, appointed and instructed to investigate the 'Boy Scout' movement was denied admission to the meeting yb the self-appointed committee in charge; and,

"Whereas, That committee includes no mothers nor any woman in its membership; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the organization of 'Boy Scout' corps of American children, and all efforts to arrest their developing minds at a stage of development which belongs to a medieval, barbarous age.

"That we oppose the efforts of private individuals, military, commercial or others, to reach over the heads of the regular constituted authorities and control the educational policy of our schools,

"That we are opposed to the efforts of any men to take into their own hands the decision of questions vitally interesting to women,

"That we stand with the constructive forces of society as teachers, as women and as members of the great working class for the ideals of industry and peace."

What shall we substitute for military training for boys? How shall we give to children the good which the Boy Scouts claim without the military spirit?

There is one good American institution which has been overlooked in the controversy; that is the public school system. It is the most democratic organization of children ever attempted. Every good thing claimed by the Boy Scout movement has been done by the public schools for years. Nature study, woodcraft, outdoor exercise have been attempted.

It is interesting to compare the niggardly policy of the business man toward the schools with his generosity to these courts. He robs the state of hundreds of thousands of dollars of school taxes and cheerfully donates far more to promote a military organization which teaches "unquestioning obedience to employers and superiors."

A CALL ON THE PRESIDENT.

Bisbee, Arizona, May 11, 1913.

Mr. Woodrow Wilson, President United States, Washington, D. C.:

At a regular meeting of Bisbee Miners' Union No. 106, Western Federation of Miners, held on the above date, the following protest resolution was adopted and ordered forwarded to you:

Whereas, The dastardly imposition on the working class by the coal barons of West Virginia at the strikes in the Paint and Cabin Creek districts, where the conditions are such that the aged mothers of the land can be incarcerated for months without trial, by a military drumhead court, as in the case of Mother Jones, have embittered the workers to a point never before attained in the history of this country; and,

Whereas, There are also eleven workingmen imprisoned under the same condition as Mother Jones, one being the editor of a labor paper in Charleston, the press has been confiscated and the paper suppressed. Thus the suppression of the press and free speech. Law-abiding citizens have been imprisoned for months without a fair trial or even an indictment; thereby the abolition of a republican form of government, which the constitution guarantees.

Therefore, Mr. President, we consider this condition beyond all tolerance and demand an immediate investigation and early report. Are we to have a repetition of the crimes of Governor Berkeley of Virginia in 1670, when he established the military drumhead court to secure convictions he never could secure in courts of justice?

We say no.

At that time the king was forced to take cognizance of that affair and put an end to Berkeley's tyranny.

It is up to you to do as much as the crown head did in his day. We ask of you, do you expect loyalty of the working class unless they can secure protection?

Well do we know that if this condition is tolerated in West Virginia it will soon be extended to all other states.

Now, Mr. President, we ask you in the name of justice, peace and happiness of this nation to act at once.

IS THE RELIGIOUS CREED OF THE LATE J. PIERPONT MORGAN THE TRUE ONE?

By R. A. Dague.

J. Pierpont Morgan, one of the richest men in the world, recently "crossed the Great Divide." His last will and testament begins with these words:

"I commit my soul into the hands of my Savior, in full confi"dence that having redeemed it and washed it in His most precious
"blood He will present it faultless before the throne of my Heavenly
"Father; and I entreat my children to maintain and defend, at all "hazard, and at any cost of personal sacrifice, the blessed doctrine of "the complete atonement for sin through the blood of Jesus Christ,
"once offered, and through that alone."

While Mr. Morgan was a member of the Episcopal church he was very popular at Rome. A New York paper says:

"The largest wax candle ever molded will be burned on feast
"days in the Vatican at Rome to the memory of J. Pierpont Morgan
"if the hopes of Father E. T. Monteleone and his parishioners of Our "Lady of Mount Carmel's Roman Catholic church, in Jersey City,
"are realized. The candle is now being molded at the expense of "Father Monteleone's church.

"The candle will be sixteen feet high with a base eighteen
"inches in diameter, tapering to six inches. If the candle was lighted
"one day each year it is estimated that it would last for 300 years,
"and if burned steadily it would not be consumed in less than nine "months. If a place can be found for the candle in the Vatican it "is also hoped to place with it at its base an oil portrait of Mr.
"Morgan."

Now, this contribution is not for the purpose of giving expression of unkind remarks about the late Mr. Morgan personally, but to discuss the religious creed he professed. His pastor, Rev. George Chambers Richmond, D.D., is quoted as saying:

"Mr. Morgan didn't lift his hand to help the American working"man. He helped to keep prices up. He was never in favor of "higher wages for the men who toiled on his railroads. He helped to "foment strikes by his lack of vital interest in the men who sweat
"for his money. We shall never see a man just like him in our "American life, and we ought to be glad of it. Mr. Morgan has not "gone to heaven, but is now beginning a new life in a new world—
"perhaps as a common day laborer."

Now, I think that Dr. Richmond's creed is nearer the truth than was Mr. Morgan's. I cannot believe that a man can, at death, shift all the consequences of his selfishness, meanness and sins on to a Savior, and with one bound go faultless and pure to the throne of God and be forever happy. Such views are gross distortions of the true gospel of Christ, who said: "Ye shall reap as ye sow." I am not referring to Mr. Morgan now, when I ask what man of fairly well-developed reasoning powers and some sense of justice, can believe that one can spend a lifetime in crime and debauchery, cursing the world by his wickedness, and then through the atonement escape all the consequences of his vile life and go straight to glorious celestial regions pure and spotless?

I would have toleration for the honest belief of everybody, but such a doctrine, in my opinion, is not only contrary to a true interpretation of Christ's teaching, but is productive of untold evil. It encourages men to continue in crime. Jesus insisted on the doctrine of restitution and of every one "working out his own salvation." I believe it is a pretty well-known fact that nearly all murderers and desperate criminals are soundly orthodox in that they think they can commit any atrocious crime and live a life of wickedness, and then, any time before death, through the blood atonement, escape all the consequences of their misdeeds.

All the despotic kings, tyrants and czars hold to that theory. With but few exceptions, all the noted millionaire exploiters of working people in Europe and America are advocates of that vicious doctrine. It is the belief of every criminal. It is a creed that fits this present system of selfish individualism—of competition that is founded on the principle of speculation or of getting something for nothing. It is a historical fact that the early Christians were communists, or near Socialists. Christianity was corrupted in the third century and made to teach that heaven and eternal bliss can be gained not by merit of good works but through the merit of shed blood. The economic system, naturally patterned after the theological teaching and communism was crushed and speculation and greed and kingcraft and wars and crime came as a foul brood, being the legitimate fruits of the doctrines of getting something for nothing. That view of the atonement, in my opinion, has cursed the world beyond all human estimation. It is false and vicious to the very core. Nature, philosophy and sound theology teaches what is obvious to all clear thinkers, that if we would reach heaven and happiness we must by our thoughts and deeds earn those desirable conditions and places.

No shed blood of animals, humans or gods can transfer guilt from the transgressor to an innocent one. No candles sixteen feet high nor other ceremony or movement, will enable a soul to escape punishment for wrongs committed. Here or hereafter, all must undo, as far as possible, what was wrongfully done. No student in God's school can be jumped from the primary department to the graduating class of the university. He must win his promotion by his own industry and study. He must advance through his obedience and his own merit, and not through the merit of Jesus or anybody else. There may be repentance and forgiveness, and that may imply a change of life of the one who repents, but such repentance does not blot out either the fact that a man committed bad deeds nor the consequences which resulted from those acts. Restitution, reciprocity, "as ye measure to others so shall it be measured to you again." This is the law of earth and heaven. From it there is no escape, here or hereafter.

I am not surprised that the late Pierpont Morgan's pastor said: "Mr. Morgan has not gone to heaven, but is beginning a new life in a new world—perhaps as a common laborer."

NOTES FOR LABOR DAY.

Washington, D. C., May 10, 1913.

To the Officers and Delegates of Central Labor Unions:

Gentlemen—The time is now close at hand when the various Central Labor Unions will be making the necessary arrangements for the celebration of Labor Day, and the appointment of committees to carry on the work necessary for the proper celebration of this laborious holiday.

In making these arrangements the committees of the Central Labor Unions, as well as the committees of the various local unions, who will participate in the celebrating of Labor Day, should be particularly careful as to the manner in which orders are placed for articles that may be required by the members, particularly those who take part in the parades wherever they are held.

In the years past, and particularly the last two years, numerous inquiries have been received at this office inquiring if the so-called hatters' label and Knights of Labor label were genuine. In a number of instances unions have placed orders for wool hats bearing the union label, and the dealers with whom the orders were placed have been deceived in obtaining hats bearing the so-called label of the Wool Fur Hatters' Association, an organization that does not exist. This label is being used by an unfair manufacturer whose employés are not organized and who endeavors to sell his product as being union-made.

In another instance a so-called Knights of Labor label has been used by a Chicago manufacturer upon overalls and uniforms that have been purchased for Labor Day purposes, and when the order was given it was for union-made goods. The trouble has invariably been that when the goods have been delivered it was too late to obtain others.

Committees of unions are advised that if they are in any doubt this year as to the placing of orders in establishments that cannot provide the union label, if they will communicate with this office, full information will be sent to them, but in any event, in placing orders for hats, caps, uniforms, overalls or jackets, it should be insisted upon that the label of the United Hatters of North America should appear in the hats and the label of the United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers should be sewed and pasted in the caps, and the label of the United Garment Workers' Union should appear in uniforms, overalls and jackets.

Those organizations who, besides participating in parades, contemplate holding banquets, smoke talks or other entertainments, should insist that all refreshments that are served should be made under union conditions and bear the union label of their respective trades, and this condition should specifically apply to the label of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers, whose label is not receiving the support from organized labor that it should.

If there are to be any employed in serving the refreshments, see to it that those who dispense the liquids wear the blue button of the Hotel and Restaurant Employés' Unions, and those who serve food should wear the green button of the same organization, the button which is worn by the waiters.

If the committees who have charge of these Labor Day celebrations—that is, banquets and other forms of entertainment—will bear in mind at all times the suggestions as contained in this letter, it is bound to be helpful to the organizations in interest and to the general labor movement as a whole, and your assistance and co-operation along these lines are invited.

Secretaries of Central Bodies, after reading this communication to the regular meeting, are requested to hand the same to the chairman or secretary of the Labor Day committee.

Hoping that these suggestions as contained in this letter will be observed in the strictest possible manner, I remain, Yours fraternally,

THOMAS F. TRACY, Secretary-Treasurer.

"WORK" OF THE CAPITALIST.

Consists Mainly in Making His Position Secure on Labor's Back.

We must now consider what the term "capitalist" is coming to signify. Had the term been used half a century ago it would have connoted a class, unscrupulous perhaps in the main, with low aims, little culture and less fine sympathy or imagination. It was, nevertheless, a socially useful class, which at that time performed real services. It is a leading thought in modern philosophy that in its process of development each institution tends to cancel itself. Its special function is born out of social necesstiies; its progress is determined by attractions or repulsions which arise in society, producing a certain effect which tends to negate the original function. Thus early society among the Aryan peoples of Europe develops a leader in war or council, who grows, by processes which in England, e. g., can be clearly traced, into a king with genuine functions, a leader of the people in war, like William I., or a powerful civil ruler and statesman, like Henry I.

The fact that such men were brutal or wicked is of little account. But the very putting forth of the kingly power arouses antagonism; then produces armed resistance by a combined group, and finally leads to overthrow, either by the destruction of the king or by depriving him of all real power and reducing him to a mere ornamental puppet. The very power originally believed to be beneficent becomes tyrannical; it needs to be checked more and more, until finally it practically ceases to exist, and the curious paradox is seen of a monarch who does not rule. History proves abundantly that men do not rise and otherthrow wicked and corrupt rulers merely because they are wicked and corrupt. It is part of the terrible irony of history that a Louis XV. dies in his bed, while a William the Silent or a Lincoln falls a victim to the assassin. What men do not long tolerate is either obstructiveness or uselessness.

Now, if we apply these ideas to the evolution of the capitalist, what is it we see? The capitalist was originally an entrepreneur, a manager who worked hard at his business, and who received what economists have called the "wages of superintendence." So long as the capitalist occupied that position he might be restrained and controlled in various ways; but he could not be got rid of. His "wages of superintendence" were certainly often exorbitant; but he performed real functions; and society, as yet unprepared to take those functions upon itself, could not afford to discharge him. Yet, like the king, he had to be restrained by the legislation already referred to, for his power involved much suffering to his fellows. But now the capitalist is fast becoming absolutely useless. Finding it easier and more rational to combine with others of his class in a large undertaking, he has now abdicated his position of overseer, has put in a salaried manager to perform his work for him, and has become a mere rent or interest receiver. The rent or interest he receives is paid for the use of a monopoly which not he, but a whole multitude of people created by their joint efforts.

It was inevitable that this differentiation of manager and capitalist should arise. It is part of the process of capitalist evolution due to machine industry. As competition led to waste in production, so it led to the cutting of profits among capitalists. To prevent this the massing of capital was necessary, by which the large capitalist could undersell his small rivals by offering, at price below anything they could afford to sell at, goods produced by machinery and distributed by a plexus of agencies initially too costly to any individual competitor to purchase or set on foot.

Now, for such massive capitals the contributions of several capitalists are needed, and hence has arisen the joint stock company, or "compagnie anonyme." Through this new capitalist agency a person in England can hold stock in an enterprise at the Antipodes which he has never visited, and never intends to visit, and which, therefore, he cannot "superintend" in any way. He and the other shareholders put in a manager, with injunctions to be economical. The manager's business is to earn for his employers the largest dividends possible; if he does not do so he is dismissed. The old personal relation between the worker and the employer is gone; instead thereof remains merely the cash nexus. To secure high dividends the manager will lower wages. If that is resisted, there will probably be either a strike or lockout. Cheap labor will be perhaps imported by the manager, and if the workpeople resist by intimidation or organized boycotting, the forces of the state (which they help to maintain) will be used against them. In the majority of cases they must submit. Such is a not unfair picture of the relation of capitalist to workmen today, the former having become an idle dividend-receiver. The dictum of orthodox political economy, uttered by so competent an authority as the late Professor Cairnes, runs:

"It is important on moral, no less than on economic grounds, to insist upon this, that no public benefit of any kind arises from the existence of an idle rich class. The wealth accumulated by their ancestors and others on their behalf, where it is employed as capital, no doubt help to sustain industry; but what they consume in luxury and idleness is not capital, and helps to sustain nothing but their own unprofitable lives. By all means, they must have their rents and interest, as it is written in the bond; but let them take their proper place as drones in the hive, gorging at a feast to which they have contributed nothing.'—William Clarke.

PROPOSITION TO ORGANIZE AN INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

By R. A. Dague.

(Note.—I propose the enactment of the following bill into law.—R. A. Dague, Creston, Iowa).

A BILL

For an act to provide for the organization of the unemployed into an industrial army of the United States, and the maintainance of the same.

Be It Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Section 1. The secretary of labor is hereby instructed to organize an Industrial Army of the Unemployed, and he shall recruit the same from all the states of the Union and District of Columbia, pro-rating the number of enlistments among the same according to the population, as nearly as may be practicable.

Section 2. Any able-bodied person aged 16 years or more may become a member of said army by applying to the secretary of labor or any other officer authorized by law to recruit for said army, and by subscribing to the following oath:

"I, ..., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am a native of ....., that my age is ..... years, that I have been a resident of the United States ..... years, and that I have no sufficient means of support except that derived from my manual daily labor; that I am out of regular employment and in immediate need of food and lodging; that I wish to enlist in the Industrial Army of the Unemployed for a term of three months; that I will, if accepted as a member of said army, obey all orders of my superiors in said army in the line of my duty; that I will render honest and true service by laboring in all peaceful pursuits wherever ordered to go by my superiors. I will be loyal to the government of the United States; I will obey its laws, honor its flag and participate in no lawlessness nor violence against peaceful citizens of the United States or their property.

Section 3. The secretary of labor is hereby authorized and instructed to appoint or cause to be appointed, a suitable person in each congressional district in the United States to act as a recruiting officer for said army.

Section 4. The duty of said recruiting officers shall be similar to that of like officers in the regular army, subject to such modifications and changes as the secretary of labor may make. They shall provide transportation to recruits from place of enlistment to such point as may be designated by the secretary of labor or his subordinate officer, charging the government of the United States with all expenses of such recruiting and transportation of said recruit. All money properly expended by counties, states, cities and districts in defraying necessary expenses of recruiting said industrial army and transporting said recruits to such rendezvous as is designated by the secretary of labor shall be refunded to said states, counties, cities or districts by the United States. The salaries of said recruiting officers for services as such duly performed, shall not be greater than the compensation paid officers who recruit for the regular army for like services.

Section 5. The secretary of labor shall have full authority to adopt such methods and measures to carry out the purpose and intent of Sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of this act as may in his judgment be necessary, conforming as nearly as possible to the usages, laws and methods in force in the War Department in recruiting the regular army in transporting said recruits from the place of their enlistment to their command, and in the payment of the wages of said recruits, subject to such modifications and restrictions as may be ordered by the President of the United States, who shall be commander-in-chief of the said industrial army.

Section 6. The duties of the industrial army shall be to follow peaceful pursuits and not war. Their labor shall be expended on harbors, forts, government buildings and grounds, in digging canals, irrigating deserts, and on any or all public works owned or controlled by the United States or by states, counties, districts and cities, as may be designated by Congress, the President or the secretary of labor.

Section 7. Each member of said industrial army, who has been a resident of the United States for five consecutive years or more, shall receive in lawful money for each day's labor of eight hours the minimum sum of two dollars ($2) per day, and boarding and lodging, to be paid at the close of each week's service, and each member who has been a resident of the United States less than five years and more than three years shall receive board, lodging and one and one-half dollars ($1.50) per day, and each member who has been a resident of the United States less than three years shall receive board, lodging and one dollar ($1) per day, but no person not a native of the United States, who may arrive from a foreign country after the passage of this act and who enlists in the industrial army, shall receive as wages more than boarding, lodging and 25 cents per day till after he has been a resident of this country five consecutive years.

Section 8. This organization shall be designated as the Industrial Army of the United States. The enlistment in said army shall be for a term of three months, at the expiration of which time members shall be discharged. If a member's service has been uniformly good the mustering-out officer shall state that fact in the written discharge.

Section 9. Any member having served a full term of three months, and not having been discharged from said army for crimes committed or because of heinous offenses, may re-enlist a second, a third or any number of times upon complying to conditions required in the first enlistment.

Section 10. No fees shall be required in advance from said recruits herein mentioned by reason of his volunteering to enlist in said industrial army. Every recruit sworn in shall be transported at the expense of the government to such rendezvous as may be designated by the secretary of labor, and the cost of such transportation shall be deducted from the first wages earned by said recruit.

Section 11. If any recruit, after taking the oath herein prescribed and after having been transported to the said camp or rendezvous, shall desert, or being able-bodied shall refuse to labor under directions of the duly constituted overseer as per his said oath and the provisions of this act, he shall be adjudged to be guilty of insubordination, and be dishonorably discharged from the industrial army and be denied the right of re-enlisting in said army for five years.

Section 12. All the rules, customs and discipline in force and effect for the organization, recruiting and maintenance of the regular army, including the payment of wages, shall, as far as applicable, be observed and enforced by the secretary of labor and his subordinates in organizing and maintaining the said industrial army, except as otherwise provided herein.

Section 13. Members of the industrial army shall not be required to bear firearms or other weapons of war, nor to wear any regulation uniform, but may wear the usual dress of the civilian, as best suits such member, and shall furnish his own apparel; neither shall they be required to perform drill duty, nor participate in dress parades, nor perform any marching except to and from their labor, nor do any manual labor other than what may be necessary to do in the ordinary and proper discharge of their peaceful duties as manual laborers, working eight hours a day.

Section 14. In case of the illness of any member, or bodily injury received from accident during his term of service, he shall be properly and humanely provided for in the government hospitals, and shall receive the professional services of regular army physician, and be given medical treatment, without expense to said individual. He shall also receive his full wages, as though able to perform the usual labor, while under the physician's care.

Section 15. The members of the industrial army shall be organized into companies of fifty, and each company shall be placed under the command of an overseer, whose official title shall be "Industrial Captain," which officer shall be selected from the membership of the industrial army; provided, however, that if no suitable overseer can be found in the ranks of the industrial army, then in that event, the secretary of labor or the state superintendent may appoint some other suitable person to act as captain; such officer shall be subject to removal from office by the secretary of labor or state superintendent at their pleasure.

Section 16. Each state in the Union and the District of Columbia shall constitute a division or zone for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act. One superintendent shall be appointed by the President or secretary of labor for each state and district, whose official title shall be "industrial colonel," who shall have command of the industrial army in his division, subject to the orders of the President or secretary of labor. He shall have authority to appoint such number of assistants or subordinates as may be necessary to properly conduct the business of the industrial army within his jurisdiction, said appointment of assistants to be subject to the approval or rejection by the secretary of labor.

Section 17. All official reports made by the captains shall be transmitted to the state commander, who in turn shall forward them with his own official report to the secretary of labor, such official reports to be made four times a year or oftener, if ordered by the secretary of labor.

Section 18. The officers of the industrial army shall be as follows:

The President of the United States, commander-in-chief.

The secretary of labor, whose official duties shall be, as far as applicable, similar to the duties of the secretary of war.

The commissioned officers shall be one chief of staff, whose title shall be "industrial general," one "industrial adjutant general," one superintendent for each state and the District of Columbia, whose official titles shall be "industrial colonel."

The non-commissioned officers shall consist of as many overseers of companies as may be deemed to be necessary by the secretary of labor, and their official title shall be "industrial captains." The commissioned officers shall be appointed by the President, whose term of office shall be so long as the President may determine, not to exceed the date of the expiration of the President's term of office. The non-commissioned officers shall be appointed by the industrial colonels, subject to the approval or disapproval of the secretary of labor.

Section 19. The salary of the officers hereinafter named shall be the sums designated, to-wit:

Industrial general	$250.00 per month
Industrial adjutant general	200.00 per month
Industrial colonel	150.00 per month
Industrial captains	100.00 per month

said salary being exclusive of traveling expenses, office rentals, stationery and wages of necessary assistants.

Section 20. Companies of fifty females shall have a female industrial captain and their labor shall be expended in publicly owned or managed industries suitable to be rendered by women.

Section 21. The duties of the industrial captains shall be to oversee and direct the labor of each member under his or her command, subject to the orders and authority of the secretary of labor or such other person as the secretary may authorize to have the general supervision of the work to be done.

Section 22. The President of the United States shall have authority to temporarily suspend enlistments into the industrial army whenever the public interests should require such suspension.

Section 23. The secretary of labor shall, as nearly as may be practicable, apportion the number of enlistments allowed in the industrial army among the respective states and District of Columbia, according to the ratio of population of the same, as shown by the last census reports.

Section 24. If at any time there are a greater number of members of the industrial army in active service than can be profitably or suitably employed on works of the United States, the secretary of labor may detail and transport to any state, district, county or city in the United States, such number of members of said army as such state, district, county or city may apply for, to be employed on state, district, county or city works, and they shall perform labor for such state, district, county or city, receiving the same wages and being under the same restrictions and authority as though they labored for the United States, and in such cases the said state, district, county or city shall pay to the United States the wages earned by the members of said industrial army so detailed. The United States shall in all cases be responsible to the members of the industrial army for the full amount of their wages.

Section 25. No member of the industrial army legally qualified to vote shall be disfranchised by reason of his being a member of said army, nor lose his residence on account of his enlistment from the place of his enlistment, if he had attained a residence there prior to his going into the army, but all members applying for the privilege shall be granted ten days' absence on furlough by the industrial captain, to attend elections as follows, to-wit: Five clear days immediately preceding all national and state elections, and five days immediately after said elections to the end that he may, if he so desires, proceed to his place of residence and cast his ballot at said election. The said member of the industrial army thus accepting said furlough of ten days shall be paid his usual cash wage in full for the said ten days' absence, but the government shall be responsible for no expense incurred for his board, lodging or transportation to and from his home to attend said election.

Section 26. It shall be the duty of the secretary of labor to make an annual report to the President on the 1st day of February of each year, in which he shall set forth in detail a statement showing the number of enlistments and re-enlistments made in the industrial army; also the number of discharges therefrom, the amount of money expended for wages paid, the members of said army, from what states and districts the recruits were taken, their nativity, length of residence in the United States; also a complete exhibit of labor performed, at what places, on what works and the total value of the same during the calendar year ending December 31 preceding the date of said report.

Section 27. The President of the United States, on the recommendation of the secretary of labor, shall, if necessary to keep the industrial army constantly employed, purchase in the name of the United States farming lands, railways, manufactories, coal mines, oil and steel plants or other industrial enterprises of public utility. All expenditures provided for in this act shall be paid out of the treasury of the United States.

Section 28. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Section 29. This act shall be in force and take effect on the 1st of January after its passage.

Note by the Author.

The statement has been made on good authority that now in times of profound peace, it is costing the United States six hundred millions of dollars annually to maintain our army and navy. We are expending in the construction of war ships alone $30,000,000 a year. What is Uncle Sam doing for the unemployed, of which there are all the time several millions? Nothing. I propose that the Congress create and maintain an industrial army as well as a military one. The military army brings in no income. The industrial army would provide employment for every jobless man and woman, prevent untold poverty, misery, suffering and crime, and would not only save the nation $600,000,000, which it costs to maintain our army and navy, but create that amount of wealth and much more, for the nation.

The labor of this vast army of workingmen, now lost, would be utilized and saved. Vagrancy, tramping and begging by able-bodied men would be lessened, for when men are well fed and housed and kept busy they are not inclined to violate law. There would be much less crime. Courts would have little to do, and the jails would have few inmates.

Surplus labor would be taken from the labor market, and other workingmen would receive better wages on account of the competition being less intense. The labor of the industrial army, expended on the public works of the United States and on the highways of the states, counties and cities would make this country famous for the excellency of those evidences of civilization.

Great sections of arid lands would be irrigated, canals would be dug, overflowing rivers dyked, harbors deepened, ships for commerce builded and prosperity nation-wide would prevail.

To the objection that it is not right to tax the rich for the benefit of the poor, let it be said that the history of the rise and fall of ancient nations teaches those who read aright this lesson—that great wealth having concentrated in the hands of the few produced such an unequal condition of society that one class rolled in opulence and luxury, while the other dragged through a mortal existence in squalor and wretchedness, and that these conditions went from bad to worse till the despondent poor, starving and maddened, rose up and despoiled the rich, and the government was destroyed and civilization greatly retarded. Even in this grand young republic the indications are not lacking that we are following in the footsteps of ancient nations that went to ruin from the causes alluded to. There is great destitution in the land and a growing discontent. Labor-saving machinery, trusts and great aggregations of wealth in the hands of a few have made it difficult for the workingman to live.

It has been stated that every year the terms of imprisonment of hundreds and thousands of convicts expire, and the men are discharged and sent adrift. They feel disgraced; the world looks upon them with suspicion; they are without money and courage; statistics show that a large per cent of them become either confirmed vagrants or desperate criminals. The government should aid these unfortunates in their efforts to reform. Make this bill a law and the ex-convicts would go into the industrial army and a great majority of them would become industrious, good citizens; the business of the criminal courts would be greatly lessened, and the state would get the benefit of the labor of many thousand men now lost. It would seem to be the part of wisdom for the rich and prosperous to give their assent to so reasonable a law, which would give employment to the despondent unemployed, rather than to go on heedlessly amassing mountains of wealth with the delusive idea that they are entitled to all the fruits of the labor of others that they can, by hook or crook, possess themselves of without actually violating the statute law, and that the destitution and misery of their fellow-man is no concern of theirs. The interests of the whole human family are indissolubly linked together. There are great national industrial and political storms sometimes as well as destructive atmospheric cyclones.

PEACE CONFERENCE BURLESQUES.

It may be that the various trust investigations that have been successively staged for the last twenty years or so cannot be surpassed for farcical asininity, but at least they have a close second, if not an equal rival, in the so-called peace conferences that are held from time to time.

The other day one of these burlesques was staged in St. Louis, with Carnegie in the rôle of leading clown. Andrew began, as usual, by declaring that war was practically impossible; that the nations were almost within sight of the goal of permanent peace, and that to Wilson and his administration would fall the glory of establishing world peace, definitely and permanently.

The safest life for a young man, he declared, was enlistment in the army or navy. Industrial workers ran far greater risks to life and limb than the soldier or marine, who in the future would have nothing to do but parade. The military profession today was the freest of all from danger of violent death.

This lets Andrew out from those ugly charges of furnishing rotten armor plate to the navy, for, if it is never to be tested in battle, a few hundred blowholes more or less are of no consequence. The fact that more men have been killed in his establishments in making it than will ever be killed in fighting from behind it is of course merely a feature of the inevitable risks of industry.

And while Andrew was emitting these sounds from his blowhole, Wilson was warning California against the danger of involving the United States in a war with Japan, Austria was threatening Montenegro with war, and all the great nations of Europe, armed to the teeth, were watching keenly the developments in the Balkans, where within the last few months 150,000 soldiers have died violent deaths on the battlefield. All these things, to say nothing of the 500,000 men who lost their lives on land and sea in the recent war between Japan and Russia, seemed as if they were not, as if they had never occurred in the mind of this fatuous old man.

To a questioner who asked about Japan, he replied that Japan had nineteen battleships and the United States had thirty-three, and more coming, thus suddenly switching to the point of view of the jingoes, who assert that peace can only be assured by the possession of a stronger navy than the other fellow, an interesting illustration of how extremes meet, and both the pacifist and the jingo ultimately reach the same viewpoint.

One jingo, who declared that the United States was "in mortal terror of Japan," was promptly squelched by Andrew calling on all the delegates who weren't in mortal terror to stand up, and practically the whole body, 1,500 in number, rose to their feet. "There," exclaimed Andrew triumphantly after exhibiting "the United States" to his challenger, "you see, nobody is in mortal terror but you." The jingo at once subsided in the face of this material proof of bravery.

Carnegie was to have presided at an afternoon meeting in which the question of disarmament was to have been discussed, but was so exhausted with his morning effort that he had to pass it up, so the entertainment closed with the morning session.

These peace conferences, however, are beginning to drag and stale on the public, and are fast losing their power both as an attraction and as a method of keeping great men like Carnegie in the spotlight. There has been a little too much of them, and the fooling, though excellent in its way, is becoming rather wearisome. Something new is wanted.

A newer and more spectacular stunt could be devised by taking advantage of the dancing mania now prevalent. Carnegie, in full Highland costume, doing the turkey trot in a fashionable cabaret, in the character, say, of "The Universal Peace Kid," might get off to a new start, and considerably improve the attractive features of his entertainment. Suitable "topical" songs could easily be provided, and the effect on peace of the world not diminished in the least, nor the actual folly of the whole proceeding visibly increased.—New York Call.

THE PATRIOTISM OF PROFIT.

The profit system knows no Fatherland! Ever since the rise to domi- e of the bourgeois, it has been their custom to disregard everything in their mad race for profits. Indeed, when it suited their purposes best, they were ever ready to plunge their beloved country into a disastrous war. In order to enrich the merchant class, the United States was plunged into a war with Spain. England sacrificed some of her noblest sons to fight the Boers, and for a purely commercial reason. In every country the same has been true.

Dr. Karl Liebknecht in the German Reichstag, exposed modern patriotism when he disclosed the fact that the hostility between France and Germany had been caused by the manufacturers of munitions of war, who, through a bought press, sent out war scares, bribed officials of the War Department and in other ways sought to create a favorable public opinion for larger appropriations for war purposes. More money spent preparing for war means more men in the field, more guns and more powder to be purchased and consequently more profits for the coffers of the cannon and powder kings.

It is a cold-blooded, brutal business. But "business is business," and knows no country. It makes little difference to the capitalist where his money comes from, nor does he concern himself with the fact that to enrich him, a whole nation groans under the burden of excessive taxes for war purposes. Business for the munition manufacturers is best when war threatens a country. And so, when natural causes fail, artificial measures are employed to stir up hatred and strife.

Socialists have always pointed out the economic basis of war. They have shown how, in their search for foreign markets, to dispose of their surplus goods, the commercial interests demand wars. In the German exposé, a direct connection between selling products and creating war sentiment has been clearly shown. France and Germany are in a turmoil over the disclosures. Let us hope that it will make the great mass of people clearly see the revolting cruelty of the whole capitalist system of profit taking.

We do not nor can we blame the Krupp officials. They did what every business concern is doing—trying to create a market to dispose of their wares. Herr Von Reventlow, the famous naval, military and political authority, admitted this when he said, "What the Krupps stooped to is only what is done in every industry." Thus we see the connection between business and war. Capitalism, the mother of a thousand evils, is responsbile. The incentive to make money is the compelling force that has no regard for national boundaries or even for religions. Only by the abolition of capitalism will we abolish war—for, by the immutable law of cause and effect, remove capitalism and the need for war will have vanished.—New Times.

DOING THE DIRTY WORK.

Need Not Worry the Anti-Socialists—Many Are Qualifying for It Right Now.

"Who will do the dirty work under Socialism?" is a question frequently put to Socialist orators.

Who, I would like to know, does the dirty work under capitalism? Let us see. They are: The tradesman, who, in order to maintain his profits, adulterates his food products to the danger of the public health. Is not that dirty work?

The journalist, who, in order to earn his bread, is compelled to express views to which he is opposed. Is not that dirty work?

The doctor who retards the recovery of his patient in order to prolong his visits and increase his fees. Is not that dirty work?

The schoolmaster who fills the heads of his pupils with a heap of balderdash, which stultifies their minds and prevents them from thinking. Is not that dirty work?

The parson who teaches his flock to be satisfied with the places in life to which they have been called, blinding them to their real interests. Is not that dirty work?

The patent medicine manufacturer who sells a worthless compound which he guarantees a cure for all ills that flesh is heir to. Is not that dirty work?

The lawyer who bleeds his trustful client ignorant of the ways of the law. It not that dirty work?

The member of Parliament, who, having at election time posed as a Democrat, supports only legislation in the interests of his own class and against that of the people he is supposed to represent. Is not this dirty work?

The newspaper folk who in their columns praise commodities they know to be worthless in return for an advertisement order. Is not that dirty work?

The wretched blackleg, who, himself, on the verge of starvation, helps to frustrate the just agitation of his fellow-workingmen for higher wages and better conditions of labor. Is not that dirty work?

The prostitute who, debarred from all honest means of supporting herself, is compelled to sell her body in the street. Is not that dirty work?

The judge who passes a heavy sentence on his prisoner who has committed a theft in order to save his wife and children from hunger. Is not that dirty work?

The workgirl, who, on pain of dismissal, sacrifices her honor at the bidding of her vicious employer. Is not that dirty work?

The plausible and unscrupulous company promoter whose speculations by robbing them of their hard-won savings, brings countless families to ruin. Is not that dirty work?

The theatrical manager who, for the sake of lucre, produces plays which he knows to be a perversion of truth? Is not that dirty work?

The soldier, who otherwise unable to maintain himself, has to take part in a war which he knows to be unjust. Is not that dirty work?

And so on ad infinitum.

Who is there, I ask, who under capitalism does not do dirty work?—Herbert, in the Labor Leader, Great Britain.

PEACE! PEACE!

The President and his Cabinet have been devoting their several talents to the framing of a diplomatic reply to the Japanese protest against the action of the Legislature of California in excluding certain aliens from the privilege of owning land in that state in contravention of the Japanese interpretation of the existing treaty between the two governments.

There has been an international peace conference in session at St. Louis. In New York, a committee, with the "Godspeed" of the administration at Washington and the blessing of eminent churchmen, has been arranging to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of uninterrupted peace between the United States and Great Britain.

On every hand we find the proponents of peace active to prevent a clash of arms between nations. But while they cry "peace!" abroad there is strife within their own household, to which they pay no heed. The press dispatches have told briefly, and without emphasis upon the facts, that in the state of West Virginia the constitution and the laws have been suspended and a military dictatorship established. Citizens have been tried by drumhead courtmartial and sentenced to the penitentiary; the liberty of the press has been overthrown and the state completely Russianized. We quote from a Huntington dispatch under date of May 9th to the Free Press:

"Members of the National Guard today raided the newspaper plant of the Socialist-Labor Star and arrested the editor, W. J. Thompson, and his two assistants, Elmer Rumble and W. H. Gillespie. The newspaper recently attacked Governor Hatfield in connection with the coal strike difficulties."

The constitution of the United States guarantees to every state a republican form of government. The constitution itself is supreme in every state. Yet what are the facts? The government of West Virginia is as despotic and as arbitrary as the government of Huerta and Diaz in the City of Mexico —a government which the administration at Washington refuses to recognize, while it tolerates the government set up by the mine-owning oligarchy in West Virginia in defiance of the constitution that the workers must be held in the virtual slavery against which they have revolted.

Mr. Bryan, who once protested that "you shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns!" is silent. President Wilson is writing magazine articles on the "New Freedom" and protesting that we shall have no "masters." Congress is in session and has voted that funds which never have been used to prosecute workingmen under the provisions of the anti trust law, shall not be so used in the life of the appropriation. But no voice has been raised against the overthrow of constitutional government in West Virginia and no sign made that these men, who profess to be inspired by the spirit of Thomas Jefferson, purpose to make any move to secure the striking miners of West Virginia and their sympathizers and supporters in their constitutional rights and establish a republican form of government, as they are under solemn oath to do when once it shall be subverted in any state of the American union. It still makes a difference whose ox is gored.—Milwaukee Leader.

MOST ABSOLUTE ATHEISM.

George D. Herron in May Metropolitan.

There can be no true understanding of Socialism apart from the recognition that society, by the system of social production for private profit, is divided into two classes, engaged in perpetual war with each other; one a producing and the other an exploiting class. Substantially stated, the present organization of the world is in order that a comparatively few may compel the labor of the many, and appropriate its fruits. Existing political institutions have no other end than this private seizure of social production, over and above the lowest scale of living which labor can be coerced into accepting. That the capitalist works, does not argue against the existence of his class. Or that the ruler works, does not argue against the parasitical nature of his position. The work of the capitalist consists in the exploitation of the real producer; the work of the ruler consists in the defense of the property of the capitalist — without which capitalist the ruler could not be. And between the workers and the class that possesses itself of their product, there can be neither identity of interest nor social peace.

Nor ought there to be. It is an utterly irrational and immoral society, an insanely wasteful industrial arrangement, by which the bulk of the world's population is engaged in producing wealth it is never to enjoy. It is really a world of slaves we are living in; and freedom, either of labor or spirit, is a fiction. Free labor and free men have no existence apart from a community of ownership and interest in production. As the work of the world is now carried on, the production of things proceeds through the destruction of human beings, soul and body. And to close our eyes to this, to consent to a society that divides mankind into owners and workers, masters and servants, rich and poor, governors and governed, is indeed a hopeless infidelity toward life; is the most absolute atheism of which man can be guilty.

POVERTY NO LONGER NECESSARY.

Cause of Misery Lies Not With Nature, But With Capitalist Ownership of Industry.

Looking for work is a queer thing to do when work is all around. There are acres of idle land everywhere calling for labor that they may yield their increase, and tools are here in abundance. "Why don't the unemployed take them and cut down the forests that the Creator has placed here for the satisfaction of mankind, and build homes there to enjoy the blessings of life and be happy?"

You are hungry? Well, the land from which all food is produced is here. and here also are the forces of nature that the genius of man has controlled to quicken into life the wonderful machines built by the man in overalls that enable you to produce in such abundance. They are your heritage from the culture of the ages and the machines that you workers built belong to you, the builders. You need boots and shoes. Countless cattle roam the prairies; they are for the use of man; take them and put their hides on the vessels you have built, convey them to the cities where men do most congregate and build their factories to fashion them into the things that you desire.

Use the land that the Creator has placed here for all the children of men and build houses and railroads, that you may exchange with your brothers the thing that each produces and the other needs for the advantage of all; but don't weary yourselves looking for work when all the resources and all the things you need to work are before and around you in abundance.

Nature is plethoric. She runs riot in abundance, and wastes in disuse more than enough to feed the world. "Scarcity of work." There is no scarcity in nature, and man is ever unsatisfied and always willing to labor to satisfy his desire. And there is no scarcity of tools. Machines are rusting and factories are stopped while men are unemployed and hungry. So it is not the fault of labor and it is not the fault of tools. The fault is that men and women have not access to the tools and land by which they earn their living. They cannot nowadays use their own tools and dispose of the finished product to the consumer. That is a back number. Those days are gone forever, and a better, because more efficient, method is ours. We produce socially the things we need, so we must go socially and take them that we may use them again together and exchange fairly the products of labor, so that unemployment and poverty shall cease and abundance and happiness shall reign in place of misery and hunger; and the children on the green earth, which is their birthright, shall have opportunity to grow more beautiful, more pure and strong, and mankind shall dwell together in justice and peace and in the prosperity and happiness of all.—Norman Daxbury, in Brewery Workers' Journal.

POETICAL

COULD LOVE BUT RULE.

Martha Shepard Lippincott.

"Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless thousands mourn."
How true these words have proved to be:
How many made forlorn.
How lack of love and charity
Have filled the world with woe.
O! would that men would ever learn
Christ's mercy, sweet, to know!

How souls so innocent of crime
Have such injustice known,
And those who held controlling hand
So little mercy shown.
'Tis sad how avarice and greed
Have so much sorrow brought,
When all might be such happiness
Were Christ's sweet lessons taught.

O! when shall love e'er rule the world,
And make life sweet, indeed,
To fill our lives with peace and joy
And blessings that we need?
When shall man's inhumanity
To kindness e'er be changed,
So that for love and happiness
Our lives may be arranged?

TO WEED CALIFORNIA.

They live in a company house;
They trade at a company store;
Whenever these poor slaves dance
It must be on a company floor.
They sleep in company cots;
They wash in company tubs;
The company is so "good"—
Say these poor, helpless dubs.
Their wives are company too;
They wash for company men;
They go to church, to be sure;
They all have company sin.
The preacher is company too;
He trades at the company store:
He gets the best they have—
He's never in debt—what's more.
They read the company Press;
They believe in the Stripes and the Stars;
The sheriff comes out with a club
And lands them behind the bars.
The company owns the school;
The teacher is company too;
She works to get her pay—
What else is a teacher to do?
No meetings are held in the street;
No meetings are held in the shop.
Company mules like work;
Why should the dollars stop?
The slave-drivers whip their mules;
The whistle has beat the lash,
And tho' they work from sun to sun,
They never have any cash.

FIVE DOLLARS A WEEK.

By Herbert Kauffman.

Thus is it down on Beelzebub's books:
"August the seventeenth — Isabel Brooks;
Blonde, splendid figure; big violet eyes;
Dimples; fair coloring; feet of small size;
Home in the country; her parents quite poor;
Character excellent; morals still pure;
Came to the city today and found work;
Wages five dollars; department clerk."
Wages five dollars! To last seven days!
Three for a miserable hallroom she pays;
Two nickels daily the street car receives;
One dollar forty for eating that leaves.
One-forty has such a long ways to reach —
Twenty-one banquets at seven cents each.
There! Every penny of wage has been spent —
Squandered for feasting and riding and rent.
Spendthrift. She doesn't remember life's ills.
How in the world will she pay doctor's bills?
What if she's furloughed (there's always a chance)?
Isabel ought to save up in advance.
Hold! We've not mentioned her clothes; she must wear
Dresses, hats, shoes, stockings, ribbons for hair—
How did she get them? Suppose that we stop.
Perhaps it's well if we let the thing drop.
You good mathmaticians may figure it out;
It's a matter of figures or figure, no doubt.
Carry this picture; it's better, I'm sure:
"Character excellent, morals still pure."
What else is written we won't try to see;
Beelzebub thinks much the same as we.
Why, as I live! There's a tear in his eye!
What in Hell can make Beelzebub cry?
Surely the devil is feeling his age;
Look what he's writing on Isabel's page:
"Virtue's a luxury hard to afford
When a girl hasn't money enough for her board."

TRIM YOUR LAMP ON THE ALTAR.

William. E. Hanson. Butte, Montana.

Trim the lamp on the altar of Reason,
That its rays may pierce through the night,
That for thousands of years has flourished,
And has given "priestcraft" its might.
Your minds have been bound and fettered
By submission and blind belief,
Like sheep have been led to the slaughter,
Believed it "sin," if ye sought relief.

These men who call themselves "holy"
Have enslaved your reason for gain,
Have made you believe in a Heaven,
And to which you aspire in vain.
But, if you suffer and labor,
While they flourish in comfort on earth,
They promise you "glory eternal"
And a new and sinless birth.

They have made you believe in a "Something,"
Of which they know nothing at all.
They have clouded your longing and senses
With a sombre and funeral pall;
They have fed you on rank superstition,
Have perverted the teachings of God.
They claim a power Almighty,
And traffic on those 'neath the sod.

They claim the Creator has called them
To preach of "His Saving Grace."
How do they know that it was His voice,
Did they speak to Him, face to face?
If He gave to them His orders,
Tells them what is His will,
Why do they prey on our scanty wage;
Why does not God pay the bill?

This greedy horde have ye feasted
And clothed them in fine array,
Have housed them in princely splendor,
For 'tis ye who have always to pay.
Trim the lamp on the Altar of Reason,
Turn this priest-haunted night into day;
Tell this celibate horde "they must labor,"
Instead of on ignorance prey.

Trust not in the words they utter;
No God ever made their laws.
Like Minotaurs, they are greedy,
For wealth for their insatiable maws.
Their vaunted religion and power,
Which they ever have used as a lash,
Amounts to just this, and they know it:
"Dimes and dollars," but all "COLD CASH."

LAWS DIVINE?

W. E. Hanson, Butte, Montana.

Oh, holy man, with tonsured head,
Will you answer the questions I ask?
As you and my Father in Heaven are friends,
'Tis your duty as well as your task.
Why has He ordained that you live in ease,
While I shovel and muck in the mine;
You wear broadcloth, while I wear jeans;
Is that one of His laws divine?

Your bed is luxurious; I have a cot.
You live in a realm of cheer;
You sip the very choicest of wine;
I am lucky to have common beer.
And one other fact I wish to impress:
You're an epicure when you dine.
I dig down in my tin dinner pail;
Is that one of His laws divine?

By church law you are my Father on Earth,
And He is my Father in Heaven;
Two fathers so blind to their son in distress,
To whom nothing ever is given.
You preach submission and patience to me,
For a price, give a blessing benign,
Which you can withhold if I have not the price.
Is that one of His laws divine?

You claim to represent Christ on earth,
Who had but one garment to wear;
You wear purple and linen and golden weaves,
Soft tissues and laces rare.
Your round, sleek faces and soft white hands
Of worry and work show no sign,
While mine are blistered, knotty and red.
Is that one of His laws divine?

Year in, year out, I slave and toil,
An honest existence to make;
I must pray while you prey, be content,
While most of my earnings you take.
For the Father above, with all His love,
But of which I see never a sign,
Says I must be content with my station in life.
Is that one of His laws divine?

From cover to cover "The Book" I have read,
And I find that your words are not true.
You are teaching a creed that is cruel, unjust;
I'm no longer submissive to you.
I smile at your ranting, your "power" I scorn,
Though my soul to hell you consign,
I have faith in a cause that is real and right,
And a law that is ever divine.

STAY AWAY FROM PORCUPINE, ONTARIO!

STAY AWAY FROM BINGHAM, Utah. No worker but a traitor will take the place of a striker!

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

NOTICE.

Miners should keep away from the Tintic mining District. The camps are over-run with idle men, 300 being out of work at the present time. Keep away, as you simply work a hardship on the men who are at work and the local union.

Stay away from Britannia mines, Howe Sound, B. C. The strike is still on.

PRESIDENT MOYER left for Utah and California last Sunday to visit some of the local unions and will return to headquarters after surveying the strike situation at El Paso, Texas.

THE COLORADO LEGISLATURE has repealed the obnoxious anti-boycott law, which was passed by the politicians several years ago in the hope of demolishing organized labor.—Cleveland Citizen

Yes, but the governor, the "friend of labor," vetoed the bill passed by the Legislature, thus showing that one man as chief magistrate of a state, has more power in his hands than the majority of a legislative body, and yet, we boast of our representative government.

A LOCAL of the I. W. W. at Salt Lake, Utah, has resolved itself into an employment agency and placed an advertisement on a billboard, stating that 100 miners and 300 muckers are wanted at Butte, Montana. The statement is a cold-blooded and deliberate falsehood manufactured out of whole cloth for an ulterior purpose. There are no miners or muckers wanted at Butte, as there are a large surplus of idle men seeking employment there, and the statement of the I. W. W. at Salt Lake is a lie as infamous as other tactics and methods utilized by the "Bummery."

WANTED.

Copies of The Miners' Magazine are wanted of the following dates of issue: Dec. 9, 1909; Dec. 23, 1909; Dec. 30, 1909; Jan. 6, 1910; Feb. 3, 1910; Feb. 10, 1910; March 10, 1910; March 17, 1910; March 24, 1910; March 23, 1911; March 30, 1911; Apr. 20, 1911; Aug. 17, 1911; Aug. 24, 1911.

Any parties having copies of The Magazine of the above dates will do the Western Federation of Miners a favor by forwarding same to Ernest Mills, 605 Railroad Building, Denver, Colorado.

FROM THE TOMBS of the political past come doleful wailings. "Uncle Joe" Cannon of Illinois sees the country headed for perdition because of the Initiative and Referendum; "Fire Alarm" Foraker of Ohio, once chief flapper of the "Bloody Shirt," warns us that the Initiative and Referendum will carry the country to ruin and to "dangerous Socialism." Professor Taft of Yale sees the Initiative and Referendum dragging the country down-grade to disaster.

Men who live in the past are interesting merely as curiosities. Instead of using the past as a teacher, a guide for future action, they would use it as a penitentiary in which to imprison The People.—The Star, San Francisco.

WE HAVE BEEN TOLD for many years, that there is a vice trust in every large city of America, and that the profits of this trust throughout the United States, reach the enormous sum of $50,000,000 annually.

The reformers have been denouncing such a trust and have used the strongest words of condemnation, but regardless of condemnation the trust continues to flourish.

The reformers in fighting the vice trust, are but fighting an effect which is bred from a cause.

When the reformers use as much energy in fighting the cause as they do now in fighting the effect, the vice trust will go out of business.

AT WHARTON, NEW JERSEY, the people have been given an insight into the degeneracy and brutality of the thugs hired by corporations to uphold the majesty of the law.

The Empire Steel and Iron Company has been doing business with the detective agencies, and these agencies have furnished the necessary number of out-laws to create a reign of terror, and then, accuse the strikers of the crimes and lawlessness committed by veteran criminals trained to fasten odium on honest men battling for a living wage.

The thugs and strikebreakers imported to Wharton were gathered from the slums of the state of New York and New Jersey, and their insults to girls and women became so shameless, that even the citizens, not directly connected with the strike, were forced to arm themselves to defend the honor of their wives and daughters.

Capitalism in its greed for profit stops at nothing to hold labor in the shackles of wage slavery.

ONE BY ONE the good men fall—to paraphrase an old song. The latest is Dr. Chas. P. Neill, for many years United States Commissioner of Labor, who has resigned to become an employé of the Guggenheims. Dr. Neil has been distinguished amongst prominent men for his consideration for the rights of labor and his employment by the Guggenheims can only mean they have found the easiest way to limit his usefulness.—Seattle Union Record.

Dr. Charles P. Neill has been moved by what he conceived to be his material interests. Neill was not a member of organized labor, but was a professional man, whose political pull secured him an official position at Washington. He has not fallen and was under no obligations to labor to stay at Washington. Neill, like many others, whom labor has lauded as good men are influenced by economic interests, and Neill in accepting the position offered by the Smelting Trust, reached the conclusion that he was advancing his personal interests.

The Guggenheims wanted him, because he demonstrated that he was brilliant and clever enough to delude labor into the belief, that he was friendly to the working class. The polished and cultured dissembler is always looked upon as a valuable asset to capitalism, when such dissembler can hide from labor the fact that he is an ally of the forces that crush labor.

THE MERCHANTS AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION is greatly distressed for fear that labor unions and agricultural organizations shall be exempted from the penalties of the anti-trust law. It calls such exemption "class legislation."

The Merchants and Manufacturers' Association has fallen into a conventional error. The "class legislation" was enacted by the Supreme Court when it made the law applicable to these associations, in spite of the fact that such was not the intent of its authors.

The anti-trust law, when it was pending in Congress, received the support of such labor leaders as Mr. Gompers, and of the agricultural interests. It was certainly not their purpose that the law should be used against them. It could not have been passed if there had been any intimation that it was designed to do more than to prohibit monopolies in the products of labor and in the instruments of production.

If Congress shall exclude labor unions and agricultural associations from the operations of the anti-trust law, which it has partly done, it will simply reiterate the original intent of the Sherman act and recall judicial decisions which were inspired by the same class interests that led an English court to send the "six men of Dorset" to penal servitude for having organized to exact higher wages from their masters.—Milwaukee Leader.

SOME of the strike-breaking agencies around the country are starting up side lines now, in connection with their nefarious business, a side line that, while the most disreputable in which a man can engage, yet one that harmonizes perfectly with the strike breaking end of the business. Some of these agencies have been sending outlaws and newly arrived immigrants down into the wilds of West Virginia, to help the coal barons down there break the strike of the mine workers, and now one, Harry Kulp, belonging to one of these thug agencies, has been convicted in a United States court for violation of the White Slave Law. It was proven that he went around through the mountains of Pennsylvania, and engaged girls for domestic service in hotels in West Virginia, but all who fell for him were shipped to the hovels of these strike breakers, down in the backwoods of West Virginia.—The Lather.

Men who have observed all the outrages perpetrated by capitalism will manifest no surprise in knowing that strike-breaking agencies are engaged in the business of white slavery.

The detective agency stops at nothing to "deliver the goods."

The capitalist, who is the paymaster and furnishes the funds to maintain these agencies, places no restrictions on his hired outlaws, whose memories have become callous to the remembrances of a mother or a sister. The degenerate on the payroll of a detective agency has neither heart, soul or conscience, and his employer knows no God save profit.

GOVERNOR SULZER of New York vetoed the Foley Workmen's Compensation bill. The bill was supported by the Causality insurance Companies, the employers and the Civic Federation.

The Foley Compensation bill was vigorously opposed by organized labor, but the lawmakers dominated by employers and corporations were in the majority and voted for a bill that was drawn in such a manner that its passage would give but little relief to the working class.

Governor Sulzer in vetoing the bill, said:

"To my mind "a workmen's compensation law which fails to inspire the confidence of the industrial toilers for whom it is enacted, and which meets with their vigorous and emphatic protest, cannot be said to be an adequate performance of the party pledge. From the outset the bill now before me met with serious opposition from those who are most vitally interested in securing the benefits designed to accrue from legislation of this character. The measure is opposed by the State Federation of Labor and the American Association of Labor Legislation and other true friends of these necessary remedial industrial reforms."

Provision has been made by the legislature for a constitutional amendment and will be submitted to the voters of New York for approval next November.

This amendment will make it possible for the laboring people of New York to reach a real, genuine compensation law during the year 1914.

IT WOULD SEEM that if there were any truth in the oft-reiterated statement that "any man that wants work can get it," should be to some extent apparent when the hateful and degrading occupation of strikebreakers is called for. But even here the assurance fails. So wolfish is the struggle for existence that men often have to fight like wild animals to secure that debasing work.

The other day one of the strike-breaking agencies here advertised for hands to take the places of the striking street car employés at Cincinnati, and the next morning the street was blocked by thousands of applicants, so eager to secure the jobs that they smashed the doors and windows of the buildings, trampled one another on the stairways, cursing yelling and fighting until the police reserves were called to disperse the rioters. For one man who succeeded in securing a place as a strikebreaker, ten went away disappointed.

Probably among the horde of "heroes" as President Eliot once called them, there were many criminals, toughs, thugs and gunmen well known to the police, though, as they were intended to be let loose on Cincinnati, there was no reason for interfering with their departure. It is also likely that this element secured most of the jobs that were given out on the occasion.

But it is practically certain that the majority were ordinary workingmen driven desperate from hunger through long unemployment. And every one of these wretched unfortunates who secured a job may be considered as having made a start training for a future career of crime. In Cincinnati these men will fight even more desperately to hold the jobs they secured than they did to get them in New York, and will be encouraged by the authorities to stop at nothing short of murder to do so.

Striker and strikebreaker are equally proofs of the criminal insanity of our industrial system. A system that not only generates but encourages conditions which transform masses of human beings into things resembling the composition of a famished wolf-pack has no right to existence, and the greatest crime conceivable against humanity is not capitalism itself, but rather the ignorance that prevents it being swept forever from the face of the earth.—New York Call.

HOW WILLIAM E. TRAUTMANN, one of the founders and general secretary of the I. W. W., has dug up his little hatchet and gone upon the war path. In a lengthy signed article in the New York Call, using as a text the charges that have been made by responsible parties in San Diego that the "free speech fight" in that city had been utilized by I. W. W. officials to graft funds from sympathizers, Trautmann warns the public that the present "free speech fight" in Denver is being "pulled off by those who never will work, who will always be there when the general secretary and the general organizer of the Industrial Workers of the World call for volunteers, to live on the funds collected for the support of real militants and struggling toilers." Trautmann then proceeds to relate his own experience in the Lawrence affair, prompted to do so by the fact that "a clear explanation can never be obtained by an appeal to the centralized official and publicity organs of the Industrial Workers of the World." In assuming the secretaryship of the Ettor-Giovannitti defense fund, Trautmann declares that thousands of dollars had been misused to support the hordes of "volunteers" who flocked to that city and only $85 remained on hand with which to defend the indicted men. Nine specific charges made against those who previously handled the fund were suppressed "by telegraphic order from the general office of the Industrial Workers of the World" and the original cash book was also destroyed. Trautmann succeeded in bringing some sort of order out of chaos and gave a public accounting of the funds he handled. Evidently his disgust was so great that he declined to again accept an official position in the I. W. W., gave his reasons in an article to be published in the two official organs, but his communication was also suppressed. Trautmann is still a member of the I. W. W., but his attack upon St. John, Heslewood and other officials can have no other result than his early expulsion. With a few exceptions, none of the original organizers of the I W. W. remain, and if it were not for the personality of Haywood—who, as he says himself, was saved from sleeping in a bed of quick lime by the organized workers of America, the same workers whose unions he is now condemning and attempting to destroy—that ill-fated body would no longer be in existence. The prineiples of industrial unionism are fundamental and existed long before the I. W. W. was dreamed of, but the methods of that organization are not only wrong, but positively injurious to the workers, and hence the I. W. W. cannot become permanent, as their failures in Spokane, McKees Rocks, Lawrence, San Diego, Little Falls, Akron and other places where they had a strong foothold prove beyond a doubt.—Cleveland Citizen.

"Equal Rights Before the Law"

ORGANIZER LEWIS of the American Federation of Labor, in writing of his experience among the steel workers, relates the following:

"At our McKees Rocks meeting, recently held in the Heien Street theater, we were treated to a striking demonstration of the attitude of the Pressed Steel Car Company toward our efforts to organize its employés. At 7:30 o'clock the manager of the plant whose name I understand is McKee, appeared in front of the theater with fifteen members of the company's police force from the car plant, who were former members of the state constabulary, and also ten detectives, together with fifteen or eighteen of the mill foremen, in all making a force of about forty men, who were fully armed. These men stationed themselves in line on the opposite side of the street with the intention, I suppose, of intimidating the workers by this display of force. A crowd soon gathered on the street, about 150 of whom entered the hall and remained throughout the meeting, the remainder thronging the street before the entrance to the theater. A captain of police with a squad of patrolmen was stationed between the crowd and the armed force from the Pressed Steel Car Company's plant. No effort was made, however, to disperse the crowd of armed men, and although the weather was cold, they remained until the meeting adjourned. Finding that in spite of this display of force the workmen from the plant to a goodly number had entered the hall, the emissaries of the company, in their desperation, cut the electric wires leading into the theater, plunging the theater into darkness. The men remained, however, until candles were procured and the meeting was proceeded with. This incident served to bring forcibly to the workmen the methods employed by their employers, and was responsible for many additions to the union which has been established among the men. Dissatisfaction is rife, and the pursuance of the tactics related is assisting in bringing the workmen employed by the company into the union."

The above report from an organizer of the American Federation of Labor, proves conclusively that men clothed with economic power can sneer at law and make a farce of our so called constitutional rights.

Had the working class of McKees Rocks gathered, 40 men armed to the teeth, there is no one who would doubt but that officers sworn to uphold the law would have immediately issued orders for them to disperse, and in all probability, they would have been arrested and charged with the crime of inciting a riot. But these 40 men were the private army of the steel trust, and thugs armed by a trust or corporation, must not be molested when working men assemble to join hands in an organization that has for its object the advancement or promotion of the interests of labor. Capitalism can arm itself to subjugate the working class, but labor in its desperation and wretchedness, must seize no weapons of violence to defend itself against the despotism of a master class.

The Convicted Iron Workers

By Eugene V. Debs.

THE PRESS DISPATCHES inform us that of the thirty-eight convicted officials of the iron workers' and other unions who were sentenced in the Federal Court at Indianapolis in December last, but fifteen remain in Leavenworth prison. The rest are all out under bail pending the decision of the higher court to which these cases have been appealed.:

The fifteen convicted union leaders who remain in prison are there only because they are unfortunate in having no friends of sufficient financial means to furnish their bail.

How soon, or, rather, how late, the higher court may finally decide these cases can only be conjectured. When it is considered that the Supreme Court and the several courts of appeal are from three to six years behind in "handing down" their decisions, it can readily be seen that the cases of the convicted union leaders may be hung up for an indefinite period.

But the decision will finally be rendered—if the appellants do not die in the meantime—and when it is rendered it will be, I venture to predict, in favor of the cruelly outraged labor officials. I make this prediction not because I have faith in the partiality of the court toward the defendants, or even in its sense of justice, but because the trial of these men was so flagrantly farcical and their conviction so notoriously a foregone conclusion that if the outrage is not righted by the court itself, as far as this may be possible, it will load the court with odium and damn it and discredit it eternally, when the true story of the trial is told and the hidden facts in connection with that monstrous perversion of justice are disclosed.

The purpose of this writing is to refresh the memory of the working class in regard to this trial and its thirty-eight convictions of union labor leaders, and to place a fact or two on record worth thinking about and talking about and keeping in mind until the true nature of the conspiracy which resulted in the railroading of these innocent men to the penitentiary and every secret, damnable fact in connection with that judicial crime is brought to light.

The trial took place, it will be remembered, in the court of Judge A. B. Anderson, who was appointed to the Federal bench by President Roosevelt and afterward denounced by Roosevelt as "a damned jackass and crook."

One of the defendants was sternly rebuked and threatened with a jail sentence by the judge for smiling in court.

A newspaper correspondent who commented on the proceedings in a way to displease the judge was barred from the courtroom and threatened with summary punishment for contempt.

These characteristic incidents of the trial are not without their significance.

But the great fact, the galling fact, the infamous fact about the trial is that THE SPECIAL TRAIN IN WHICH THE THIRTY-EIGHT CONVICTED LABOR UNIONISTS WERE RUSHED TO THE FEDERAL PRISON AT LEAVENWORTH WAS SPECIFICALLY CONTRACTED FOR AND DEFINITELY ENGAGED OVER A MONTH BEFORE THE JURY RENDERED ITS VERDICT.

This we know beyond doubt, having, by one of those providential leaks which always occur when innocence is bludgeoned and justice raped, come in possession of the correspondence which passed between the court officials and the officials of the railroads.

How did the court officials know positively that these thirty-eight trade unionists would be sent to the penitentiary over a month before they were tried and convicted

The trial from the time the arrests were made and the indictments found until the convicted defendants were rushed to Leavenworth by special train was not only a roaring farce but a satanic conspiracy, backed by the powerful Steel Trust, to strike a deadly blow to the labor movement.

The sacking of the offices of the iron workers' union and the seizure of papers, documents, books and papers in violation of the law and placing these in the custody of hirelings who for a consideration would pervert, pad, or mutilate them to serve the criminal purpose intended, to convict innocent men and fasten the odium of crime upon organized labor furnishes but one incident in a series of outrages and infamies perpetrated under direction of the court officials which has no parallel in the annals of criminal jurisprudence.

I knew all this before the trial occurred as well as I do now, and I urged through the Appeal to Reason and otherwise that the Socialist party and the labor unions send their own authorized representative to attend the session of the Grand Jury and the trial, to carefully follow the proceedings and prevent, if possible, this judicial crime from being perpetrated, and had this been done I verily believe that special train would never have been rushed with its living freight of innocent men to the Leavenworth prison.

IT IS MY POSITIVE CONVICTION THAT THESE THIRTY-EIGHT LABOR UNION OFFICIALS, OF WHOM FIFTEEN STILL LANGUISH IN THE PRISON PEN TO WHICH THEY WERE COMMITTED, ARE ABSOLUTELY INNOCENT OF THE CRIME FOR WHICH THEY WERE CONVICTED, and that they are the victims of a conspiracy as foul and damning as ever blackened the pages of history.

This is all for the present. More in due time.

Some day the whole truth will out. Mark it!—New York Call.

Panics Forbidden by Law

IT WILL BE REMEMBERED that when President Wilson had settled himself in the Presidential chair some three months ago, he promptly issued a warning to the effect that any one caught in the act of starting a panic during his administration would be "hanged higher than Haman," or words to that effect. The notification was evidently intended to intimidate those who, as he supposed, might take this method of objecting to his proposed tinkering with the tariff.

And now that the time draws nigh, Congress, it is said, will appropriate $100,000 to enable the Bureau of Commerce to get busy and investigate any manufacturers who may close down their plants or reduce wages for effect, in order to defeat the proposed tariff reductions.

The prosecutions which will follow any such attempt will take place under the criminal clauses of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, which has been so successful in dissolving the trusts during the Taft administration. There can be no doubt of its equal efficiency in compelling a capitalist to keep his factory running or prevent him from announcing a cut in wages. So far as $100,000 will go, the attempt will be made anyhow.

If, for the sake of argument, it be admitted that a panic is really started deliberately by individual capitalists, the question may be asked, How will an investigation avert the panic? It can only take place after the act, and it takes much time before a decision can be reached. In the meantime the factories are closed, the unemployed swarm all over the land and the panic is on anyhow. Then, again, will the capitalists who closed their factories admit that they did so on account of the proposed tariff reductions, or will they deny it and give other reasons? Or suppose they stand on their constitutional rights and maintain that they can run their factories or not as they please; that there is no law to compel them to use their property productively; that the right to close down stands on exactly the same basis as the right to open up; that the government has no more right to compel a man to stay in business than it has to forbid him to go into business; that the matter of wages is a thing mutually agreed upon between employer and employé, with which no third party has any legal right to interfere—and a hundred other considerations of the same kind?

The Wilson treaty appears ostensibly as a challenge to the whole institution of private property. Even if it were admitted that capitalists shut down for the reasons given—which they do not—there is absolutely no way of preventing them by law. No matter what pains and penalties are threatened, no man can be forced to do business if he doesn't want to, any more than he can be forced to compete against his will. The whole matter is exactly the same kind of bluff as that used against the trusts, and no capitalist need take it seriously.

The threat before election to close down if the voters sustain an industrial policy that the manufacturer is opposed to may bluff the working class voters who have jobs to lose, but a counter-threat against capitalists won't go. It is an empty bluff. It is a continuation of the pretense under which the trusts were prosecuted, that economic law is dominated by statute law, though for an apparently opposite purpose in this case. In the former the object was to put the capitalist out of business, to prohibit him from doing business; in the latter, to make him continue in business against his will. And both attempts are equally futile. The one will fail, just as the other has failed.

The capitalist is not in business primarily for the purpose of giving employment and paying wages. That is only incidental. He is in business to make profits, and when in his judgment no profits are to be made he will close down, and no power on earth can prevent him doing so, any more than he can be prevented from continuing in business when profits are in sight.

Wilson may be "a man sent by God," as some of his admirers say, but he has just as much power to prevent a panic as to fix the time of the rising and setting of the sun.—New York Call.

The People Shall Know

FROM THE PRESS DISPATCHES we have seen that "Mother" Jones addressed a large audience in Washington, D. C. The octogenarian stood before an audience for two long hours painting pictures of thug-brutality and military despotism.

It is no wonder that Governor Hatfield of West Virginia desired to keep "Mother" Jones as a military prisoner. It is not to be wondered at that the coal-barons ordered their official chattels to charge her with stealing a machine gun, and when that charge appeared ludicrous, to charge her with murder.

A charge of some character was necessary in order that she might be held by the Cossacks of West Virginia

It would not do for this woman of 80 years of age to be given her liberty, for the outlaws who yell "law and order" knew that she would take the rostrum and they knew the power of her eloquence.

Her appearance in Washington and her story told from a public platform has drawn national attention, and when the Congressional investigation is finished, West Virginia will be looked upon as the Siberia of America.

The infamies and outrages perpetrated in the name of "law and order" baffle tongue and pen for a description. Men who dared to speak for human freedom or who dared to even plead for justice, were branded as anarchists, and were met with the cowardly blows from the hired criminals of a licensed detective agency or silenced by the armed might of Military Hessians, whose officers took their orders from the managers and owners of coal mines.

For nearly a year, law has been a corpse in West Virginia.

The constitution of which we boast, was foully murdered and the flag that we hail as the standard of freedom, became the banner under which corporate tyranny assailed human rights and laughed at their victims as they protested against the merciless reign of terrorism that prevailed within the borders of a state, cursed and debauched by the masked pirates of modern brigandage. The press that spoke for the rights of man was suppressed, but now that Congress shall give attention to the mob in broad cloth in West Virginia, the people will know something of the lawlessness that has been committed by the "higher ups" who mock the agonies of their exploited victims while playing the rôle of defenders of legal and constitutional rights.

Sought Rest in Death

THE FOLLOWING STORY taken from the columns of an exchange, tells but one of the many tragedies in the lives of working women, who are the victims of an industrial system that means dishonor or premature death:

"The story of a brave but unsuccessful struggle for existence on a weekly wage of $5 was told at the Union Avenue hospital today with the announcement that Helen M. Goodridge, 18 years old, died last night from posion, self-administered.

"The girl was the daughter of Mrs. Della Goodridge, of 5444 Irving street, Philadelphia. She took rat poison and was removed to the hospital in a dying condition.

"In an ante-mortem statement to Dr. William M. Bodwell, of the hospital staff, the girl said she had been obliged to support herself since she was 14 years old. Recently she came here from Upton, Mass., where she had worked in a hat factory. She obtained employment in the paper box and crepe paper factory of the Dennison Manufacturing Company.

"Her earnings were insufficient, she said, for her support, she had 'been half-starved for weeks,' and chose to end her life rather than to continue what seemed to her a hopeless struggle.

"Miss Goodridge bore a perfect reputation, according to acquaintances. Among the effects found in her room at a lodging-house was a letter addressed to her mother and a Bible which had been presented to her as a reward by the Sunday school which she attended.

"The superintendent at the Dennison factory said the girl was employed there making paper boxes. She had been at work but a short time, he said, and like all unskilled helpers, was started at $5 a week."

The above story tells of a girl with almost all her life before her, giving up the struggle to live.

Her reputation was unsullied, but the fact that she was religious and had won a Bible from a Sunday school as a reward for her purity, did not fortify her against the merciless grip of want nor did her spotless reputation and Bible save her from that gloom of despair that sought rest in the grave of the suicide.

The death of this girl standing on the threshold of young womanhood is an awful indictment of a civilization that is upheld by press and pulpit, and shows conclusively that even faith in religion unsupported by the material things of life, cannot save the struggling victim of poverty from self destruction. The pen or tongue of man cannot portray the hopeless agony of this young girl as she brooded on the misery and wretchedness of her life, and as she reached for the poison that saved her honor, she must have felt the force of the words of the poet: "O grave where is thy victory; O death, where is thy sting."

The Persecution of the Courts

THE JUDICIAL PERSECUTION of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison, has been commented upon, not only by the labor and Socialist press, but even the capitalist journals have graced their columns with editorials on the battle in the courts against men, who felt and believed that they had a right to speak from the rostrum or through the press on matters that vitally concerned the laboring people.

Even a number of daily journals, controlled by men of power and influence in the world of commerce and finance, take the position that the action that should have been taken against Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison should have been of a civil nature, and not of a criminal character.

The fanatics, however, take the ground that the dignity of the courts must be upheld, and that any act or work spoken or written that can be construed as an offense to the judiciary must be punished, if reverence for the judiciary is to be maintained.

The New York World has the following comment which shows that a great daily journal with millions behind it, does not approve of the action of the courts in the cases against Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison:

"It is not possible to endorse the acts and words of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison in this controversy, but the courts of the District of Columbia are even more in error. They are not dealing appropriately with citizens who are in the wrong They are carrying on a personal feud which has already received a most impressive rebuke. They are judicial last-ditchers, who are introducing reprisal into what they call the administration of justice."

The New York Times had the following editorial comment:

"An appeal will be taken, and there is an opportunity for both Mr. Gompers and the entire community to reconsider their positions soberly. To speak candidly, there is danger that the courts will be used for private purposes, as the Legislatures have been, unless a halt shall be called. The Supreme Court annulled the first sentences for contempt in this case because the process for contempt was used as a means of punishment in a private proceeding. The main offense was conspiracy in constraint of trade, but judgment was given for contempt of court on motion of private counsel. That was not action by the court for the protection of its dignity in the interest of the public rather than of itself. When this error was corrected another mistake was made. The court referred inquiry regarding its dignity to private counsel, and the sentence is now so far reduced that the court practically is rebuked again. It is by no means sure that an appeal may not again be successful. In that case, and even if the reduction of the sentence shall prevent another demand for retrial, the efficiency of the lower courts in protecting their dignity leaves something to be desired in the interest of both the court and the public."

Regardless of all editorial comments that have been made, either from a labor or capitalist standpoint, there is no denying the fact, but that the judiciary is dominated by the class that are the owners of the means of life.

The rights of property are above human rights, and the many decisions that have been handed down by courts in favor of property and against individual liberty, prove conclusively that the man on the bench, as a general rule, looks through the same glasses as the combinations that are using every weapon to disfigure justice and destroy the rights of man.

Labor and the Tariff

THE SECRETARY of the American Federation of Labor insists that wages cannot go down as a result of tariff reduction.

He says: "Labor's wages cannot be cut because in many industries they are already at the lowest living point. If any attempt is made there will be strikes all along the line. We are in the midst of a tremendous campaign to strengthen the position of labor against further exploitation of capital."

A recent bulletin from the Bureau of Labor statistics shows that, while in 1896 the cost of the year's supply of food for the average working class family was $300 in the North Atlantic division of the country, it had risen to $466 in 1912, or well over 50 per cent.

During the same period in the South Atlantic division the figures show an increase from $265 to $417; the North Central from $275 to $463; the South Central from $255 to $441, and the Western from $277 to $409; on the whole a general rate of increase in cost of living of far over 50 per cent. And it is only too evident that wages have lagged painfully behind the rising cost of living in every portion of the country.

During this period, however, what is called the national wealth of the country has increased from approximately $75,000,000,000 to $130,000,000,000, or an increase of approximately 75 per cent.

It is notorious that, as a rule, the higher the tariff protection the lower the wages. Some of the most favored trusts, like steel, sugar, wool, cotton, beef, have paid the worst starvation wages.

Says Secretary Morrison: "Capital has had protection, but labor has had to face unrestricted competition. Importations of goods are taxed, but immigration is free. The price of manufactured products could be raised to the limit, but the price of labor could be kept down to the minimum by untaxed drafts on Europe. There was merely transportation to be reckoned."

But the tariff tinkering by the present administration even if it went the length of free trade would not provide a remedy. Were the cost of living to be reduced there would follow a corresponding reduction in wages, and the relative difference between the two would remain the same.

Under low tariff or high tariff labor's condition would remain unchanged. Wages so long as the wage system continues are certain to remain at the lowest living point. The Milwaukee Journal uncovers the kernel in the nut when it says:

"Perhaps some wages will be cut after tariff is reduced, not because profits will not be adaquate, but because unorganized and ignorant foreign labor is powerless before the crushing power of cooperating employés. Labor gets just what the factory owner is willing to pay if there is no union protection—tariff, or no tariff."

But, continues Mr. Morrison:

"The swarms of unskilled foreign labor brought into combat organized American labor, are turning on their employers. The demonstrations of the Industrial Workers of the World are the result of this exploitation of humanity. They were unorganized and ignorant.

"The employer took advantage of their helplesness and screwed down wages until men and women simply could not stand it. They broke out in revolt in Lawrence and Paterson.

"We of the American Federation of Labor are not responsible. Capital has brought it on because it sought to combat organized labor with unorganized labor."

But, has it escaped the notice of the Federation Secretary that England, a free-trade country, has at present even more starving workers, proportionately, than the United States.

Let the American Federation of Labor, whether the tariff be low or high, continue its campaign to strengthen the position of labor against exploitation and couple with it a declaration for the utter abolition of all exploitation and it will aid materially in solving not only present problems but the labor problems for all time.—California Social-Democrat.

Socialism Given a Respectful Hearing

SEYMOUR STEDMAN of Chicago who was elected to the Legislature of Illinois, recently entertained the lawmakers of his state with a talk on Socialism.

The Socialist speaker and student of economics, is forcing himself into every gathering, and barriers cannot be raised against speakers and students who are backed by a million votes in this country.

There was a time when the man who raised his voice for the principles of Socialism was met with sneers and insults, but that time has passed away never to return.

The Socialist speaker, whether in the church, Legislature or public rostrum, is given a respectful hearing, for men of intelligence realize that the profit system is rushing to destruction and that our system of exploitation must be supplanted by an industrial democracy.

Seymour Stedman spoke as follows to the Legislators of Illinois:

"Taft says, in the Century Magazine for October: 'The fact is that government ownership of the industries will produce a dead level, there would be no one in control.' I have not observed a dead level for the janitor in the White House and the President; there is no dead level for mail carriers and the postmaster general; there is no dead level for a private soldier and a general at headquarters; there is no dead level for the clerks in a pension office and the head in the department or superheads; there is no dead level for the secretary of state and his subordinates; there is no dead level for the chief of the fire department and the truckmen, or chief of the water department and a meter inspector; and there is no indication of a dead level on the part of those who are pestering the members of the House for the opportunity of working for the government. I am amazed at the number of practical Socialists I have met while I have been in attendance upon this body, all of them anxious and hungry for the opportunity to be employed by the government, although on election day every single one of them oppose Socialism, which proposes that all people should have an opportunity to be employed by the government.

"In objecting to Socialism, Taft again says: 'There will be no competent body (under Socialism) to fit salaries or wages.' I reply, who fixes his salary? Who fixes the salary of firemen, of those around the Atlantic and Pacific coast in the life-saving service; those who are building the Panama canal, which was a colossal failure in the hands of private enterprise? Who fixes salaries of mail carriers, who cover nearly 500,000 miles in the execution of their duties? Who fixes the salary of 500,000 school teachers in the educational institutions of this country? The statement by the President shows how economic class interests and bias class feeling may produce a most stupid and puerile argument.

"Taft says, again, that 'the lowest-paid men having a vote would have a tendency to reduce the wages of higher paid and more efficient.' I reply, 'the average income could easily be $3,000 or $4,000 a year and I do not apprehend there would be very much worrying or suffering if even all received equal compensation, although that is not the position of the Socialist party, and in trade unions and lodges, in the educational system and in the fire department, in all government departments, there is recognized on the part of the lowest paid the right of the more efficient to a higher wage than the average. Compensation in every lodge is voted to the higher officers. At last Taft asks 'whether the government in taking over industries would pay for them, confiscate them, or issue bonds?' This question I cannot answer. If we had control of this state I think we could take over several industries which in a very few years would result in the complete ownership of many industries without a great hardship to the poor fellows who are now in possession of a few million dollars' worth of securities and bonds in these industries. We'll pension them.

"Mr. Munsey, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft are attempting to guide the fortunes of the older political parties of the United States so as to provide some makeshift or adopt some method of relief which will curtail the progress of the Socialist movement, and we may expect almost every concession to be made except the fundamental one which involves the abolition of the wage system and the inauguration of conditions where those who are engaged in industries will receive the equivalent of that which they produce, making proper allowance for deductions to be used for maintenance, equipment and financing of departments which are not directly productive.

"Gentlemen of leisure, the working class is not today the most intelligent class. Your safety lies in its ignorance; its enlightenment means your overthrow and the emancipation of the worker. Its strength consists in its numbers. It is often termed by the cultured as "the mob." Its ignorance is feared by those who have been its educators—the daily papers, magazines, the professors, the lawyers and scholars.

"Those who profess to fear the ignorance of the 'mob' belie themselves. They fear the growing intelligence of 'the mob' and are now laboring for a life-term judiciary as a last refuge against the intelligence and solidarity of the coming host.

"The host is coming up from the black holes and the openings from gold-laden startas, from field, factory and furnace. They have carried the burdens of this world for many lonely and weary years; they have fought its battles, leaving their bones bleaching on the sands, their blood and bodies to fertilize the earth. The old ghosts are now vanishing—with the fright and fear of want which beset their fathers and forefathers. They know that the magic of machinery has banished forever the dread of starvation and want through drought and inundation.

They question the superior wisdom of their rulers. The mystery of high finance does not perplex them as it once did.

"They are groping and struggling up to the light, elimbing and erawling higher and higher through underbrush and thickets, sometimes slipping baek as a rock gives way, but only to take a new and firmer footing; sometimes retraeing their steps to find a surer pathway. But their progress is eertain, and they will in a few years emerge above the mist, stand upon the heights and view their world."

Law and Justice

UNDER THE ABOVE HEAD the following story is told in "The Torch," published at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania:

"John Walker of Enola was held under $100 bail for court by Mayor Royal at police court Wednesday afternoon. Walker was arrested on Tuesday evening at the request of S. R. Ream, who says that the prisoner found his pocket book which the prosecutor said had contained $20. The poeket book was turned over to the owner but the money could not be found.

"Walker submitted to a search and proved to the poliee and the prosecutor that he did not have the money, and that the pocket book was empty when he found it, but still he went to jail to await the action of the grand jury in June.

"On Tuesday evening Ream went into the basement of a Market street hotel, where he lost his wallet which was in his hip pocket. Ream left and diseovered his loss about fifteen minutes later. When he asked the bar clerk if he heard of any person who found a poeket book, Walker spoke up and said that he had found one in the basement. Ream said that the purse belonged to him and Walker handed it over. The owner opened the wallet and as he did, asked Walker where the $20 was whieh was in it. Walker said that there was no money in it when he picked it up, but Ream insisted that there was.

"To avoid trouble Walker offered to go to the poliee headquarters and be searehed, which he did. Walker was stripped to the skin, but all the money which was found on him was 91 eents. However, Ream wished to press the charges against the unfortunate man and he was sent to jail.

"At the hearing Walker again proved to Ream that he did not have the money, but still the latter insisted that the charge be enforced and it was. Walker could not get the $100 bail so will be eompelled to sit in jail until the grand jury disposes of his ease."

The above story shows that the man who had $20 and lost it, had far more influenee with a eourt than the vietim of poverty who was reduced to 91 cents.

Had the finder of this pocket book been a man of finaneial resourees and made the statement that the pocket book was empty when he found it, the court, in all probability, would have aecepted his statement as the truth. But the finder of the pocket book was almost penniless and he was so unfortunate as to belong to a class whose labor barely reeeives a wage to maintain an existence, and poverty garbed in the livery of labor, has but little standing with public officials who have become aceustomed to look upon the vietim of poverty as a eriminal.

If Walker can be held in prison on the mere statement of the owner of a pocket book, there is every reason to believe that he ean be eonvicted on such a statement. His imprisonment may be in accordance with law, but there are few men actuated by honest impulses, who will eontend that his incareeration is demanded by justice.

He Knows His Class

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION of Manufacturers in convention at Detroit, Michigan, has petitioned the President of the United States to veto the sundry eivil bill, which provides that public funds shall not be used to prosecute labor or agricultural organizations. The following appeared in a press dispateh from Detroit:

"Detroit, Mieh., May 20.—The National Association of Manufacturers this afternoon unanimously adopted and forwarded to President Wilson resolutions urging him to veto the sundry eivil appropriation bill which has passed Congress containing a provision preventing the use of public funds to enforee the Sherman act, or the prosecution of labor and agricultural organizations violating that statute.

"Charging that organized labor has failed to clear itself of the 'stains which violence and lawlessness has cast upon it,' John Kirby, Jr., of Dayton, O., president of the National Association of Manufacturers, today dwelt at length on present industrial and legislative tendencies and their effects upon manuacturers and employers.

"He said:

" 'Conspieuous in the momentous events of recent years is the tragedy of Los Angeles and the drama of Indianapolis. As a reward to the principal accompliees in this conspiraey, they have been re-elected to their respective offiees. Point to me one single labor leader or delegate who has arisen and indignantly demanded that sueh type of leadership be barred.

" 'There are men now acting in the capacity of representatives of the people, who under the cowardly pretense of political expedieney, have been willing to violate their oaths of offiee for a cheap price offered by the leaders of an organized gang of dynamiters.' "

A number of labor journals have eontended that John Kirby, Jr., president of the Manufacturers' Association, does not represent the sentiment entertained by the vast majority of the manufaeturers towards the labor movement. But Kirby is the president of the organization and no member of the organization has eome out in the open to eondemn the slanders and calumny of the frothing spokesman of the manufaeturers. Kirby has been president for several years, and has seareely met with any opposition in his frenzied assaults upon organized labor. Kirby sees fit to vomit his wrath upon the tragedy at Los Angeles, but this howling megaphone of venom and malice does not deem it neeessary to say a word against the tragedies in mines, mills and factories, where human life is sacrificed through lack of neeessary safeguards. Kirby has not a word to say of the thousands of children in mills and faetories whose lives are minted into dollars to glut the appetite of pitiless greed.

Industrial murder for profit is lawful in the eyes of Kirby, but labor mad from desperation and want through the avariee and lespotism of heartless exploiters, is anarchy, and merits the most vitriolic castigation that ean come from the hissing lips of a soulless slanderer.

Kirby is elass-eonseious and the outbursts of vituperation that are spewed from the salaried fanatic of a manufacturers' association should have the effect of making labor as class conscious as the hissing representative of capitalism.

Two Hundred Armed Guards Flee Jersey Strike After Battle in Dark with Miners

TWO HUNDRED ARMED GUARDS marched out of Wharton, N J., last night after one day's strike duty.

They made no seeret of the reason for their departure. They were "scared stiff," as one of them expressed it, at their reception at the hands of the mine strikers in Mount Hope and the strike sympathizers in Wharton.

"We won't fight dynamite," said one of the departing guards.

They marehed into Morristown, boarded a train and went back to Newark and Paterson, whence they came. Twelve New York detectives remained behind, the sole guards of the property of the Empire Steel and Iron Works mine in Mount Hope and the four-mile track of the Mount Hope Mineral railroad.

Sheriff Gillen of Morris county washed his hands of the whole affair, saying he had passed it up to the Governor, and militia had not been fortheoming. Morris county folk in the last seven weeks have been pretty well broken to warfare, but last night the prospect seemed more threatening than ever before.

The sheriff last night plaeed a force of deputies on guard at the county jail, following rumors that an attempt would be made to free strikers under arrest. Eaeh deputy was armed with a shotgun, with instruetions to use if neeessary. Strikers began drifting into Morristown last night. They said they eame merely to be present at the trial of the strikers today, but Sheriff Gillen was not satisfied with their explanation.

Yesterday New Jersey got another taste of violence in the Paterson silk strike. Strikers dynamited the home of a strike-breaker in Haekensack. No one was injured, and no great amount of damage was done, but the event enlivened the day for Robert N. Heath, undersheriff, and took his mind from the work of guarding the Erie railroad, where two attempts have been made to wreck passenger trains.

Strikers Battle Guards.

There is a different temper to affairs in Morris eounty, however. Where in Paterson the violenee had been seeret in the main—bomb-throwing and attempts at train wreeking and beating up a lone strike-breaker here and there—in the miners' strike the eonflict is open.

A pitched battle early yesterday, in whieh about 1,000 shots were fired, six private detectives wounded and seven strikers made prisoners, preeeded the retreat of the guards today.

The work of guarding the line of the Mount Hope railroad had been turned over to J. F. O'Brien, head of a Paterson strike detective ageney. A dozen men from a New York ageney protected the main works of the company.

It was the presence of these alien men, sworn in as special deputy sheriffs and armed for duty, that enraged not only the 200 strikers but hundreds of others in Wharton and surrounding towns. Frequent brushes between the guards and the strike sympathizers strengthened the animosity. Yesterday the strikers began hurling dynamite.

None of the guards was injured by this, but it broke their nerve. Yesterday, after the night's battle, one hundred of the men were brought in from Wharton to Morristown and lodged in a hall there.

Withdraws Guard.

O'Brien, who had maintained all along that he was able to keep the mine region quiet, and that he would break the strike in four days, explained the force was to be held in Morristown as a reserve, and the hundred men still in the mine district would keep things in order until 200 more men arrived from Paterson. Later he said 100 men would be kept on duty at the mines all the time, working in four shifts.

But yesterday the 100 who had been left at the mine joined the detachment in Morristown. O'Brien held a consultation with all the men. Then he called up Wilbur Sadler, adjutant general of the New Jersey militia, who had been investigating conditions in the mine regions, and announced he was through. Soon afterward he withdrew with his men.

The local authorities of Wharton have maintained all along if the mine guards were removed there would be no trouble. Sheriff Gillen has insisted troops be called. Sadler reported to Governor Fielder he did not think they were needed. The situation now seems to be that the Wharton authorities will be given a chance to make good their statements before the troops are called out.

Shots Fired in Night Battle.

Yesterday's battle was brought about when Edward Dwyer, one of O'Brien's lieutenants, led a party of fifty guards, all sworn in as special deputy sheriffs, who took possession Thursday night of what remains of a locomotive and passenger coach, wrecked on the railroad about a mile from Wharton, last Tuesday.

Shortly after midnight an attack was begun on this force. It lasted until daylight, volley after volley being fired by the strikers, who were aided by other Wharton citizens. The presence of the paid guards excited great animosity throughout the country side, and hundreds who had no direct interest in the mine trouble joined in the fight. Several dynamite explosions occurred.

Most of the bullets went wild, as the guards remained in darkness and hidden in the wreck of the passenger coach, offered a scant target for the marksmanship of the invading force. One of the deputies, J. A. Brauman, was shot in the face. He probably will lose his eyesight. Five others were hurt less seriously.

The full extent of the damage done to the opposing force could not be learned, but it is thought several wounded strikers were carried away by their friends. Six wounded strikers and the six guards are patients in All Souls' hospital in Morristown.

Dynamite on Prisoner.

The strikers who were captured were brought to Morristown also. They registered as O. H. Wilson, Daniel Maher, William Smith, William Palmer, John Darcy, Michael Acutz and George Noyes. Palmer, the deputies say, had two sticks of dynamite on him when he was arrested. Noyes, they say, had a loaded revolver. All were held to the Grand Jury.

After several hours of fighting the guards left the wreck and returned to Mount Hope, followed by a jeering mob, which included a hundred or more women and girls.

The Hackensack dynamiting was in No. 35 Bergen avenue, the home of Herman Hutting, a foreman in the Cramer & King silk mills, in Paterson. Hutting had received a number of threats following his refusal to quit with the other workers.

Hutting, his wife and their seven children were asleep early yesterday when an explosion tore off the porch of their home. A fence 200 feet away was struck by a piece of flying rock, but the damage to the house itself was not great, and no one inside was injured.

Besides investigating the dynamiting, Under Sheriff Heath is continuing his search for the men who attempted to halt an Erie passenger train in a cut between Rutherford and Carlton hills Thursday night by throwing rocks down on it.—New York Press.

The above story is taken from the columns of the New York Press and shows that industrial conditions at Wharton, New Jersey, have become so unbearable that men who have borne outrage and insult have arose in rebellion against the brutal thugs imported by a mining corporation.

The mining company, through a detective agency, equipped a private army made up of convicts and criminals, gathered from the "bad lands" of New Jersey and New York, and these armed Hessians were brought to Wharton with the understanding that they were licensed to commit any outrage that might awe or intimidate men who were waging a fight for a shorter work day and an increase in wages.

The strikers were patient, and for a time bore in silence the criminal conduct of lawless blackguards, who were recruited and paid by a mining corporation to break a strike. But strikers can be driven to a point where "patience ceases to be a virtue," and the thugs imported to Wharton discovered that men battling for a living wage can be aroused to defend themselves against the infamies of a mob instructed to kill to maintain the supremacy of industrial tyrants.

THE CONDITIONS IN THE NEW MINING DISTRICT.

Alamosa, Colorado, May 22, 1913.

To Organized Labor:

Greetings—Believing it is to the interests of organized labor that they should know the conditions as to the new mining section of Gilmore, Platero, Stunner, Jasper and Summitville, I take pleasure in submitting to you the following information:

This mining section is attracting a great deal of attention, and there are a good many people coming into it. It has the earmarks of a permanent camp, and there should be a large number of men employed.

Alamosa, the center of the San Luis Valley, the largest town of the valley and the railroad center, has the shortest route into the new mining camp, and is also the outfitting point for the camp.

Alamosa is the only organized union town in the San Luis Valley, all the trades being organized. There are fourteen local unions in the city; also a Trades Assembly.

A schedule of the trains into Alamosa and of the automobile stage line into the mining camp is as follows:

Rio Grande leaves Denver 7:20 p. m.; arrives Alamosa 6:10 a. m. (carrying sleepers daily).

Rio Grande leaves Salida 4:10 p. m.; arrives Alamosa 8:15 p. m. (week days).

Rio Grande leaves Durango 8:55 a. m.; arrives Alamosa 8 p. m. (daily).

Automobile stage leaves Alamosa for the mining camp at 7 a. m. (daily).

Automobile stage arrives Alamosa from mining camp at 7 p. m. (daily).

Rates on Automobile Stage—Alamosa to Worrel Ranch, $4; Worrel's Ranch to Jasper, $1.50; Worrel's Ranch to Stunner, $2.50; Worrel's Ranch to Gilmore, $2.50; Worrel's Ranch to Platoro, $2.50; (thirty pounds baggage free, excess baggage, 2 cents a pound; freight taken daily by wagon).

Please have this read at your regular meeting.

Any additional information desired will be gladly furnished or any arrangements will be looked after upon advice, either by mail or telegraph, by G. L. Purdy, Alamosa. Yours fraternally,

J. S. HOWELLS,
Vice President.

WAR IS PROBABLE WITH JAPAN.

By H. H. Caldwell.

The average person thinks that the alien land bill is the bone of contention between the American and Japanese governments. Nothing could be farther from the fact.

The American capitalist class have been preparing for war upon the Japanese capitalists for over five years, and are not quite ready to start it, as the canal which will enable them to combine the Atlantic and the Pacific fleets is not yet finished. The Japanese navy is stronger than either the Pacific or Atlantic fleets of the United States, but not as strong as the two united.

Can you remember when the Russian government was planning to capture Manchuria and was preparing to whip Japan to make Russia supreme in the Orient, and do you also remember that Japan kept herself well informed upon these plans, starting the war about six months before Russia was ready?

We are face to face with a similar proposition in the present day, because the American capitalist class were preparing to break the naval strength of Japan and consequently her influence in commercial circles, as well as a trade rival in the ports of the Pacific.

The canal can be opened by September 1, and Japan knows it; she also knows that if war is to come, she had better start it soon. That is why the California alien bill is made an excuse.

Mr. Bryan is sparring for time, as he wants the canal opened, while the Japanese ambassador is insisting upon haste, as his hand will be weaker with every day of delay. This is not a fight in which either the workers of Japan or America have anything to gain but DO HAVE EVERYTHING TO LOSE.

That land bill does not prevent the employment of Japanese workers upon the farms or any other place, but does prevent them from getting into competition with the landlord class. This will drive them out into the hard struggle for the job of the American worker, without doing the American working class any good.

The complaint was that the Jap market gardener sold things to the workingman too cheaply, so the American capitalist with his farm lands worked by wage labor, could make as much profit as he wanted.

If they had made the bill a complete exclusion act for all aliens who accept a lower standard of living than we do, there would have been some cause for saying it was to benefit labor, but as it now stands it is exclusively for the benefit of the petty capitalist class.

If there is war, the war will be fought exclusively by the working class, as all wars in America have been in the past.

Let us hope that the Socialist party is sufficiently strong in both countries to expose this plan for the murder of thousands of working people for the benefit of the ruling class in America and Japan.

Make as much anti-war propaganda as you can, and let us teach the American capitalist class that we are on to their little game.

Japan has everything to gain by avoiding war, as with her low cost of production she can capture the markets of the Pacific from both European and American capitalists if she has peace.

We do not want foreign markets, we want SOCIALISM, so we can buy our own products. When the worker can buy his own products there will be no cause for war to get foreign trade away from another capitalist nation.

Let the capitalists go to war and do their own fighting; then they will not be so anxious to start something for us to finish.—World-Oakland.

MAY DAY CELEBRATION AT HANCOCK, MICHIGAN.

Hancock, Michigan, May 12, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

A great May Day celebration was held under the auspices of the Hancock Copper Miners' Union No. 200 of the Western Federation of Miners, on Sunday, May 4, in which the miners of the copper country of Michigan turned out in a big parade through Hancock and Houghton in the morning and in the afternoon attended a meeting held in the Kansankoti hall.

The parade started at 10 o'clock a. m. from the corner of Franklin and Shelden streets. Houghton, where the line was formed, and marched across to Hancock, proceeding along Hancock avenue to Lake street and thence back on Quincy street to the Kansankoti hall on Tezcuco street, where it disbanded. The parade was the biggest one ever held by the miners in the upper peninsula of Michigan. When the parade started from Houghton it numbered over 2,500 and a number of miners joined from Hancock into the parade. It is not too much to say that there was in parade about 3,000 men, because the parade was over one mile long.

Banners were also carried by the mine, giving voice to the feeling of the miners. For example, I name some of them: "We Demand Higher Wages and Better Working Conditions"; "Dividends Paid by the Calumet & Heckla Co., $121,050,000; Quincy Mining Co., $20,595,000, Why Should We Starve?" We Demand an Eight-hour Working Day and Minimum Wages Schedule."

In the afternoon, commencing at 2 o'clock, a mass meeting was held in the Kansankoti hall, at which addresses were made in four languages. C. E. Mahoney, vice president of the Western Federation of Miners, spoke in English; A. O. Sarell, editor of Tyomies, in Finnish; Thomas Strizich, organizer of the W. F. M., in Croatian, and Anton Romano, organizer of the Calumet Miners' Union, in Italian.

Resolutions relative to the recent coal miners' strike in West Virginia were adopted at the meeting, which are as follows:

Whereas, The coal miners of West Virginia have been engaged in an industrial struggle with the coal barons of that state during the past year in an effort to better the conditions of the mine workers and to secure some semblance of freedom for themselves and dependent ones; and,

Whereas, The official and military powers of the state have become the willing tools of the mine owners, to the end that civil law and procedure have been overthrown and supplanted by a military court under martial law, that the striking miners, their sympathizers and aids might be arrested, arraigned, tried and convicted on trumped-up charges by their accusers, thus denying them their constitutional rights of trial by jury; and,

Whereas, Mother Jones is now held in military confinement on what the mine owners and their confederates chose to call serious charges; and,

Whereas, She is denied her constitutional right to trial by jury, a right that is guaranteed by the constitution of the state of West Virginia; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By organized labor, their friends and sympathizers in mass meeting assembled, this fourth day of May, Nineteen Hundred and Thirteen, that we call on all organized workers and sympathizers to come to the rescue of Mother Jones, that the hellish plot of a mine owner's association in West Virginia may be overthrown and the rights of the common people established; and, be it further

Resolved, That we pledge our undivided support to Mother Jones and the struggling miners of West Virginia in their conflict and denounce the officialdom of the state in farming out the military forces of the state to do the bidding of a mine owner's association that labor might be enslaved; be it further

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be given to the press for publication and that a copy be forwarded to the Hon. William B. Wilson, secretary of the Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., with the request that a federal investigation be made in West Virginia.

JOHN VALIMAKI, President.
C. E. HIETALA, Secretary.

The auditorium of Kamankoti hall was too small to seat the assemblage and the crowds extended out onto the sidewalks and streets. The estimation of people to Kamankoti hall is 1,500 people.

THE PESSIMISM OF JACK LONDON.

By Emanuel Julius.

Ten minutes after meeting Jack London one is impressed by his grim pessimism. He is, confessedly, a pessimist. But, before viewing this phase of London, let us have some small talk about things that may prove interesting, even though they may not be of great national importance. To begin with, he looks much handsomer than his pictures, for the camera never gets his soft, gray eyes. Though 37 years old, he doesn't appear to be more than 30. He has a magnificent body—a fine form, with nothing pugilistic except his shoulders. He has a chin that doesn't appear to be of the sort to invite dispute When he laughs, his mouth looks like a jewelry store window. Dressed simply, he wears a plain, ready-made suit of clothes; a soft-collared, white shirt and a black silk tie produce a striking effect. His hat is one of those abominable sombreros.

Hisconversation is decidedly colloquial, having neither the refinement of an over-cultured scholar nor the roughness of a stage Westerner. It is just ordinary English, the kind one hears on city street cars and office-building elevators. He is quite approachable, always willing to talk streaks just for the asking. His speech is interspersed with mild, harmless oaths. And here let us give thanks, he doesn't carry himself with an air of dignity. In brief, he is an open, frank fellow, in appearance more of a good fellow than our common conception of a famous author.

When I saw him he was in the hands of a Los Angeles moving-picture man, who was using him to pose before the camera. A company has contracted to have London appear in a number of films that will depict many of his famous stories. These films will begin with London sitting at a desk, pen in hand, cigarette at his elbow, writing one of his tales. Of course, if the moving-picture man wanted to be realistic, he would have London seated before a typewriter, but that, it is generally agreed, would be lacking in romance. Authors, in pictures, should pen their stories, not typewrite them. He will scratch away for about 200 feet of film, when the scene will fade, soon to open with the action of the story. So says the manager.

After proper intervals, London will reappear on the screen. Then, it will close with a hundred or more feet of film showing the writer in the act of closing the story and inserting the manuscript in an envelope, intending doubtlessly to send it to the harsh, hard-hearted editor. A photoplay of "John Barleycorn," a serial that appeared in a popular weekly magazine, will be one instance, it is announced by the film managers, where London will actually take part in the action. As this story is autobiographical, it will add much to have London himself in the cast. His famous trip in the Snark will be included. London's wife, Charmian, will also appear in this play, it is said.

"Of course," says London, "I never pretend to be an actor. I don't know a thing about the profession. I'll do whatever I'm told, for I am in the hands of my friends."

The plays will be produced at Balboa, Cal., where the Balboa Amusement Company has erected a studio for the special purpose of staging the London stories. The managers predict that these stories, with London himself in the films, will attract much interest and possibly be the greatest series of films ever produced.

"As I must stay here for considerable time," said Mr. London, "I am going to wire to the ranch and ask my wife to join me. Do you know, this is the first time in eight years that I have been away from her." The telegram was sent immediately and Mrs. London joined her husband within twenty-four hours. Mrs. London appeared concerned over the impression that her husband's "John Barleycorn" had created in the minds of many persons. They have concluded that because Jack London speaks of his friendship with John Barleycorn since his boyhood days, that he surely must be a drunkard. "He has never been a heavy drinker," said Mrs. London, "and though he isn't an abstainer, still he has never taken enough of the fiery fluid to cause the slightest alarm."

Bailey Millard, writing in the May number of The Bookman, has an interesting paragraph on London, saying that "Jack has never survived the effect of his vagrant habits, acquired during his youthful tramping days, and he owns that since that time he has never lost his terror for a 'cop.' "

"While I was in college," London says, "I went to a circus in Oakland one night. I lingered after the show and by a bonfire I came upon a bunch of small boys who had determined to run away with the circus, which was about to leave town. The showmen, learning of their intention, sent a message to the police. When I saw the sudden eruption of brass-buttoned, helmeted bulls, each of them reaching with both hands, I ran. I was not a hobo. I was a citizen of that community, a college man. And yet I ran, blindly, madly for blocks. And when I came to myself I was still running.

"No, I'll never get over it; I can't help it. When a bull reaches I run."

London views his art pessimistically; in fact, he objects to being called an artist. "I am nothing more than a fairly good artisan," said London, when the conversation turned to art. "You may think I am not telling the truth, but I hate my profession. I detest the profession I have chosen. I hate it, I tell you; I hate it!

"I assure you that I do not write because I love the game. I loathe it. I cannot find words to express my disgust. The only reason I write is because I am well paid for my labor—that's what I call it—labor. I get lots of money for my books and stories. I tell you I would be glad to dig ditches for twice as many hours as I devote to writing if only I would get as much money. To me, writing is an easy way to make a fine living. Unless I meant it, I wouldn't think of saying a thing like this, for I am speaking for publication. I am sincere when I say that my profession sickens me. Every story I write is for the money that will come to me. I always write what the editors want, not what I'd like to write. I grind out what the capitalist editors want, and the editors buy only what the business and editorial departments permit."

"What, in your opinion, is the effect of the capitalist system on art?" London was asked.

"Awful! Absolutely killing! The editors are not interested in the truth; they don't want writers to tell the truth. A writer can't tell a story when it tells the truth, so why should he batter his head against a stone wall? He gives the editors what they want, for he knows that the stuff he believes in and loves to write will never be purchased."

"What a pleasant view you take!" I said.

"I give things little thought these days," London responded. "I am weary of everything; I no longer think of the world or the movement or of writing as an art. I am a great dreamer, but I dream of my ranch, of my wife. I dream of beautiful horses and fine soil. I dream of the beautiful horses and fine soil. I dream of the beautiful things I own up in Sonoma county. And I write for no other purpose than to add to the beauty that belongs to me. I write a book for no other reason than to add three or four hundred acres to my magnificent estate. I write a story with no other purpose than to buy a stallion. To me, my cattle are far more interesting than my profession. My friends don't believe me when I say this, but I am absolutely sincere.

"You may wonder why I am a pessimist," said Mr. London; "I often wonder myself. Here I have the most precious thing in the world—the love of a woman; I have beautiful children; I have lots and lots of money; I have fame as a writer; I have many men working for me; I have a beautiful ranch—and still, I am a pessimist. I look at things dispassionately, scientifically, and everything appears almost hopeless; after long years of labor and development, the people are as bad off as ever. There is a mighty ruling class that intends to hold fast to its possessions. I see years and years of bloodshed. I see the master class hiring armies of murderers to keep the workers in subjection, to beat them back should they attempt to dispossess the capitalists. That's why I am a pessimist. I see things in the light of history and the laws of nature.

"I became a Socialist when I was 17 years old. I am still a Socialist, but not of the refined, quietistic school of Socialism. The Socialists, the ghetto Socialists of the East, no longer believe in the strong, firm Socialism of the early days. Mention 'confiscation' in the ghetto of New York and the leaders will throw up their hands in holy horror. I still believe that Socialists should strive to eliminate the capitalist class and wipe away the private ownership of mines, mills, factories, railroads and other social needs.

"I do not believe that Socialists should soften and yield, eventually becoming mere reformers whose greatest desire is economy in government and low taxes, and the like. They should take upon themselves the task of doing away with the robbing capitalist system do away with the profit system and place the workers in possession of the industries."

"Are you opposed to political action?" Mr. London was asked.

"I believe there is much to be gained by entering political campaigns," he answered. "The real advantage, in my opinion, is the great opportunity to educate the workers to an understanding of the wrongs of the present system and the means of class consciousness."

"Do you believe in sabotage and syndicalism?"

"Hopelessly so! I have believed in them for twenty years. I look upon myself as a veteran in the Socialist movement. I joined when it was disgraceful to be known as a Socialist. I believe that any means will justify the end. I believe in any method to bring about the Socialist commonwealth."

"You think that a peaceful and legal change is impossible?"

"History shows that no master class is ever willing to let go without a quarrel. The capitalists own the governments, the armies and the militia. Don't you think the capitalists will use these institutions to keep themselves in power? I do."

"What do you intend to do, Mr. London?"

"I feel that I have done my part. Socialism has cost me hundreds of thousands of dollars. When the time comes I'm going to stay right on my ranch at Glen Ellen and let the revolution go to blazes. I've done my part."

After a pause, he added:

"That's the way I feel now. I suppose when the time comes I'll let my emotions get the best of my intellect and I'll come down from the mountain top and join the fray."

"What a grim, pessimistic view you have, Mr. London!"

"Well, I'm a pessimist; I admit it."

As I rose to leave, I shook his hand and said:

"Yes, and I think I know the cause of your pessimism."

"Tell me."

"I feel positive that your liver is out of order."—Western Comrade.

THE WORKERS' DEMOCRACY.

Through the militant efforts of the trade unions, twenty-four states have enacted laws requiring guards on dangerous machinery and proper ventilation in factories.

Thirty-one states have mine inspection laws with authorized inspectors.

Fourteen states have enacted laws regulating the hours of labor to be worked in and around the mines.

Twenty-six states have enacted special laws regulating the work of women and children in and around the mines.

Eighteen states have enacted special child labor laws.

Twenty-seven states enforce sanitary and sufficient toilet rooms for the sexes of industry.

Thirty provide factory inspectors to enforce observances of health and safety laws.

Thirty-three require fire escapes on factories and public buildings.

Forty-four have adopted an age limit for working children.

Thirty-six states prohibit night work by children.

Forty-two states have fixed a maximum number of hours as a working week for children.

Thirty-three states have boiler inspection laws.

Fourteen states officially inspect bakery shops.

Forty-six states have enacted mechanics' lien laws to protect the wages of all workers.

Thirty-nine have established bureaus of labor, which serve as the clearing houses for industrial information, and are the centralized influence for better state factory laws.

Twenty-six states have automatic coupler and automatic brake laws which have been the means of saving thousands of lives on railroads.—Milwaukee Leader.

WHY CHANGE THE GOVERNMENT?

As to the relation a government should sustain to business or trade there are two opposing theories. One, the "let alone" theory, has been the policy of Jeffersonian Democracy since the formation of the party, and the same policy has been followed, though somewhat spasmodically, by the Republicans.

Jeffersonian Democracy, or the "let-alone" policy, seems fair enough on the face of it. The idea is that the government shall not meddle with the private or business affairs of the people. All men are supposed to have an equal chance to achieve happiness under the laws. But we very well know that they are not equal and hence they do not all have an equal chance. In other words, they are not all alike, as peas in a pod, but different. Some forge ahead in a few years, others drop hopelessly behind. It was formerly supposed that each deserved the fortune he got; that the fittest survived and the unfit went to the wall. But this is a false and brutal idea. It is usually the cunning, the covetous, the selfish, who succeed, and these are the characteristics of a plutocracy or capitalistic government; and in their desperate competition with this ungodly money power the people sink lower and lower until business becomes a matter of universal prostitution and everything—time, talent, genius, beauty, art, strength, learning, the press, the pulpit, the bar, the church, the college, even the state itself—are for sale.

The gap between the two classes in society, the successful and the unsuccessful, ever widens. The moneyed class becomes ever more arrogant and wealthy, while the proletariat, or working class, degenerates into an abject and hopeless condition. This is the inevitable outcome of free competition in business under the benign rule of Jeffersonian Democracy. Given time enough and the result will be that the wealth of a country will drift into the hands of a few and the masses will be in slavery and abject poverty. Nothing—education, religion, fertile lands, inventions, philosophy, science, art or literature—will affect the result; for money will become a necessity. Money is king.

The other theory is that government, like all things else, ought to exist solely for the use and benefit of the people. This idea, at first denominated paternalism, hated by the exploiter and feared by the politician, carried out to its logical conclusion, ends in Socialism and the co-operative commonwealth.—Mahlon Jones, in Brewery Workers' Journal.

WHY LABOR GETS EVER LESS.

Unlike land and capital, labor cannot be detached from the person of its owner. When its productive power is used this use requires the presence of the owner on the spot, and commonly entails certain effects upon his liberty and life which are not easily or adequately counted in the cost. Risk to life and limb, incident upon its employment, seldom figure in the wages bargain, while dirt, disease, or degrading character of work have little influence upon the rate of pay.

The wage earner can seldom, like the landlord or the capitalist, withhold the offer of his productive agent for a while so as to raise its price. For, in the first place, he has usually no other means of livelihood to keep him while he waits. Secondly, if he could wait, his waiting would not merely waste his labor in the interval, but, by the starvation and the idleness it entailed, would damage the efficiency of his labor afterwards.

The employer, the capitalist, the landlord, can wait, for they have a reserve on which to live, and though their waiting involves some present loss, they can usually recover it in the terms which they are able to exact when they once more apply their land or capital which has not suffered any wastage of productive efficiency from a temporary withdrawal.

Most workers, in a word, must sell their labor continuously for whatever it will fetch.

But the natural condition of the labor market has another disadvantage for the sellers. Their labor is contained in a large number of little separate pieces; the capital is usually concentrated in large masses wielded by a few employers. The sellers of labor, then, are many, the buyers few. This is an obvious advantage to the buyers, whose competition with one another is likely to be less free and continuous. . . .

This brings us to the central defect in the capacity of labor as a claimant for the "surplus product." For the distribution of this surplus depends upon the scarcity of the expective factors .. . . But the normal conditions of labor is one of over supply, in the sense that there is usually more labor offered than is sought for. Labor is the only factor of which the supply generally and permanently exceeds the demand. Though restraints upon the birth rate and improved organization of workers doubtless tend to diminish this over supply, they have not got rid of it.

And so long as any over supply exists, its necessary effect, so far as free competition operates, is to drag down wages to that lower level which covers bare costs of maintenance or such slightly higher level as law, public opinion, custom or humanity prescribes.—J. A. Hobson, in Melbourne Socialist.

PERT PARAGRAPHS.

We must insist that for Labor to be true to itself it shall stand as a working-class party, free from any alliance, direct or indirect, with any other party.

The workers must be all organized into a party of their class, and this will leave the shirkers in a party of their own class.

The difference between the land monopolist and the monopolist of the machinery of production is negligible.

Both are extortioners who levy toll upon the working class all the time.

There was once an old lady named Mrs. Partington who endeavored with the aid of her broom to shoo back the tide.

The modern Mrs. Partington is the politician who endeavors by legislation of a repressive nature to stem the rising tide of Socialism.

It is truly deplorable that the capitalists may have to get work in a year or two.

Recent developments in Europe point to the fact that there appears to be a marked rivalry between nations as to which can become bankrupt first.

Present indications are that the various countries will arrive there together.

The race for armaments will cease when the workers get wise.

There is no wisdom at all in the present mad state of affairs.

The microscope has been used in the laboratory of Labor upon the "square deal" policy, and not a single molecule has been discovered likely to be beneficial to humanity.

On the contrary, the number of deadly microbes is truly startling.

A good dose of physic is needed to destroy the germs.

Germs thrive in the darkness; let Labor turn on the light.

If the working class would stop to think, the employing class would go hungry.

The moral is that the workers should stop to think—often.

The fact that organization is required in order to secure the wealth that belongs to them is also being grasped by the workers.

With intelligence and organization everything is possible.

Without organization there is no hope for the working class, a fact appreciated to the full by their employers.

If we put an end to straw-splitting and march ahead, an end will soon come to the different capitalists who at present make things merry for themselves in this country.

To this end those earnestly desirous of complete solidarity want to work continuously.—Maoriland Worker.

SOLIDARITY, STRENGTH OF THE WORKERS.

Organization Along Correct Lines Will Make Labor's Army Invincible.

The workers' greatest weapon is solidarity. It is strong not alone in the physical might thus engendered but in the enormous moral strength is acquired by reason of the workers having mutual confidence in one another. The workers, most of them, are individually helpless. They are abjectly so; and the worker who thinks that his interest lies other than with the rest of his fellows, whatever may be his occupation, is sorely ignorant of the real facts of the case.

Perpetually of course the lickspittles of the capitalist press are employed trying to spring false issues before the worker to keep them apart, hoodwinked. Men and Religion Forward Movements, Militia of Christ, cries against foreigners and the like are utilized to chloroform the workers, and prevent them realizing that an injury to one under any circumstances is an injury to all.

In almost all industries there will be found a number of men who on account of possessing a higher technical skill cannot be brought to imagine that workers in any lines of labor other than their own have interests which are inextricably wrapped up in theirs, and this poisonous idea is subtly catered to by the capitalist class. The employer declares his desire to treat with the workers separately, and hence men in different occupations even in the same industry, are compelled on account of their system of organization, to treat separately with the bosses.

The New York Garment Workers' strike will not be destitute of good—the suffering and the sacrifices which were made will demand an examination of the facts, and with that examination will come a realization that all workers, no matter what line of the industry, they will themselves come to see things in they produce profits together.

It is assured that sooner or later the workers will realize that their coming together must be a reality, not a myth, and that organized lines which divide must be substituted by organized masses which unite.

The advance of the class struggle with the hundred and one concomitant forces all sway towards one big union that compels solidarity; and it is certain that the various conflicts which take place on the economic field must act as a powerful argument towards greater and greater solidarity.

What differences do exist will be eliminated, and even those who now resolutely and sincerely oppose the instinctive action of the workers towards closer and closer and more real unitl, will themselves come to see things in their right light.

Perhaps it is unfortunate that the failure to see things in the industrial light often compels industrialists to see in such failure insincerity on the part of those who oppose it. Granted that there are many cases where this is well founded, Rome was not built in a day, and sooner or later at least the rank and file can be relied upon by the force of economic circumstances to at last adopt industrialism. Now in the various lines of industry where formerly reaction marked the workers, industrialism is a live subject for discussion, and the supporters of the idea are growing fast in numbers, in influence and in power.—Nome Industrial Worker.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AND DRESS REFORM.

There never were many convincing arguments against woman suffrage, to be sure, but it is worth nothing that the principal one used in the past shows a decided tendency now to reverse itself.

That argument was based principally on objections to the alleged personality, appearance and deportment of the typical "suffragette" who was almost invariably depicted as an unprepossessing, angular female whose lack of charm was accenturated by ugly, inartistic and unfashionable clothing. The suffragist was universally depicted as what women term a "dowdy" or a frump," a personality calculated to repel the opposite sex rather than attract it. This representation still appears in many belated comic and satirical publications, but it is eventually bound to be abandoned.

It is worth noting that the last great suffrage parade in this city drew from the "antis" the envious comment that the paraders made what they call a "sex appeal," which is merely a "catty" method of admitting that the procession was noticeable for the large number of handsome, attractive and well dressed women who marched in it. And the admission, though reluctantly extracted, is unquestionably correct.

The old idea was that the women who, instead of demanding political justice, wheedled and cajoled men into granting privileges by making an undisguised "sex appeal," was behaving in a perfectly proper and womanly manner in so doing. She was usually commended highly for utilizing this method, and the inference was that the suffragist was to sour and unattractive to employ it successfully, a conclusion that, of course, greatly flattered the silly, complacent vanity of the "antis." Now, however, that it has to be admitted that suffragists are, on the whole, quite as attractive in looks, dress, manners and general appearance as the "antis," if not more so, what was previously considered a virtue in the "antis," the latter attempt to represent as a vice in the suffragists. It is clearly a case of "sour grapes," and the attempt, we venture to predict with certainty, will fail.

In this connection, we notice that a New York clergyman, a Dr. Reisner, has advised the suffragists to devote some of their energy to dress reform, as a method of obtaining the vote more quickly. In a sermon preached last Sunday, the reverend gentleman characterized the modern woman's dress as immodest, and wanted to know "what right Paris had, with its non-belief in a personal God, to set the styles for a Christian nation like ours." He urged the suffragists to adopt the "decent" style of feminine dress of the western part of the country, rather than go to the "underworld of Paris" for their clothes, advice which we should say is much more impertinent than pertinent when addressed to the advocates of woman suffrage, as any one who witnessed their parade will readily perceive. The clergyman was evidently laboring under the delusion of the charge of "sex appeal" made against them by their enraged opponents, and thought it was up to him to give some countenance to the foolish and spiteful accusation.

It is not likely, however, that the suffragists will waste any time replying to this clerical adviser. They have more important matters on hand than dress reform, and immodesty in dress cannot be justly laid to their charge. As for the "right of Paris, with its non-belief in a personal God," to dictate fashions, the reverned inquirer can very properly go elsewhere to have that question answered, though, perhaps, the "antis" could hardly inform him, as they usually haven't brains enough to know much about the origin of fashions beyond the fact that they come from Paris, and the suffragists have much more important work on hand in explaining why women should have the vote than entering into a discussion of the why and wherefore of Paris fashions with the clergy. They might perhaps dismiss him curtly with the information that they are invented, designed and made by men for the sake of profit, and sold mostly to foolish women who have not enough sense to know that political justice is more important than Paris clothes to their sex.

The suffragists are all right, both in person, appearance, dress and deportment. They have always looked good to us, and we are glad to see that they are having a similar effect on others, even though the nasty minded opponents of their movement slanderously insinuate that it is a "sex appeal." What these jealous-minded critics have really discovered is that sensible, intelligent people always make a good impression and are wholesome to look upon, regardless of sex, and it is a discovery worth making also, especially for the women opponents of the suffrage movement.—New York Call.

WALL STREET REAL ESTATE HIGHEST IN WORLD.

Peculiar Conditions Place Rome in Lead in Europe.

Search of the leading foreign cities of the world shows that outside of New York, the highest value placed on a parcel of real estate large enough to hold a full-sized building is about $450 a square foot. New York has a dozen or more plots which even in such a dull market as is the present one would command that figure and more. In fact, a sale was made not many months ago in which the property figured at just a few cents more than $600 a square foot. This property is the lot comprising the twenty-five foot frontage on Wall street and the 100 feet on Broad street under the corner of the old Drexel building purchased by J. P. Morgan & Co., and now to be replaced by their $2,000,000 marble banking house.

Whether the Morgan corner actually is the most valuable in the city is a question which real estate men whose opinions are worth while refuse to answer lightly. They all admit that the price paid for it is the highest ever recorded in this city, but many are inclined to believe that the south corner of Broadway and Wall street is at least of equal value and that given equal advantage to Wall and Broad streets it might be worth just a little more.

"It is the Morgan name," said one man, "that gives that corner its great value. There is no doubt that it is one of the most valuable properties in the city, but if J. P. Morgan & Co. was to remove to any other corner their new location would take on immense value, and the corner of Broad and Wall streets probably would no longer be pointed out as the most valuable."

The corner of Broadway and Wall street brought $558.65 a square foot when it was sold about ten years ago.

In the big cities of the old world the highest value seems to belong to a property in Rome. Here is where a value of $450 is to be found, and strange to relate the plot is not used for an immense income producing building, but includes the property of the German embassy, which holds the embassy building and its extensive gardens. It is in the Palazzo Caffarelli on the Capitoline Hill and has an area of about 3,600 square yards. The German government owns the property and values it at about $1,000,000.

As a matter of fact, however, the land is worth about fifteen times as much. The Palazzo Caffarelli was built some time in the seventeenth century over the remains of the platform of the great Temple of Neptune, which was, as it were, the cathedral of ancient Rome. This temple, originally built in 509 B. C. by King Tarquinus, was buried several times, but always reconstructed, the last time by the Emperor Vespasian, who laid its cornerstone in the year 71 A. D.

Tacitus relates in his history that the magistrates, priests, senators, knights, soldiers and people of Rome on this occasion marched past the shaft into which the inaugural stone was to be sunk, dropping into the cavity a votive offering consisting mainly of gold and silver nuggets "as they came from the mine not worked by hand." Considering that the population of Rome was at that time about a million, thousands and thousands of pounds worth of gold and silver must have been buried under this temple, and this incalculable treasure has never been discovered.

The foundations of the Caffarelli Palace have therefore been laid on a thick layer of gold and silver and the land on which it is built is the most valuable in Rome.

Business property in Rome does not bring nearly the prices paid here. Even in the principal centers of offices and shops the highest values do not amount to much more than $200 a square foot, while every one knows that there are a dozen places in New York which command much higher prices.

Berlin has a property which sold recently for $180 a square foot and thereby established a new high value for real estate in that city. It is located at 113 Leipziger street, corner of Mauer street. Leipziger street is the principal retail street in the city on which all the big shops and department stores are located.

The property is a triangular piece containing about 3,000 square feet. In the recent sale it figured at 2,200,000 marks or $539,000. The building upon it is old, and is occupied by a cigar store, a corset house, and above, offices. Buildings are limited in Berlin to a height of not more than five stories, so that it is not possible by erecting a high building on the property to help its value to increase sufficiently to approach values in New York.

The quarter of Paris where land is dearest is undoubtedly the Place de L'Opera, the square facing the Opera house. Prices there exceed considerably those in any other district, even the Champs Elysees or the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne. For the buildings that face on this square, they are six in number, prices vary at the present moment from 8,000 to 15,000 francs the square metre (from $150 to $280 a square foot). It is difficult to fix an exact price as that depends not only on the situation of the building but also on the leases still in force. None of the six buildings is for sale but compensation for unexpired leases would make their cost to a buyer vary greatly according to the length of time the various leases had to run.

Of the six blocks facing on the Place de L'Opera the one considered to have the greatest value, in the opinion of three experts, is undoubtedly the building belonging to the Fonciere Insurance Company, the ground floor of which is occupied by the Bank Comptoir National d'Escompte. Land on which it is built would easily realize 15,000 francs a square metre (about $280 a square foot), as it occupies an exceptional position, a large triangle, with one angle on the Place de L'Opera, a long side on the Avenue de L'Opera and the two other sides on very important commercial streets, the Rue Quatre Septembre and the Rue Louis Le Grand.

Generally speaking, during the last twelve or fifteen years building land has doubled in price in the principal quarters in Paris, the rents having doubled in the same period. The increase has been exceptional along the grand boulevards; for example, the site of the Olympia Music Hall was sold in 1894 for 1,600 francs the square metre (almost $30 a square foot) and is to-day worth at least 6,000 francs ($112 a square foot).

M. Emile Michel, one of the leading architects of Paris, in giving some of these details, said that only three years ago he was commissioned by a group of capitalists to find what would be the cost of the block of houses which has since been pulled down to build a new street, the Rue des Italiens, off the Boulevards des Italiens. He was offered the entire block at 3,000 francs the metre (almost $56 a square foot), which was considered too high by the capitalists. The price of the site when the new street was made was between 6,000 and 7,000 francs the metre or over double that asked three years earlier.

The street Laffitte and Vivienne, which run near the Bourse (Stock Exchange), have sites which still sell at 1,500, 2,000 and 3,000 francs a square metre ($28, $37 and $56 a square foot), but each house has a different price, as one may cost its buyer double what the neighboring house would, owing to the compensation to be paid for unexpired leases. It is thus almost impossible to fix a price for the sites surrounding the Bourse itself, which belongs mostly to banks and large business houses and are let on very low terms. It is extremely rare that such sites come into the market.

At the present time all architects and agencies are on the lookout for lots on the Avenue dea L'Opeara to buy on behalf of syndicates, but they are not to be found.

One of the causes, perhaps the chief one, of the increased price of building lots is the speculation which has been carried on for some years by capitalists and especially by large building contractors, who have found such speculation a means to gaining millions each year. At the present time the greatest activity in this speculation is being shown in the Passy district and La Mutte (between the centre of the capital and the Bois de Boulogne). Many convents, large buildings often with extensive grounds, have been sold after the departure of the various religious orders owing to the separation laws, at prices from $4 to $20 a square metre and resold by their purchasers, when divided into building lots, at from $40 to $80 a metre within a year of their purchase.

London's real estate values have not varied to any extent for a great many years and the principal values still range about the bank of England property. The land there is largely held in estates and sales are most infrequent so that there is no real basis for calculating actual values. It is reported that the highest price ever paid in London was for a small property on Threadneedle street and in that case the price did not approximate those paid for property on some of New York's secondary shopping streets.—New York Sun.

GLARING SOCIAL CONTRASTS.

Incidentally Casting Some Light on Charges Made Against Socialism.

A pleasant story came from Chicago the other day. It concerns a society lady, a church worker and what-not. The lady bought a dog with a pedigree. A little lap dog with fluffy hair and the dearest little drippy nose in the world. She paid five thousand bucks for the animal and then hired a Pullman car on a passenger train to take the loving little pet from New York, where her purchase was made, to her own home in Chicago. Nurses were in attendance to see that the cur wanted for nothing, porters were on hand to feed it and curry its hair, and train officials watched in guard upon it. The lady herself is at the depot to receive this addition to her family, and is whisked away in an automoile when the dear thing arrives.

The best the market affords will be for the cur's eating, cream, wine and what not for drinking. Maids will wait upon him, give him exercise, wash him and clean him and put him to bed, while his mistress with all her elegance will unbend to kiss the little darling to sleep.

Manifold are the beauties of the system, but none make us appreciate so poignantly its grandeur as little facts like these.

The Chicago lady is not the exception. The Smart Set have just thousands of pampered curs; they are attended on by human beings, and those who do not wait upon them are made to feel inferior to the brutes. They serve them, and the dog, or slut, whatever it may happen to be, is the master or mistress. The animal is part and parcel of the bosses' family and the workers have to bend their backs to provide for the curs.

These are the families that the priests and preachers who are opposed to Socialism are telling the Socialists that they are about to destroy. These are the homes that they are going to break up. Make no doubt that the charge is true; every word of it, and under Socialism there will be no such thing as children starving, children poisoning themselves in a fetid atmosphere, while their fellow workers are killed, to make things pleasant for pedigreed pups.

Nor is this case we have cited only an incident. Not much. There is not a city in the world where there are not hundreds of such cases and hundreds of such animals that man is made to serve and to wait upon because it is the wish of the "society leaders" that they should be served.

Thomas Fortune Ryan built stables for his horses worth sixty thousand dollars. Do you imagine that wealth came to Ryan from heaven? Or that he found it by chance? Or that he made it? He got it through devious channels from men who had no homes; but their labor built those stables for a lot of nags which gave Ryan some comfort.

The stables and the kennels of the Astors are famous on two continents. They derive their money from their New York real estate. Who does not know what that means has never been in the tenement district.

Any day in Chicago or in New York or in San Francisco or in St. Louis one can see dozens and scores of serving men and women strolling along exercising pups of every sort of curdom groomed and dressed for their outing.

These things are so. They are manifestations of capitalism and at the same time, mark well, human beings want for everything. They lack food clothing and shelter. They hunger and starve. These things are also so—they, too, are manifestations of the system.

A professor of the University of .Wisconsin has lately pointed out that a large proportion of the working class are actually in a state of chronic starvation. It was added at the time that no other animals than the working men were in such condition. Likely, too, are they to remain so as long as they will stand for it that their labor is to afford dirty little curs a clean place to sleep and tenderloin and porterhouse when they themselves haven't got the price of a meal.

'Tis to this that capitalism introduces us finally at its apogee, and that is right now. Scented whelps, scented and elegant ladies nursing them—children starving in the mills to make things pleasant for unwholesome curs. Surely such incidents stand revealing to what depths does this capitalism go, and for what purpose labor is exploited And it is significant that the loudest, the most energetic, the most determined and the most vindictive supporters of the system are those who see in man beings whom God died to save. That is the grimmest part of the very irony of it all.—Nome Industrial Worker.

A GREAT AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Cement Resources of the United States Important Factors in a Country's Material Development.

Of the manufacturing industries based on mineral raw materials, one of the most important is the production of Portland cement. This is due not so much to the direct commercial value of the finished product, though the output of Portland cement in the United States is now worth some sixty or seventy million dollars a year, as to the way in which the product enters into general industry. Practically all our great engineering works are composed, in part at least, of cement; many of the larger buildings everywhere are built of reenforced concrete; while in smaller individual lots, but in a vast aggregate, cement finds use on farms, in mining work, in building railroads and irrigation works, as a paving material, and in countless applications elsewhere.

The entire growth of the Portland cement industry in this country has been a matter of a few decades, for the American output in 1880 was only 42,000 barrels, compared with a present annual output close to 80,000,000 barrels. Its growth was at first hindered by mechanical difficulties in plants and machinery, most of which were overcome by American genius, so that now we find plants in Japan, Australia, England, Germany and South Africa using types of kilns and other machinery that were originally invented or perfected in the United States.

As the early difficulties were overcome, attempts were made to extend the manufacture into new localities, and in doing this it was found that knowledge as to the geologic relations of the proposed sites, and as to the limestones and shales that were available at different points was of the greatest possible assistance to the concerns wishing to build plants in new and untried localities. In placing such information at the disposal of the manufacturers, the United States Geological Survey played an important part and a long series of its publications are devoted to various matters of interest to the industry. One of the most extensive of these reports was published in 1905 as Bulletin 243 and was devoted to an account of the manufacture of cement and to detailed descriptions of the raw materials available for cement manufacture in each state in the Union.

The demand for this report was great as soon as its industrial value became generally known, and for a number of years it has been out of print. As the Geological Survey still receives numerous requests for data on the points discussed in Bulletin 243, it was decided to issue an entirely revised edition of the work. The new edition, entitled "Portland Cement Materials and Industry in the United States," has just appeared as Bulletin 522. It contains, in some 400 pages of text, detailed descriptions of the limestones, marls, clays, shales and other cement materials of each of the states; and so far as the importance of the districts justifies it, colored geologic maps, mostly on a uniform base, are included, so as to show the distribution of these raw materials. In addition the new bulletin includes a summary of the factors that influence the selection of various raw materials, notes as to processes of cement manufacture and details as to the history of the cement industry since it began in the United States. In its revised form the bulletin will, it is hoped, be of the same service to the American cement industry of the present day that the earlier issue was to the industry of 1905.

The United States exports very little cement, the quantity annually shipped ranging usually from 1 to 3 per cent of the domestic production. It is probable that in the future much more serious attention will be given to the export trade, particularly by the eastern mills, for its development seems to be the simplest method of disposing of the surplus which now periodically weighs on the eastern cement market. Of course an export trade in a commodity like cement—relatively bulky and low in value—does not promise any large direct profit to the individual producer, but indirectly the creation and maintenance of such a trade will benefit the industry as a whole. Owing to the scarcity in most parts of South and Central America and West Indies of the fuel supplies necessary to the manufacture of cement, the development of local cement industries in those promising markets seems unlikely.—U. S. Geological Survey.

DECREASED GOLD OUTPUT IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The mine production of gold in South Carolina in 1912 was 818.26 fine ounces, valued at $16,915, according to H. D. McCaskey of the United States Geological Survey. The small silver output of 47 ounces, valued at $29, was entirely recovered in refining the gold produced. The total value of the gold and silver yield was $3,470 less than that of 1911. The production given for 1912 was reported from five small placers and seven deep mines, the latter including the well-known Haile mine, the largest producer of low-grade gold ore east of the Homestake in South Dakota. The total tonnage treated in South Carolina in 1912 was 12,358 short tons of siliceous ores, with an average recoverable value of only $1.34 a ton, against 9,302 tons in 1911, with an average recovery of $2.17.

COPPER PRODUCED IN MARYLAND AND PENNSYLVANIA.

From 225,200 short tons of low-grade copper ore in Maryland and Pennsylvania and magnetic iron ore carrying small quantities of copper-bearing pyrite in Pennsylvania there was an output in 1912, according to H. D. McCaskey of the United States Geological Survey, of 502 fine ounces of silver and 594,022 pounds of copper, valued in all at $98,323. The corresponding production in 1911 was valued at $83,194. The Maryland output was derived from concentrates produced at the New London mine, in Frederick county; the Pennsylvania output came in small part from low-grade matte reported produced and shipped from Charmian, where a blast furnace has been built to treat the secondary copper ores of the Catoctin schist, but mainly from the Cornwall iron mines, in Lebanon county, where the Gröndahl process has been in operation for some years, raising the purity of the iron ores and at the same time producing as a valuable by-product briquetted copper-bearing pyrite for sale to copper smelters. The total production of copper from these Cornwall iron mines in the five years, 1908-1912, has been 2,852,160 pounds.

LEAD AND ZINC IN OKLAHOMA.

Increased Output of Both Metals in 1912—Miami District Mines Very Active.

The final figures showing the production of lead and zinc in Oklahoma in 1912, prepared by J. P. Dunlop of the United States Geological Survey, show a mine production of lead and zinc valued at $1,101,042, compared with $812,190 in 1911.

The quantity of lead concentrates sold in 1912 was 4,257 tons, valued at $231,678, of which all but one ton came from the Miami district. The quantity of zinc carbonate and silicate sold was only 92 tons, valued at $2,550. Most of this concentrate came from the Peoria district, where little mining was done in 1912.

The shipments of sphalerite concentrates in 1912 amounted to 12,129 tons, valued at $494,379. Of this output, 250 tons came from the Arbuckle Mountain region, Murray county, in southern Oklahoma, 1,621 tons from the Quapaw district, and 10,258 tons from the Miami district. Many mines in the Quapaw district made no sales of concentrates, and the shipments of galena concentrates declined 328 tons and those of sphalerite more than 600 tons.

The Miami camp was very active. Extensive drilling operations were conducted, and several new concentrating plants were built. At many of the older mines shafts were sunk to a lower run of ore, and in consequence a smaller quantity of concentrates than usual was produced, but the developments were satisfactory and will probably result in a large production. The new properties in the northern portion of the camp made a large yield after the plants were started. In 1912 the Miami district shipped 1,408 tons of galena concentrates and 1,867 tons of sphalerite concentrates more than in 1911, and the value of the recoverable metallic content increased $229,958.

POETICAL

THE WAYS OF KINGS, CROWNED AND UNCROWNED.

By Covington Hall.

Ye are prating of your power, but the sky of time is grey,
And the fullness of your madness it shall ripen with the day.
Ye shall waken in the moment when the great world shakes and reels,
When the mad brute host of hunger from the slums and darkness steals;
Ye shall waken to the reaping of the fruits your hands have sown,
And the measure ye have meted to the race shall be your own.
Think ye not that fate is idle and your own the Supreme Will,
For the wrecks that strew the aeons tell that right is reigning still.
Dream ye not that mammon conquers, trust ye not too much to gold,
For the shell is not the substance, and the flesh is not the soul.
If ye doubt it, pause and listen; lift aside the veil of time.
Where is Rome and all her splendor? Where is Athens, the sublime?
Where are all the Persian millions? Where the proud Egyptian host?
Tell me, does imperial Carthage still adorn the Afric coast?
Where the empire of the Incas? Where is Montezuma's throne?
What is Spain and Spanish glory in the world once called her own?
Where are India's mighty princes? Where the Babylonian kings?
Tell me, ye who kneel in worship at the shrine of earthly things!
Proud ye are, and will not answer—ye are swelled with folly vast—
Neither will ye heed the lesson that is taught by ages past.
Like the scribes of ancient Judah, ye depend on Roman might,
But the buried Christ is risen and the faith still lives tonight.
There be some ye cannot silence; there be some ye cannot kill,
And the blood of martyred spirits is the seed of progress still.
Love and freedom still are powers in the human heart and soul,
And the great, eternal truth is marching onward to the goal!
But all words are worse than useless—Reason's self ye would deride—
Ye are but the sons of folly and the slaves of purse-born pride.
Ye are strangers unto mercy; ye are deaf and dumb and blind;
Ye have never paused to listen to the human heart and mind;
Justice, honor, hope and virtue, ye as evil things disdain;
Lo! I hear the workers coming over hill and dale and plain,
And the Marseillaise is ringing 'round a rebel world again!

THE ROUGHNECK'S BELIEF.

W. E. Hanson, Butte, Montana.

I.

I'm not going to worry 'bout stars in my crown,
Nor about the mansions on high;
Nor do I intend to join in the song
About "such a poor worm as I."
No doubt it's all right to gather the sheaves,
So the Master may harvest the grain,
And give me the story "there's nothing but leaves,"
You have lived your life in vain.

II.

In life I wore an old battered hat;
I'd "look like hell" with a crown;
And I think if I knocked at the "Mansions on high"
I'd be met with rebuffs and a frown.
My kind as a rule are not welcome above,
And I'd rather stand out at the gate
And watch some of the "Christians" I knew on earth
Parade with their crowns of state.

III.

I labored on earth and gathered the sheaves,
To all men been honest and fair;
All men are my brothers and I am a man;
No "worm" business in mine over there.
I won't take my burden to Jesus
And make him shoulder it all.
He has more than enough to carry,
While God "watches the sparrows that fall."

IV.

I don't go much on mansions above—
Had to live in a hovel on earth,
And I don't want to sing in the "heavenly choir"
With those of "superior birth."
So I've traveled the road I laid out for myself;
I'll play the game honest and fair—
Do all I can for man while alive,
Then I'm sure to be right "over there."

V.

I'm not much on this religion;
I've oceans of faith in man;
I am going to finish life's journey,
Giving kindness wherever I can.
Give flowers to friends while they're living,
Remember the man who is down.
As for any reward in that place "over there"
That will be stars enough in my crown.

VI.

This "wings-and-crown" proposition
To many may sound very well,
But no preacher can send me to heaven,
No priest can consign me to hell.
The arguments they are advancing
Are neither honest nor square,
So just do the best that you know while here,
And you will be all right "over there."

"A NOICE, AISY JOB."

W. E. Hanson, Butte, Montana.

Fer a noise aisy job I'd loike to be Bishop
An' live in a house coshtin' t'ousands o' pounds,
Like him, I'd be tellin' what folks should be doin';
Faith, I'd give 'em a pinance, widout anny bounds.
Wid me he'd change places, an' I'm after thinkin',
Whin he shpint tin hours hoishtin' the hod,
An' climbin' up to the foorth an' fift' shtory,
He'd be too toired at night to give t'anks to God.

I'd give him a plow an' a mule that was balky,
An' he'd plow up a field that had plinty o' shtones,
Fram daylight 'til darrkness, wid no toime fer reshtin';
Thin he'd know what it wor to have toired, achin' bones.
Sure 'tis aisy fer him to say "labor is noble";
Ef that is the troot, thin be cripes I'm a king,
But be the same token, 'tis him does no labor,
But say Mass on Sunda an' the Litanies sing.

I'd pit in his hand a shtout shovel fer muckin',
An' a job in a hot box somewhere in the Saint,
'Til his soft han's were blishtered, his back a-breakin';
He'd know thin there wor cause fer the miner's complaint.
'Tis to me ivery pay day he'd give parrt av his airnin's
So that I cud live high on the money he gave,
An' I'll bet a fiver bayfure the year's over
He'd have soom compassion fer thim that musht shlave.

An' he'd live in a cabin wid wan little windy,
An' a dure wid a shtring in the place of a latch;
Inshtead of a dinner wid wine an' a turkey,
'Twould be bacon an' beans, fer be jabers he'd batch.
An' if ever he kim to me house a-complainin
I'd pucker me puss wid a proud holy air,
An' say to him, "Work, be contínted an' humble;
'Twill be dif'rent in Heaven whin ye 'git over there.'"

He'd fusht git a carrd, thin he'd rushtle a job,
Wid his qualifications set down;
He'd rushtle the Speck, the Stewart or Healy,
An' see phat the bosses luck loike whin they frown.
He'd foind out the mines were not half so shplendid
As the company's hoired raypoorters declare,
Wid hot boxes plinty, an' bad groun' a-fallin',
But wage shlaves arr plinty, phat the hell do they care?

Arrah musha 'tis me would loike to be Bishop;
There's be something doin' ivery hour in the day.
'Twould be sinkers an' coffy fer bruckesh, loonch, supper,
Wid three an' a half a week fer his pay.
The half he moight have as a soort av a token,
The t'ree I'd jist pit away in me jeans;
An' he'd change his moind thot labor wor noble
Whin he found out jist phat a labor shlave means.

Byes, I'll take it all back; I don't want to be Bishop;
I wants to be shquare wid those in me class;
'Tis uz overworked shlaves makes masters and Bishops,
An' I'd be out o' place in that parasite mass.
Shure I never cud peddle thim miracle shtories,
Nor give yez a shtone, an' ye ashkin' fer bread,
Ner cud I graft on yer labor whilsht yer livin'
An' kape up the graft long after yer dead.

METAL OUTPUT OF VIRGINIA.

Slight Increase in Silver and Copper Production, but Decrease in Gold, Lead, and Zinc in 1912.

The value of the mine production of gold, silver, copper, lead and zinc in Virginia in 1912, according to H. D. McCaskey of the United States Geological Survey, was $74,855, against $169,394 in 1911. There were sold or treated 5,790 short tons of ore (against 17,782 tons in 1911), yielding (with gold placers and mine waters producing cement copper) $218 in gold, 982 fine ounces of silver, 112,835 pounds of copper, 469,026 pounds of lead and 497,235 pounds of zinc (figured as spelter), against $3,064 in gold, 21 ounces of silver, 90,000 pounds of copper, 830,542 pounds of lead and 2,064,818 pounds of zinc in 1911. The values, besides that of gold, in 1912 were as follows: Silver, $604; copper, $18,618; lead, $21,106, and zinc, $34,309. All the gold yield was recovered from siliceous ores in 1912, and all the silver from the refining of copper. The gold output was derived from small quartz-mine operations in Fauquier and Goochland counties, the copper from pyrite mines in Louisa and Prince William counties and the lead and zinc from Wythe county, in southwestern Virginia.

OUTPUT OF QUARTZ INCREASES.

Nearly 100,000 Tons Produced in the United States in 1912.

One of the lesser industries that is nevertheless of considerable importance is the quarrying and manufacturing of quartz, which is used for many purposes. Its principal uses, according to the United States geological Survey, are in the manufacture of pottery, paints, and scouring soap and as a wood filler.

In pottery the use of quartz diminishes the shrinkage in the body of the ware; it is also used in many glazes. Quartz for use in pottery should contain less than 0.5 per cent of iron-bearing minerals. Considerable quantities of ground quartz are used in the manufacture of paint, as much as one-third of the total pigment used in some paints consisting of this material. Crystalline quartz is superior to silica sand for this purpose because of the angularity of the grains, which makes them adhere more firmly to the painted surface and after wear affords a good surface for repainting. The same property renders ground crystalline quartz superior to silica sand in the manufacture of wood fillers. For soaps and polishing powders quartz is preferred to silica sand on account of its whiteness and angularity. Quartz crushed and graded to various sizes is used in the manufacture of sand paper and sand belts, as a scouring agent, for "frosting" glass with sand-blast apparatus, etc. Blocks of massive quartz and quartzite are used in the chemical industry as a filler for acid towers and as a flux in copper smelting. Ground quartz is also used in filters and in tooth powders and by dentists as a detergent.

Crystalline quartz and also sand have been used in the manufacture of silicon and of alloys of silicon with iron, copper, and other metals in the electric furnace. Quartz may be fused, in the electric furnace to make chemical apparatus, such as tubes, crucibles, and dishes. The principal objection to the use of these wares is that the roughness of their surfaces makes it difficult to wash thoroughly all material from the apparatus.

Good Increase in Production.

The production of quartz in the United States in 1912, according to Frank J. Katz, of the United States Geological Survey, in an advance chapter from "Mineral Resources" for 1912, was 97,874 short tons, valued at $191,685, against 87,943 short tons, valued at $155,122, in 1911, an increase in quantity of 9,931 tons and in value of $36,563. The increase in the quantity of crude quartz was 4,446 tons, with a decrease in value of $3,174. The increase in ground quartz was 5,485 tons in quantity and $39,737 in value.

Tennessee was the largest producer of quartz in 1912 but ranked third in value of product. Maryland was second in output and first in value, with a total production of 16,125 short tons, valued at $62,151.

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE SCRANTON MINE IS STILL ON AT THE TINTIC MINING DISTRICT.

Stay away from Britannia mines, Howe Sound, B. C. The strike is still on.

SEVENTY TWO PER CENT of the people of America do not own a home, and yet, we boast of a glorious country, where every citizen is a king.

THE CIVILIZATION of which we boast, furnishes sumptuous apartments for lap-dogs and banquets for monkeys, while children are sentenced to the mills and factories, to grind out profits for plutocracy. Let us pray.

THE LEGISLATURE of Arizona failed to pass any appropriation for representation at the expositions to be held in San Francisco and San Diego.

The enemies of labor know the reason. "nuf ced."

AN INVESTIGATION into the funds collected by the I. W. W. to carry on the strike at Lawrence, Massachusetts, shows a shortage of $10,800. Who got the swag? The professionals who handled the mazuma. Let us wait patiently and see if the I. W. W. will put the thieves in jail.

WOOD of the Woolen trust in his trial, has been shown to have paid Atteaux $2,600 as strike expenses and the defense is now trying to place all the blame on Pittman the pal of Wood who committed suicide when he realized that the infamy of Wood and himself had been uncovered.

Pittman cannot speak and it is perfectly legitimate and consistent with the ethics of capitalism, to place the responsibility of crime on the dead.

Any parties having copies of The Magazine of the above dates will do the Western Federation of Miners a favor by forwarding same to Ernest Mills, 605 Railroad Building, Denver, Colorado.

HAS ANYONE HEARD of the notorious Patrick Scullin who was last heard of in British Columbia, working his graft to establish friendly relations between Brother Labor and Brother Capital?

His services are now wanted in the settlement of differences between the United States and Japan.

IT IS REPORTED in the press dispatches that the prosecution has dropped the remaining indictments against Clarence Darrow. It is about time that the persecutors crawled into their holes. Organized labor coming to the front and taking up the fight of Darrow, gave chills to the parasitic hyenas of Los Angeles.

STUDENTS at famed institutions of learning are making reputations as strike-breakers.

When educational institutions are converted into strike-breaking agencies to suppress labor and crush unionism, it is about time that the workingman realized that there is a class struggle.

THE STRIKING MINERS at Wharton, New Jersey, have scored a victory. They have secured an eight-hour day and no discrimination. All strikers are to be returned to their former positions. They are to be paid twice a month and the company is to recognize the check-off system, providing such system is not contrary to the laws of the state. The scale of wages is to be considered later on.

GOVERNOR HATFIELD of West Virginia has lost some of his bravado since the United States Senate has passed the resolution demanding a sweeping investigation of conditions in America's Russianized Siberia. When Senator Kerns introduced his resolution, Hatfield branded the Indiana Senator as a "peanut politician" and it is now in order for the official braggart of the coal corporations, to brand the Senate of the United States as a combination of peanut politicians. Will he do it? Nit.

SENATOR KERN of Indiana has incurred the animosity of a master class, because he dared to introduce a resolution in the United States Senate providing for a federal investigation of conditions in the strike zone of West Virginia.

The strikers of West Virginia, backed by the labor movement of America and the Socialist party, have demanded an investigation and if the strikers have been anarchists, murderers and outlaws, then why are the paid hirelings of the capitalist press howling against such an investigation?

If the strikers have committed the crimes charged against them by the subsidized organs of corporate tyrants, than why are the salaried henchmen who lie for lucre, protesting against such an investigation?

Why?

THE CAT is out of the bag, at least for those who have been too blind to see an apparent truth. Even charity that covereth a multitude of sins—sweet charity—is a graft. "Investigation" in Chicago has developed the fact that at least 53 per cent of the charity offerings never get to "the worthy poor," but are diverted through many winding, expensive and devious channels to the pockets of those who handle them. Only 47 per cent reach the poor. The millions and millions of dollars that the wealthy parasites each year pay out to purchase popularity and public favor from a victimized public is used mainly to line the fat purses of assiduous grafters who are in the "charity business" for what they can get out of it. Business is business; so is charity. In some instances it has graduated so wholly into business that it is incorporated and dividends are declared by its enterprising promoters. But why should we kick about this? The mere stealing of charity money is not half so bad as the simple and elemental insult and outrage involved in the whole system by which social parasites hope to buy fame and adulation for themselves and rivet the bonds on the wrists of their victims and slaves. Capitalistic charity is the most damning thing this side of hades and we hope the charity grafters are able soon to swipe the whole swag.—Inter-Mountain Worker.

IN REVIEWING the results of the Socialist vote in the city election of Chicago, and the fact that out of some 5,500 votes in the First Ward, the slum district controlled by "Bathhous John" and "Hinky Dink," the Socialists secured only 201 votes, despite their vigorous propaganda in the ward, seems to prove the shrewd observation made by Marx in the Communist Manifesto, when he referred to the lowest class of society as the "dangerous class" to the realization of our ideals of social reorganization. The social scum, a passively rotting mass, thrown off by the lowest layers of old society, many occasionally be swept into the movement, but its conditions of life, however, prepare it far more for the part of a bribed tool of reactionary intrigue.

This should be sufficient proof that Socialism can not hope to make any real progress by appealing to the down-and-out element of society. The moral sensibilities of this class have become dulled and blunted, and their immediate economic necessities will compel them to perpetuate a system of which they are the poor, helpless victims, by their venal votes.

Our ultra-reactionary Socialists, who are so fond of loudly proclaiming the philosophy of misery idea as making for Socialism, ought to learn something from the repeated election results as seen in Chicago's First Ward, and other similiar experiences in all our large cities. It requires intelligence to become a good Socialist, and conditions that make for extreme poverty and misery are not conducive to intelligent action.—Pittsburg Socialist.

The above editorial comment of the Pittsburg Socialist, on the meagre vote in the slum district of Chicago, is well worthy of serious consideration. The very fact that 201 votes were polled out of 5,500, against the industrial slavery of our economic system, speak volumes and tells but too forcibly that where abject poverty and the wretchedness of want prevail, that there is little hope for that unity of political action that has for its object the emancipation of labor. Where we find poverty garbed in rags and squalor enduring the agonies of a lingering death, there must we expect to find ignorance and servility, and there must we expect the victims of slow but sure starvation, to cringe like sycophants beneath the lash of a master's whip.

THE CONFESSION of Woods' pal, implicating the head of the woolen trust in a despicable attempt to discredit Lawrence strikers, tells no new story to workers, though it will startle a lot of people who have been ignorant of the desperate methods employed to break strikes.

It is doubtful if Wood will ever be placed behind the bars, as his immense resources and powerful backing makes it possible to appeal the case indefinitely.

The great victory, however, is in exposing trust's methods, and the longer the case is fought, the longer it will be in the public eye—which means discussion and education.

Wood is already convicted before the jury of American fair-mindedness, and he presents a contemptible picture as the tale is unfolded by one who did the dirty work and was then "dumped" by Wood, who has descended so low that he would not only destroy life and property to break a strike waged by miserably paid slaves, but would desert the men who helped him.

Was Judas or Benedict Arnold more loathsome than this money-mad wretch, who masks as a "prominent citizen?"—Toledo Union Leader.

It is not necessary that Wood should be singled out for an excoriation. The act of Wood in having dynamite planted to discredit men, women and children on strike against starvation wages and to poison public sentiment against them, is in accord with almost every act of the exploiter to smirch the character of labor, in order that the working class shall be looked upon as a criminal mob. Dynamite has been planted scores of times, in order that degenerates and moral perverts in broadcloth, might denounce hungry slaves in rags.

Wood was "caught with the goods," and the unfortunate part of the transaction for the magnate of the woolen trust, was that his accomplices through fear, squealed on their paymaster. Had the plot of Wood and his confederates succeeded, some of the strikers would now be wearing the garb of convicted felons, and though innocent, Wood and his hirelings would permit them to rot in prison, knowing that if the public believed in their guilt, the capitalists could yell "anarchists," and intimate, that labor as a body, was responsible for the crime.

It may cost Wood some money, ere he is through with the courts, but it is reasonable to predict that the multi-millionaire will suffer no other inconvenience.

MANY PEOPLE agree with us that the end for which organized labor strives is praiseworthy, but they shy at the weapons with which organized labor fights. They call us cave men with primitive instincts because we use the strike and boycott and because some misguided individual or set of individuals sometimes fights with bricks or cobble-stones. They forget that these are not the days of industrial peace but the days of industrial war. Community of interest between employer and employé makes a nice theme for an economic thesis, but it is as mythical as any tale of mythology. It is the instinct of man to have and to hold, and instinct has been added to by a carefully worked out system by which the many toil and spin and have not, while the few toil and spin not and have. The labor struggle is not an Alphonse and Gaston affair. No struggle worthy of the name ever is. We fight with such weapons as we find in our hands. The higher our grade of intelligence the more refined the weapons we use. It is not strange that labor, having nothing but its labor power, no other strength but its own brute physical strength, strikes out blindly. When men fight by instinct rather than by intelligence, it is not strange that instinct chooses the weapons and that they are primitive and brutal. As fast as labor learns other weapons, such as the use of the ballot, how to create and direct public sentiment, how to capture the machinery of courts and law-making bodies, it uses them and lays aside the bludgeon. They learn those things as intelligence grows and intelligence grows as leisure to study and observe grows. Notice that the most bitter, brutal and dogged industrial conflicts of the day are in the industrial centers where men and women work excessively long hours under abhorrent conditions—conditions which dwarf and kill the better instincts of mankind. One of the most revolutionary and yet peaceable struggles that ever occurred in this country was the nation-wide strike for an eight-hour day in the printing industry. The opposition of employers was no less keen than in other great struggles, but a different type of men was involved—a disciplined class of men, who fought with intelligence rather than with brute force. Men are creatures of environment, always. No class of labor will ever be satisfied with the crumbs that fall from the table of industry but there will be a difference in their methods according to their varying degree of intelligence. If society tolerates a set of conditions that makes brutes they may expect that the revolt against those conditions will be alike brutal. If people would lose some of their squeamishness over the throwing of a few bricks and pay more attention to the underlying causes of industrial strife, they would gain an entirely different conception of the labor movement.—Labor Journal, Everett.

WM E. TRAUTMANN, formerly general secretary of the I. W. W., who has made the public charge that the Lawrence defense fund was juggled before he took control of affairs, announced to a friend in the East, a few days before he exploded his bomb, that he didn't expect to remain a member of the I. W. W. very long. Now comes one Justice Ebert, a doughty champion of the St. John-Heslewood element, and declares that Trautmann is a falsifier and discredited official of the Wonder Workers, and also that he will not remain a member very long. So it begins to look as though Trautmann will resign and then be kicked out to boot, as was the practice in the good old S. L. P. days. Whenever and wherever a "fakir" dared to question the infallibility of Dan De Leon that worthy used to jump up in his sanctum sanctorium, clutch at his whiskers, make a wild kick at some imaginary object, and then announce in the next issue of his "Peeble" that So-and-so had been expelled for committing high treason against the working class, he being the w. c. nearly all those who aided in launching the I. W. W. seven years ago are now out—and trying to forget it. Charley Sherman, the first I. W. W. president, seceded with a few faithful followers who soon scattered to the earth's four corners; Moyer, Mahoney and Cannon withdrew with the Western Federation of Miners and later joined the A. F. of L.; Dan De Leon gathered his faithful few ex-S. T. L. A. followers about him and departed, setting up an opposition I. W. W. labeled "Detroit fraction," which he vehemently insists, is the only genuine article; Rev. Hagerty, who planned the thing with a zodiacal chart, a miter, a hammer and a set of resolutions, has disappeared over the hills somewhere and is lost to sight and hearing; Gene Debs quit in disgust when the Won't Works began to sing "Halleujah, I's a bum!" and spend the rest of their time shrieking at trade unions, and John W. Slayton and a number of others, were likewise affected. Now Trautmann's grip is packed and he is on his way. The Citizen has it upon the best of authority that a convention of local unions affiliated with the I. W. W. in the East, chiefly miners, will also be held in the near future for the purpose of considering the advisability of seceding from the St. John-Haywood outfit. General dissatisfaction with the imperialistic policies of the leading officials is given as the reason for this contemplated bolt. On the other hand, Eastern papers quote Organizer Frank Daniels, of the I. W. W., as saying that a convention of miners is to be held in Pottsville, Pa., in the near future to begin a campaign to wage war upon the United Mine Workers throughout the three anthracite coal districts. The fight will not last long and the finish can be predicted without great difficulty.—Cleveland Citizen.

MORE MEN have been disfranchised in this country by legislation since the civil war than have been enfranchised in Europe during the same period. Throughout the Solid South conditions as to voting are far worse than in Belgium. There fully three-fourths of the adult male population are disfranchised by property, poll-tax and residence qualifications. In almost every state there have been insidious encroachments upon universal suffrage during the last decade. Everywhere naturalization is being made more difficult in order to disfranchise the foreign-born worker, and this assault upon his right to vote grows more vigorous just in proportion as he exercises intelligence in the use of the ballot. In view of these facts it is a little early to rejoice over the security of this country against uprisings to secure the ballot.—Coming Nation.

The above editorial comment in the Coming Nation on disfranchisement, demonstrates that the element in society whose economic power makes this government subserve the interests of privilege, realize but too well the potency of that bloodless weapon, known as the ballot.

The class that rules has invaded the domain of suffrage and placed such restrictions on the right to cast a ballot, that millions of adults in the country have no voice in the government under which they live.

A certain element in the ranks of the proletaire who dub themselves revolutionists have repeatedly declared on the platform and in the press, that the ballot is a worthless weapon in the struggle for industrial liberty.

If that declaration is true, then it seems strange and singular that capitalism engages the most expensive talent to restrict by legislation the voting power of the working class.

Let us presume for a moment that the workers of America forwarded a petition to Washington asking that labor throughout the United States be disfranchised, will any one attempt to deny but that all the forces against labor would give such a petition their unqualified approval?

The fact that labor has achieved so little, comparatively, by the use of the ballot, is not an argument against the ballot, but the little accomplished, is proof that labor has not yet learned to cast an intelligent ballot.

Labor has been voting against labor's interests, for the simple reason, that labor has been blinded to its class interests through the verbal opiates administered to the working class by the ablest and most cunning defenders of our brutal system of exploitation.

The sun of intelligence is however rising, and its rays are dispelling the gloom of ignorance that has shrouded the brain of the slave. The slave is learning to use the ballot in every nation of the world, and the ballot, the peaceable weapon of humanity backed by solidarity on the industrial field, will win the heritage of economic freedom.

Another Shady I. W. W. Deal Uncovered

A SHORTAGE of $10,800 has been discovered by an investigator appointed by a Boston court to inquire into the manner in which $68,000 subscribed for the benefit of striking Lawrence Textile Workers, last year, had been expended. The court selected Winfield S. Slocum, an expert accountant, to go over the books, and in the report filed with the court, Slocum states that no satisfactory explanation has been made for the disappearance of $10,800.

The continued discovery that the I. W. W. is afflicted with "sticky fingers" is creating a panic among those who have been boosting the game for many years. Even the Ettor and Giovannitti trial fund is now charged with being juggled. W. E. Trautmann makes this statement in a recent issue of the New York Call. He says money contributed to rescue Ettor was wrongfully applied, Trautmann evidently sees the finish of the game, and at a recent meeting of the Pittsburg I. W. W. he charged all manner of crookedness and "machine rule," and announced he would no longer be connected with the outfit. He favors starting a new movement.

Trautmann was one of the original self-styled "revolutionists" who held a meeting in 1904 to discuss the formation of a new labor movement. This resulted in a secret gathering of 40 men in Chicago, the following January, when the I. W. W. was launched, although the birth was formally announced at a called convention the following June. Since then Trautmann has been general secretary of an institution that was supposed to supplant the A. F. of L. But the continued exposures has driven another of the original crowd into the timber brush.—Toledo Union Leader.

The above statement in the Toledo Union Leader is only one of the many stories of dishonesty that have come to the surface relative to the manner in which funds are handled by the irresponsible Workless Wanderers. Spokane had its stories of fraud and dishonesty, and San Diego furnished another chapter in the history of the "frenzied financiers" of the I. W. W.

In every place where the I. W. W. could precipitate a strike or launch a free speech fight the funds were handled in such a manner, that the professionals enjoyed the luxuries of easy street.

The one big union, according to plans formulated by Trautmann, is to be succeeded by another big union, and when dissension, disruption and dishonesty shall shatter the big union that is to be nursed by Trautmann, there will spring from the fragments another big union, and big unions will be launched, just as long as the gullible will swallow the bait.

It is about time that working men put on their thinking caps to protect themselves from crooks and swindlers, who mask their perfidy, by yelling one big union, direct action, sabotage and "hit the ballot box with an axe.

Pandering to Privilege

THE HERALD-REPUBLICAN of Salt Lake in an editorial a short time ago under the caption: "A Fearless Governor," had the following to say:

The maintenance of law and order is one of the prime duties of the chief executive of a commonwealth. When that is impossible through the civil authority and the peace officers are unable to cope with the situation, it is the obvious obligation of the governor to use the power conferred upon him and call the military arm into service. That has been done by Governor Hatfield in the coal mining districts of West Virginia, and he is reaping a choice crop of condemnation as a result.

A state of civil war has existed in West Virginia for months. Agitators, professional enemies of orderly government, seized upon a prolonged strike of miners as their opportunity to commit the excesses of which they are fond. The governor acted promptly and fearlessly, and should be commended for it.

Liberty is our greatest American heritage and it is our duty to prevent its being degenerated into license."

The above editorial comment on the conditions in West Virginia and the conduct of the governor, is what might have been expected from a daily journal whose vision is focused on dollars.

The Herald-Republican knows its masters voice and realizes that loyalty to capitalism means dividends.

The Herald-Republican knows that speaking the truth through the editorial columns of a newspaper in a conflict between master and slave, would mean financial losses, and the Herald-Republican has long since learned that mental prostitution commands a higher price than fidelity to truth and loyalty to honor.

The Herald-Republican knows that Governor Hatfield of West Virginia trampled legal rights and constitutional liberty under foot, and prostituted the office of chief magistrate to serve the interests of the mine-owners and to deliver a solar-plexus blow to the strikers, who rebelled aganist industrial slavery in a domain where the dictum of a corporation assassinated human rights under that boasted document known as the constitution.

"Law and order," is but the pretext used by officials in high places to establish a reign of anarchy under forms of law to suppress every effort on the part of the toiler to improve his material condition. With the governor of West Virginia, the labor movement struggling to advance the interests of the working class, is looked upon as criminal, and such effort on the part of labor, must be crushed by the armed power of military might. The man who speaks for the material prosperity of the working class, is branded as an agitator, and when a woman in her eightieth year raises her voice against economic slavery she must be silenced by incarceration in a military bastile.

When a governor of a state panders to privilege at the expense of human liberty, such journals as the Herald-Republican hail such an official as a fearless governor and such laudation is due to the fact, that profit is more priceless than human freedom.

Public Enemies

THERE ARE VARIOUS KINDS of traitors. There is the traitor who betrays his country in time of war. There is the traitor who betrays his country in time of peace. There are traitors who betray their country not by opposing its rightful desires, but by fostering and encouraging madness. They do worse than give aid and comfort to its enemies. They aid it to become its own enemy. In this latter class belong the men who try to involve their country in a foolish and criminal war, and pre-eminent among them in present-day America stands William Randolph Hearst

If there is ever a war between this country and Japan, the blame for that war will rest in part upon the shoulders of Hearst. It would be too flattering to Hearst to assume that by his unaided influence he could bring on a war, or stop one. But there is no room to doubt that he is doing whatsoever lies in his power to create bitter feeling against the Japanese, the natural issue of which is an inflamed state of popular opinion which, carried to excess, will some time demand war.

What a dreaful and shocking crime against the human race such a war would be only those who have seen wars or even studied the effects of wars, can realize. No benefit that could possibly accrue to either nation, or to the yet unborn descendents of either nation, could possibly pay for the tithe of the needless waste of property and lives, for the degradation of national morals which inevitably follows a great war, for the crushing blow which would be dealt to the spread of Christian civilization throughout the Orient. No question would be finally settled, no good accomplished. It would be a bargain in which both bargainers would buy only blood and tears.

This is the horrible crime toward which Hearst and his accomplices are leading us. Every incitement to national prejudice, every plea to rest our claims upon guns and battleships, bayonets and soldiers, is a plea for such a carnival of waste and bloodshed as a great modern war must be.

No sane man, however narrow in his national sympathies, would vote for war if he could have looked into the trenches at Port Arthur, or the besieging camps at Adrianople, or the plague-stricken lines of the Tchatalja. No nation, acutely realizing what war means, would ever tolerate it. It is a game where both sides lose, especially the common men, who shoulder the muskets and suffer the tortures.

We can settle without bloodshed, if we keep sane, whatever differences we have with Japan. Any man who tries to unbalance our sanity and plunge us into war is an enemy of us all.—San Francisco Bulletin.

A "Law and Order" Mix-Up

A PRECEDENT which we sincerely hope will be widely followed is that set by the citizens of Wharton, N. J., who during a strike of local miners, arose in their civic wrath and chased out of their midst a gang of some 300 gunmen, toughs and thugs, imported as deputies for the preservation of the local peace.

Though the good citizens routed the ruffianly invaders with guns and dynamite cartridges in the manner usually ascribed to "anarchists," no criticism of their conduct appears in the press. On the the contrary, it is admitted that what they did was done in the interest of local peace and quietness, and they have secured that condition by driving out the swarm of imported scoundrelism poured upon them by the mine owners.

Had the strikers alone been responsible for this repulse, the howl of "anarchy" would have arisen to the high heavens, and a second assault with perhaps three times the number of thugs would have been instantly made. The citizens would have been represented as in mortal terror of the strikers, and as eagerly welcoming the host of deliverers, and their attitude would have been featured as a sample of American "public opinion" sternly determined on the suppression of strike lawlessness.

It would perhaps be too much to claim that the citizens of Wharton are in favor of the strikers, and that local "public opinion" has decided that their cause is just. In all probability most of them have little use for the strikers, but it is certain that they have less use for the outside savages so insolently let loose upon them by the local mine owners. Probably it is a case with them of choosing the least of two evils. What they did, however, shows better than words their opinion as to the comparative "lawlessness" of either side.

It is natural enough that the smaller cities should be the first to set this example. In a large city the presence of a band of these hoodlums on the scene of a strike passes mostly unnoticed, but in a smaller city, where they practically take charge of the place, their presence becomes intolerable.

Deprived of the services of these scalawags, the local mine owners now admit that if they cannot get "action," they will have to shut down, which is tantamount to admitting that they cannot win if peace and order is preserved, but the strikers can; that in order to succeed they must be permitted to murder the strikers and terrorize the inhabitants with impunity, and that this procedure is what they consider as "getting action."

Naturally, a peaceful community like Wharton resents such an invasion of scoundrelism, and it is to be hoped its example will be followed by other localities. The professional strikebreaker is coming to be recognized as a much more intolerable plague to the community than the striker, recruited, as he must necessarily be, from the most criminal element of the population, and the revolt against his presence in Wharton is a most encouraging and healthy social symptom, even if sympathy for the strikers has little or nothing to do with it.—New York Call.

The above editorial in the New York Call relative to the uprising on the part of the citizens of Wharton, New Jersey, in conjunction with the strikers to give battle to thugs and degenerates, who had been imported to create a reign of lawlessness, is worthy of comment and likewise worthy of consideration on the part of the working class.

Had the thugs and moral perverts confined their assaults upon the strikers, it is probable, that those not directly involved in the strike, would have taken no action favorable to those who were resisting the opposition of an unreasonable and arrogant mining corporation. But the outlaws and professional sluggers imported by the mine owners threw discretion to the winds and pursued a course of conduct that enraged the people of Wharton, and as a result of a lack of discretion and diplomacy on the part of the strikebreaking mob, the people arose in rebellion and took the law into their own hands to rid the community of a horde of moral reptiles, in whose presence, not even innocent childhood was safe from insult or outrage.

The mine-owners in a fight to hold labor in slavery and subjection had not even any respect or consideration for those that were not directly involved in the strike, but brought into a community the lowest types of debauched humanity, to insult and outrage the moral sense of the people, in their relentless efforts to drive their slaves back to the mines.

The people of Wharton, New Jersey, have been taught the lesson, that capitalism in its mad race for dividends, has neither heart nor soul, but that profit is God.

States' Rights and Wrongs

THE WEST VIRGINIA OPERATORS, and allied interests, fearing Federal investigation, have raised the much-abused bogy of "abrogation of States' rights."

The policy of retaining the power of governing as close to the governed as possible is not bad of itself. But states, like individuals, must recognize that the liberty of the smaller community is limited; must be curbed when abuse of such liberty interferes with the political well-being of the greater community of which each of them is a part. The "predatory interests" are taking all advantage of this doctrine that is firmly believed in by many well-meaning, honest citizens; are using for their own advantage prejudices against interference by a central government in questions of state control.

When representatives of the workers petition their legislatures for reforms of the laws that will give them some protection from the greed of the employers, such as shorter hours for women and minors; abolition of child labor, or raising of the minimum age; laws for safeguards in mines or factories, minimum wage laws and compensation for injury laws, the lobby representing the employers will never be found disputing the justice or benefits of such laws. Ever you will find them calling the attention of the legislators to their competitive relations with other states; crying that the passage of such laws will drive the industry that the law in question may affect out of the particular state where proposed.

In nearly every instance the claim will be made that if there was any assurance of such laws being generally adopted there would be no objections to their passage. And so, we have the spectacle of each of the great commonwealths of the land refusing to pass laws each recognizes as beneficial to its citizenship until all the others have passed such laws. An impassable barrier; profitable only to the few.

But, whenever it is proposed to bring about these reforms, conceded beneficial if general, by Federal legislation, we immediately find these same representatives of the exploiting interests calling on high heaven to witness the ruin that would follow to the institutions of the country if the rights of local self-government were in any measure abrogated.

The insincerity of these self-seeking "protectors of out time-honored institutions" is only too evident.

The "institutions" they are so anxious to protect is the profits from the unrequited toil of the workers; the privilege of leaving their machinery unguarded, their mines unsafe; the power to reap the profits from the work of the veriest babes, to force the price of labor down below the point of subsistence; the right to disclaim any responsibility for the human wrecks, generally victims of the lack of needed safeguards, or of unsanitary conditions in shops or mines.

The case now before the United States Senate, the conditions that obtain in West Virginia, not only those that did obtain during the strike on Paint Creek and on Cabin Creek, threaten the health and well-being of every worker in the country.

Not only that men from every part of the country were brought in and held against their will, and even women from other states imported and forced to live lives of shame, in an attempt to hold the men, not only because citizens of foreign lands had to be rescued by the representatives of their country from virtual slavery, to the shame of all respecting citizens of this land, everywhere, but because the claim will be made by employers in competing states that the conditions forced upon these unfortunate, unprotected workers are the conditions necessary to themselves if they must compete in the same market.

If conditions are such that an investigation would not verify our charges, why is there so much opposition raised to the investigation?

The entire country is pointing to West Virginia. Only representatives of those who are exploiting that state would prevent the fullest investigation.—United Mine Workers' Journal.

The Letter of Trautmann to Haywood

WILLIAM E. TRAUTMANN has written a lengthy letter to William D. Haywood, and the same was published in the Daily People of New York of the issue of May 24th. The letter of Trautmann contains some statements relative to the I. W. W. that should be known to the membership of the bona-fide labor movement of this continent.

Trautmann has been on the inside of the I. W. W. and it is reasonable to presume that he knows what he is talking about. His charges are made in the open, and silence on the part of those who are guilty of perfidy will not be accepted by the thousands of men and women whose contributions made life easy for the professional sharks of the bummery.

From the many exposures that have been made alleging dishonesty in the handling of funds for strikes and free speech fiascos, it is evident that the time is near at hand, when the I. W. W. must purge itself of the shameless grafters and fakirs who have yelled "one big union." while putting into their pockets the money generously contributed by members of organized labor and the socialist party.

The letter of Trautmann is lengthy, but we deem that it is worthy of publication in the Miners' Magazine, in order that members of the labor movement and the socialist party may no longer be the victims of criminal parasites who fatten on funds filched from good men and women, who have been deluded by the bombast and noise of an aggregation, to whom honor is a stranger.

The letter of Trautmann to Haywood is as follows:

To William D. Haywood:—

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has nolle-prossed the indictments, for conspiracy on eighteen (18) counts, against you and others. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, through the master chancery appointed, has given out a finding on the Lawrence strike funds. Both these cases hung like a cloud over the heads of the few who know, and knew all the inside facts. The cloud is removed. Further silence would be construed as a crime against the proletarian movement.

You know I promised disclosures as early as in July last year. That time I wanted to risk my own liberty and go to jail. But others had to be considered. Silence became a supreme duty. No more so to-day. Silence would be a felony, on my part, and, I say it emphatically, on your part also.

The Industrial Workers of the World has lost the confidence of the wage earners, no longer can it be trusted as being sincere with the proletariat. You know it, and you struggled hard to make the organization redeem itself. It seems to be impossible.

Attacks on all those who disagree; insults and vilification against all who believe in working class political action through working class parties; the sneer at and jeer of ideals and ethics as strong motive forces in the struggle for working class emancipation; by an element which Karl Marx and so also Engels branded as the "scavengers" on the battle field of labor, form to-day the whole DESTRUCTIVE propaganda of the Industrial Workers of the World.

You are aware of these facts. You complained about. You promised and tried hard to use your influence for remedial enactments. Has anything been accomplished? No, decidedly no! Now, some will aver, you are an unconscious instrument in the hands of an inner circle, which unscrupulously is preparing for more Harry Orchard and McManigal frame-ups against those who are hated and therefore to be doomed by the oppressors of labor and their tools. There was a time when the workers, pitched in battle with their adversaries, enthusiastically cheered the great principles that gave birth to the Industrial Workers of the World. But can anyone wonder that they are now turning away in disgust and amazement? Don't they see that all the declarations that within the I. W. W. the workers are being trained for self-government of their jobs and their life-affairs are sheer mockeries and frauds!

Consideration for others forcing silence on my part, no longer exists. In the Massachusetts Supreme Court your name, and so also mine, are connected together in an evident desire on the part of our enemies to implicate the Industrial Workers of the World in financial wrongdoing. But on the Lawrence strike fund you and I, and others, can claim a clean bill. And why so? In Lawrence, in Lowell, and I presume so also now in Paterson, the workers, through their own committees and institutions, administered all affairs. They courted not nor countenanced outside interference. They supervised the funds, ordered and examined all expenditures. The actions the speeches, the educational work done by the servants of the workers, and you were one of them, was subject to control by the workers and their committees. There were no volunteers, no scavenger-organizers with their pestilent air. They appeared only after the smoke of battle had cleared away, like in the Paris Commune, in the slaughter of the revolution in the Moscow uprising, the premature revolution of the Baltic provinces.

But this democratic management of affairs which marked the Lawrence and the Lowell strikes, as historic landmarks in the labor movement, was destroyed immediately after the termination of these conflicts. You are aware of the autocratic orders by which, in defiance of the expressed will of the rank and file in Lawrence, the supervising committee over the financial transaction was dissolved. "It's bad business," was your only comment. And this high-handed act engineered by the all-powerful General Secretary-Treasurer of the Industrial Workers of the World is responsible that now it its charged, in the findings of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, that thousands of dollars have been misused. Who can contradict that statement? All loud clamors by Ebert and others to the contrary notwithstanding, it is true that books have been tampered with. The textile-worker employed in the office who called first attention to this fraud, could not be swayed to remain an abettor of the felonious acts. Her penalty is now abuse, and vilification, by the "gang" in power, but the ravings of the scavengers only prove that they will resort to the most despicable means, if need be to assassination, to silence the voice of those who still believe that the "revolutionary industrial union movement" should no longer be allowed to be the stamping ground for adventurers and reactionists, in disguise, running amuck as rabid revolutionists.

The labor movement of America has passed, in the last seven years, through three important developments. In all of these the employing class tried to pit against the working class its resources, its wits, its political and economic agencies. The workers had nothing but their economic and meager financial solidarity to combat the evil designs of their oppressors with. Working class ethics and principles, visions that the men on the firing line were but expressions of a great economic unrest, was one of the strong powerful forces that finally carried the day for the proletariat. You as one were acquitted of the charge of a foul crime.

The Orchards and McParlands had sworn you would not leave Idaho alive. Both had worked on the inside, one in the Molly Maguires, the other with the Western Federation of Miners.

McManigal and his partner James McNamara, were working on the inside, aided and abetted by an inner circle, as brought out in the Indianapolis trial. The American Federation of Labor had its hired gangmen everywhere to slaughter and to maim all who stood in their way.

But the working class turned in disgust from the gang of assassinators, and they spurned the idea that the progress and success of the movement depended on the sly conspiracies of inner circles.

The proletariat vindicated itself as the great supreme force in determining the affairs and their own destinies by again rushing to the rescue of Ettor, Giovannitti and Caruso when they found that it was the employing class that had conspired in a clumsily executed attempt to lay the blame for terroristic acts on the toiling struggling masses.

The toiling and struggle mass presented to the world the object lessons of sound, honest and, above all, clean unpolluted reasoning. They have decreed; they have spoken; they, the workers. No more Orchards! No more McManigals! No more McNamaras! No more Johannsons or Tveitmoes! No more Greens, or Joys, or Donnellys, as in the Ettor-Giovannitti trial! Inner circle have to go. Tools of them have to be exposed so that the American labor movement be vindicated against the charge that some few self-selected try to overthrow the capitalist system behind the backs of the oppressors, and think they can get off with the glories as great heroes and redeemers of the race.

You as one ought to have profited from the experience in your own career.

We are again heading towards another crisis in the labor movement. You know it! You commented again, "bad business."

But saying is not undoing. You are in possession of a letter of December, 1912. This letter conveys the information from the General Secretary of the I. W. W. that complaint should not be made that a certain person is serving in detective agencies; that he was doing so with the approval of the general offieers of the Industrial Workers of the World . You promised, when getting that letter from the writer of this, to immediately proceed to stop such "bad business." Was it done? No, decidedly no!

Who knows how many are in this bad business at the instigation of the general officers of the Industrial Workers of the World? Who knows whenever the volunteers are dispatched to places where the proletarians are engaged in battle who are there with obscure intents? who knows what they are liable to pull off so that the capitalists have the welcome excuse to put away and annihilate all whom they hate as constructive industrial Socialists? Can anyone trust his fate to such conglomerations, of volunteer- destructionists, of whom no one knows what they represent, what they are on the scene of battle for? What should the men and women think who are fighting in front of the firing ine, when they must be afraid all the time that the volunteers are merely "agents provocateurs" bent upon inciting trouble for others. You know of it enough of it at least. And some day, if this practice is continued the world will with amazement awaken to the fact that Azeff incidents in the revolutionary movement of Russia, and the Mellivier "agent provocateur" stunts within the "Confederatione du Travaile" of France which caused the slaughter of nine workers in Ville de Neuve, will find their shocking counterpart in the movement now headed towards such calamities under the all-omnipotent direction of the one man at the head of the Industrial Workers of the World.

If you refuse to raise your voice in protest against this "bad business" as you yourself branded it, you will be held responsible in equal share with all the others, for the dire consequences that the student of contemporary occurrences can easily foresee.

There is system in this bad business. There is deliberate design in giving one kind of measure to prominent leaders, and a different treatment to the common herd.

Prominent leaders when arrested are given all the legal assistance. Press and public are used to champion their cause. There can be no objection, but it disproves the theory that the "breaking-into jail" to undo objectionable interference in the rights of workers is, after all, the evaporation of diseased brains. Yes, if all would break in, if all would be willing to share in the sacrifice;—perhaps the arguments that the taxpayers would have to go bankrupt would hold water. But preferable to that would be the prison-ruled life under State Socialism, to be sure.

But what of the workers not so prominent? In Rhodesdale, O., imprisoned mine workers, members of the I. W. W., have appealed in vain to the fountain heads of the I. W. W. for support of their cases. Much-abused lawyers, members of the Socialist party, had to be appealed to to take up the cases of these men, one of whom was to be sent for years into the grave behind prison bars on trumped-up charges.

In Akron, O., a score of workers, all foreign born with two exceptions, were thrust into the dungeons, on the promise that their cases would be taken care of, and that the jails would be filled to break the conspiracy of the rubber kings to railroad workers into the penitentiary. But the jails were not filled. The lawyers engaged to appeal the cases of the imprisoned workers were dismissed, on the pretext that the Industrial Workers of the World does not believe in hiring lawyers . The great general Jack Whyte of Chicago was to be the defier of the authorities in the court room. But of the total of 42 arrested there are still seven members of the South Slavish Federation (Socialists) confined to the workhouse, three Servian members of the Socialist Labor Party and a number of others whose names the writer of this could not get. Was this deliberately done? I should say, say it emphatically, yes!

Does that look as if the injury to one is the injury to all? What a farce!

"Break into the jails! The more heads are cracked, the more lives are lost in the skirmish, so much more publicity, so much more money for the strike will come in!" This is what one of the chief volunteers of the I. W. W. declared in presence of witnesses, all strikers, all members of the contribution committee of the Akron strike.

W. D. Haywood, do you think that anyone has a right to play "Va Banque" with the lives and well-being of workingmen?

There in Akron, in the climax to all malfeasance, we hear General Organizer Speed tell the strikers, on February 15th, to respond to the call of County Sheriff Ferguson to enlist as special deputies. Fifty and even more follow the advice. In the great melee in the second week of March these I. W. W. deputies cracked more heads of the foreigners then on picket duty than the regular police who form the start had displayed more sympathy with the strikers as they were given credit to.

That is "political action" on revolutionary lines, as revolutionary as the filling of jails with unfortunates without legal defense. But what's the use?

Then there are the "volunteers" with their sneers for all those who voluntarily dig up for the support of strikers. Such easy marks,—they all are. The selling for the strike fund, as a pretext, thousands of booklets and songbooks to the credulous, harvesting from February 12th to February 22nd any amounts of money, for the revolution! Sympathetic people pay them 25 cents, even dollars, and it pays to follow the call for volunteers. One of them, who has never worked for three years, Swasey, got off to England; what others harvested will ever be unknown. But that is industrial unionism,—of course the fountain heads of the Industrial Workers of the World dispatched these volunteers there and they had a right to work the suckers.

There was no such thing as control of affairs by the strikers. There is no such intent to develop the qualities, the possibilities of the workers in the factories and in the mills, as it was tried in Lowell in Lawrence in McKees Rocks and other places, and frustrated whenever the inner circle so decreed Akron furnishes the most awkward illustration of what the I. W. W. of the "scavenger" conception really is. They were given halls by the Socialist party; by the Socialist Labor Party first. The volunteers made places of pestilence and filth out of them. They slept, they "mooched," they occupied these halls, uncontrolled and unrestricted in their foul talk and perverted language; they stole clothing from the strikers, they raved and rambled, under the name of industrial unionism when supplications were made they should respect the rights of others. Driven out of the halls where they made their sleeping quarters, they clogged the sewer pipes, turned on the water, flooded the floors, broke the furniture, and hung up the red flag over their scavenger district of vandalism with an inscription "Sabotage the landlords if they refuse you halls and rooms."

Haywood, you know of this. You arrived in Akron the same day when that happened, but, of course, it was only "bad business." Karl Marx once wrote to Dr. Kugelmann: "The most despicable is the miserable slave who brags of his chains." Over the devastated fields of battle of a confiding proletariat resounds as the note-word of the scavengers, so that they can brand their trade of prey: "Hallelujah, I am a bum, give me a handout to revive me again." Verily Karl Marx was right: "The most despicable is the miserable slave who brags of his chains."

Of course, you will say that a convention of the I. W. W. might remedy things. Convention? Even Samuel Gompers in the Rochester convention of the A. F. of L. knew that there is no such a thing.

A machine rules with absolute power. The disproportionate representation at the American Federation of Labor convention is blamed as the main source of evil doings. But the highest number of votes that a group of delegates could ever control in such convention was at New Orrleans in 1903 when the six delegates of the United Mine Workers controlled one-third of the voting power of the convention. And that was criticized and remedial legislation was demanded, and enacted.

But at the last convention of the I. W. W. two delegates, one of them a paid officer, admitted as delegate contrary to constitutional provisions, had about two-thirds of the voting power of the whole convention, and the other 28 or 29 delegates controlled the balance of one-third; all contrary to the constitutional enactments of 1907. Delegates opposed to the ring rules were unseated, and a delegate not elected by his local simply transferred to another local within two weeks time and was seated as delegate, because he was a shouter for the ring.

Such a convention nominates the candidates for office. That means that in the last convention two individuals had it in their power to dictate who would go on the ballot or no. Progressive legislation was spurned, and the election of officers by referendum was to be established if the ring would have had its way. The rank and file, though, spoiled the effort.

A convention of the I. W. W. is the last place where a change of things could be expected. Only when the rank and file will get wise to the facts, will they, possibly by a referendum vote, eliminate all these features, and break the monstrous machine of officialdom that is plunging its fangs into the organization.

These lines are penned to you, to all workers, so that all may learn where you stand in this crisis. And it is a crisis.

Everywhere the lines of conflict are being drawn closer together. Opportunist Socialists are growing hot and furious in their contest against the invasion of industrial Socialists. And while in heated arguments one would think that there is added every day confusion more confounded, all these discussions and incriminations even tend to show that the baby of the revolutionary working class movement is struggling to relieve itself of its swadding clothes. It is learning to stand on it feet, not feet of clay or hollow brass. The socialist movement, which embraces all fields of working class expression, begins to clarify itself, in spite of all dire forebodings, and her proletariat is beginning to come to its own. The industrial revolutionary movement will be the strongest bulwark of the general labor movement, it must so be, and in spite of the debauchery of the movement by individuals the Industrial Workers of the World must be retained as the expression of working class solidarity on the industrial field. But this will in no way preclude that in other order organizations the revolutionary thought will not be made the moving motive of all action and progress. But we are bound to go through these diseases to get into shape and form the creations needed for the emancipation of the toilers.

You, Haywood, are placed to-day in a position in the labor movement where no longer you can remain indifferent to the burning, paramount issues confronting the working class. You can make, you can unmake, although only for a short period will the unmaking effect the course of the labor movement. No one individual will construct, or destroy. But no longer can those who constructed the industrial union manifesto in 1905 look indifferently on how its tenets are being disearded, piecemeal; how its objects, as originally planned to bring about complete industrial and political solidarity of the working class, are distorted and destroyed.

That Magna Charta no longer is the guiding star in the activities, in the work, in the (non-existing) educational propaganda of the Industrial Workers of the World. More than passing notice has to be taken of the occurrences herein narrated, and only by quick and decisive action by the great mass of toilers interested in the advance of the revolutionary industrial union movement can a road be cleared for further progress, for real constructive work, for sound and solid education, for thorough preparation of the toilers for the impending historic task that they will have to perform, the operation of industries under a newly reconstructed social system.

If the Industrial Workers of the World have diverted from their original program it should so be known, so be advertised, so be denounced. And in laying the facts before you, in all their details, I know that thousands of toilers will ask with me, with others:

Haywood, will you help to stop the "bad business"?

TREMENDOUS SWELLING OF IMMIGRATION LIST.

A Continuous Stream of Foreigners Pouring In; Southern Italians in Lead.

Washington, May 23.—The total number of immigrant aliens landed at ports of the United States for the month of March aggregated 96,958.

It begins to look as if Southern Italy would be depopulated. For many months the Southern Italians, with one exception, have headed the list of immigration in point of numbers, and during March 23,267 were admitted. The following is a portion of the list and the number landing: Polish, 17,314; Hebrews, 7,201; Germans, 6,503; Russians, 4,501; Scandinavians, 4,254; English, 4,095; Northern Italians, 3,454, the balance of the immigrants being scattered between the various races of the earth.

The total immigration from July, 1912, to March, 1913, aggregates 747,998. Classified according to avocations, the March immigration list includes: Farm laborers, 29,797; laborers, 17,345; servants, 10,156; no occupation, including women and children, 21,006; carpenters, 1,372; tailors, 1,823; clerks and accountants, 1,100, the balance being scattered between various lines of skilled labor and the professions.

The states receiving the larger portion of this immigration are as follows: New York, 26,782; Pennsylvania, 12,815; Illinois, 9,521; Massachusetts, 7,795; New Jersey, 5,370; Michigan, 5,368; Ohio, 4,700; Connecticut, 2,873; California, 2,730; the balance being scattered throughout every state in the Union.

Departures from this country during March of emigrant aliens reached 15,044. The largest number debarred came under the head of likely to become a public charge, 529 being thus refused admittance.

THE CONFLICT OF THE AGES.

M. M. Mangasarian.

In my mind's eye, I see a wonderful building, something like the Coliseum of ancient Rome. The galleries are black with people; tier upon tier rise like waves the multitude of spectators who have come to see a great contest. A great contest, indeed! A contest in which all the world and all the centuries are interested. It is the contest—the fight to death—between Truth and Error.

The door opens, and a slight, small, shy and insignificant looking thing steps into the arena. It is Truth. The vast audience bursts into hilarious and derisive laughter. Is this Truth? This shuddering thing in tattered clothes, and almost naked? And the house shakes again with mocking and hisses.

The door opens again, and Error enters—clad in cloth of gold, imposing in appearance, tall of stature, glittering with gems, sleek and huge and ponderous, causing the building to tremble with the thud of its steps. The audience is for a moment dazzled into silence, then it breaks into applause, long and deafening. "Welcome!" shout ten thousand throats.

The two contestants face each other. Error, in full armor—backed by the sympathies of the audience, greeted by the clamorous cheering of the spectators; and Truth, scorned, scoffed at, and hated. "The issue is a foregone conclusion," murmurs the vast audience. "Error will trample Truth under its big feet."

The battle begins. The two clinch, separate and clinch again. Truth holds its own. The spectators are alarmed. Anxiety appears in their faces. Their voices grow faint. Is it possible? Look! See! There! Error recedes! It fears the gaze of Truth. It shuns its beauteous eyes! Hear it shriek and scream as it feels Truth's squeeze upon its wrists. Error is trying to break away from Truth's grip. It is making for the door. It is gone!

The spectators are mute. Every tongue is smitten with the palsy. The people bite their lips until they bleed. They cannot explain what they have seen. "Who would have believed it?" "Is it possible?" they exclaim. But they cannot doubt what their eyes have seen. That puny and insignificant looking thing called Truth has put ancient and entrenched Error, backed by the throne, the altar, the army, the press, the people, and the gods—to rout.

The pursuit of truth; is not that worth living for? To seek the truth, to love the truth, to live the truth? Can any religion offer more?

GOOD BURGLARS AND BAD ONES.

By R. A. Dague.

The Tacoma (Wash.) Daily News recently said:

"When Mrs. Fred Morris of Los Angeles, Cal., started to rush "for a doctor Thursday night, alarmed because her baby had the "croup, she encountered a masked man at the door and he told her "to hold up her hands. 'My baby is dying, and I am going for a "doctor,' she exclaimed, disregarding his command. Putting his re"volver in his pocket, the burglar said: 'Let me help you,' and she "led him into the room where the baby was lying.

"The burglar asked for vinegar, sugar and water and concocted "a mixture which he forced down the infant's throat. Then he rubbed "olive oil on the child's chest and worked for an hour before he told "the mother it was out of danger.

"'You must have a baby yourself,' remarked Mrs. Morris.

"'I have five,' replied the man. 'That's why I am here tonight.'

"'You saved my baby's life,' said Mrs. Morris. 'Had I had a "doctor he would have charged me $5. You shall have it instead.'

"She handed him a bill. The man placed the bill in the baby's "hand. Then, bowing courteously, and still masked as he had been "throughout his visit, the burglar bade Mrs. Morris good night.

"Mrs. Morris refused to give the police a description of the burg"lar and begged them not to search for him."

Now, I venture to make the inquiry if that burglar is as bad a man as the big financiers of Wall Street, who by cornering food stuffs, transfer from the pockets of the people millions of dollars into their own pockets? Every intelligent reader understands that the watering of corporation and trust stocks is a legal trick through which the shrewd capitalists get millions of value for the trifling cost of printing the bonds and stocks.

Thomas W. Lawson, the Boston capitalist, says that they have flooded the country with forty billions of counterfeit stocks and bonds. I know a man rated to be in possession of twenty-five or thirty millions who never, I think, returned to the world one dollar of value for that colossal fortune. He got his vast wealth speculating on Wall Street by "cornering" food stuffs. He would buy up all the wheat, corn, lard or other farm produce, and force up the price, then sell and pocket a million or more of profits. It is stated that nearly every one of the well-known multi-millionaires "made" their immense fortunes without returning to anybody an equivalent therefor. That is not stealing in the eyes of the law, but what is it from a moral viewpoint?

Working people create all wealth, but are tricked out of 83 per cent of it, as shown by the statistics. The census reports of the United States of 1900 show that the average product of the workers was $2,451 per year, or $7.90 a day, but the average wage was $437, or $1.40 per day. They therefore got but 17 per cent of their earnings. The stock-watering-get-something-for-nothing philanthropists get 83 per cent of the created wealth.

Mr. Lawson frankly confesses that he has acquired millions of property by this unfair system because he saw other "Christian captains of industry" in the game, but for the safety of the country he says that something must soon be done to stop such dishonest practices or the country will go to wreck and ruin. His proposed a remedy is for Uncle Sam to refuse to transmit the advertisements of the "captains of big business" through the mails. Now, if the situation were not so alarming, Lawson's proposition would excite the hilarity of everybody who has given the matter any serious investigation.

Judge Dittenhoefer, in the March number of Everybody's Magazine, says:

"I am not sure that Mr. Lawson's remedy, the exclusion of Wall "Street gambling transactions from the mails, would be a complete "remedy. The Wall Street arch conspirators would be able to use "their private wires and lure the confiding public to their ruina"tion."

Socialism alone proposes the true remedy for this crime of robbing the industrial classes out of 83 per cent of their earnings by the cunning financial sharks. The Socialist says: "Let the nation own the trusts and operate them in the interests of all the people." Uncle Sam can conduct a railroad or an oil mill or coal mine, or any other public utility as easily as he can dig the Panama canal, irrigate an Idaho desert or manage the postal business.

It is the present system of industrialism that produces the little robbers as well as the big ones. I will venture to say that the little burglars, like the one mentioned at the beginning of this article, are less dangerous to the community and many of them are more "desirable citizens" than the big robbers who pocket thousands of millions of dollars which they take from the working people without paying a dollar therefor.

Creston, Iowa.

EX-GOVERNOR SHAW AND THE JAPANESE WAR.

By R. A. Dague.

Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury and governor of Iowa, is greatly alarmed over the idea that Japan will soon invade America and attach to that country all the territory west of the Rocky Mountains. The ex-governor is scared over the Japanese matter without any good reason. He ought to post up a bit before going into print as a prophet and telling the public that there is danger that Japan some fine morning will be found pounding away at Seattle and the Golden Gate, destroying the American navy and overrunning this country.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, late president of Harvard, has recently returned home from Japan, where he made a study of the Japanese. He greatly admires them. Referring to the talk of some Americans that Japan contemplates waging a war on the United States, he says:

"The Japs are not a warlike people. The war with China and Russia were both defensive wars. They are not a numerous people. They number not more than one-ninth of the Chinese population, and less than half the population of the United States. They are a homing people. The Japanese are accused chiefly by occidental army and navy men of intending to dominate the Pacific and seize upon the insular possessions of other nations. There is no truth in these accusations. All Japanese statesmen and political philosophers know that they never could dominate the Pacific. No one nation in the world could control the Pacific ocean. Five or six powers combined, such, for example, as Great Britain, Germany, France, the United States, Japan, Russia and Italy might do it. All Japanese leaders recognize that it would be impossible for Japan to send a hundred thousand men with their baggage and munitions across the Pacific in safety, although the fleet should be conveyed by scores of battleships and armored cruisers. Japan is now heavily burdened with debts incurred in carrying on her wars with China and Russia, and could not borrow the money necessary to carry on a war with anybody. The commercial and industrial interests of Japan require peace with all other countries."

Dr. Eliot further says that while in Japan, statesmen, bankers, merchants, business men and others, all said that the United States is the best customer for their silks and other products, and that a war between that country and this would be wholly unreasonable, fantastic and foolish—the product of morbid, timorous imagination. Dr. Eliot says: "The right state of mind of Americans toward Japanese is one of hearty good will and admiration."

Dr. Eliot is unquestionably correct in the views as above expressed. There is not the shadow of a danger that Japan will wipe from the Pacific our navy, thunder Pacific coast cities into ruins and annex all that part of our country to Japan lying west of the Rocky Mountains, and a little later, overrun all this blessed land of ours. I regret that a man who has been a cabinet officer and governor of a great state like Iowa, should become so badly frightened over seeing a war shadow when there is actually no shadow at all. I hope that Governor Shaw has not "with malice aforethought" joined the jingoes to get up a war scare to influence Congress to build more war ships, buy more and bigger guns, give out more fat contracts and boost up the army and navy. Uncle Sam is now expending thirty millions a year in constructing war ships, and it costs him six hundred millions each year to maintain the army and navy. That is a heavy burden on the people, especially our working people.

The California Japanese problem is not a big one except in the newspapers and among politicians, mainly east of the Rocky Mountains. The late action of the California Legislature does not materially change the legal status of Japs in that state. The "war with Japan" will be over pretty soon, and our distinguished ex-governor need no longer lay awake nights worrying over the fear that the little brown fellows from Japan might jab him with a bayonet before morning.

Governor Shaw has great fear that Japan will grab the Philippines from Uncle Sam. Dr. Eliot says the Japanese very much dislike hot climates, and he was told that Japan had no desire whatever to possess those islands. Now, I am not a Democrat, but if the present Democratic administration could get up some sort of a swap with Japan and unload the Philippines upon them for, say half what they have cost us, I would say, good Democratic boys. You made a bully dicker for your Uncle Samuel.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, let me say that there is a widespread conspiracy to promote the war spirit. Dr. David Starr Jordan, president of Stanford University, who is thoroughly informed on the Japanese question, recently wrote me as follows:

"Stanford University, Cal., May 12, 1913.

"Mr. R. A. Dague:

"Dear Sir—I am thoroughly in sympathy with the protest which you have published against the extension of militarism. There is no question that a very great effort is being made the world over to fill the air with war talk. The recent exposures of the operations of the Krupp firms has been a great help in our peace work. Pleased to sign my name to your published protest. Very truly yours, "DAVID STARR JORDAN."

THE SITUATION AT EL PASO, TEXAS.

El Paso, Texas, May 26, 1913.

To the Editor Miners' Magazine:

Dear Sir and Brother—As many of the local unions of the Federation have already responded with substantial donations for the relief of the striking smeltermen, I take it that they are interested in the progress of the strike. I would have had something to say a little earlier, but I was too busy and couldn't get around to it.

For the last week, Brother Jones, a member of Bisbee Miners' Union, and I have been on the go practically night and day in an effort to get the scabbing "niggers" out of town. Needless to say, we were bitterly opposed by the company and its agents. Early in the week we got a bunch of about sixty down town with the understanding that we would ship them into the coal mines of New Mexico, we having previously made the arrangements with the employment agents. When they came down in the early evening to ship out in the morning, the company's agents got busy on the wires. The result was that the next morning we were told that they couldn't get out till the next day. We arranged to give them one meal, and the company's agents endeavored to get them back to the smelter. As they were "niggers" from the South, accustomed to the domination of the white man, they had no conception of their rights, and the slave driver the company had on the job knowing this, came down town armed with the butt end of a billiard cue, with which it was his custom to knock down a "nigger" who didn't do as he told him. Brother Jones discovered him driving about thirty of our "niggers" through the streets, much like he might drive cattle, all of them cowed by his hickory club. When Brother Jones "butted in," the "niggers" took new heart and refused to go, and knowing that we would make it warm for him if he pulled off any funny stunts, the company slave-driver beat it back to his masters for further orders, taking none of the poor devils with him, who, by the way, were fooled into coming up here by the promise of a fine job—$3 a day and board, good rooms, etc. When they got here and found that they were only getting $1.40 a day for twelve hours work under a task master armed with a club he did not hesitate to use, you can understand that they were dissatisfied. To those of them who asked about strikes, he said there was no trouble. I have taken an assignment of the claims of some of the slaves and will, if we can, make the company pay what they promised and forward the amount to the poor wretches. When the slave-driver got back up on the hill and informed his master that his clubbing had come to an end in the streets of El Paso, there was some more work on the wires, with the result that on the following morning we were told that they could not ship the "niggers" at all, as the order had been canceled. As we were about half out of money and the blacks were hungry, we were in a nice boat.

Brother Jones and myself got busy among them and showed them that any place was better than the smelter, and that if they didn't want to be arrested they had better take a freight out at the first opportunity, explaining to them how it was that we could not ship them out. But three of them went back on the job, the rest leaving town as best they could. As there was still quite a few "niggers" on the works, we had to try to get some way to take them out before we could approach them.

Friday, we had made the arrangements to send another bunch to a contractor in Colorado, and we went after them. Again, when the company saw we were going to get their remaining "niggers," they not being able to beat them on the streets of El Paso, started in to beat them if they tried to quit or leave the works. One "nigger" to whom we had talked, went back to get his coat and tell them he had quit. He was jumped on by the man with the hickory club, and his skull fractured. When I learned this I tried to get a warrant out for his arrest on the charge of assault with intent to murder, but he beat me to it, going to the company judge on the hill and having him try him on a charge of simple assault, he pleading guilty and being fined $1 and the costs, thus preventing us from again trying him for the same offense. Brother Jones and myself worked practically all day Friday and all Saturday night with the "niggers," feeding those that came off of the hill 10-cent lunches, and Saturday morning we had the satisfaction of seeing them start for Colorado, but ten remaining at the smelter.

On Thursday and Friday all the "niggers" we would get the company had their man Friday swear out warrants against them on the charge of gambling, but some of our "niggers" couldn't be found, as Mexico is only a little ways over the line; others couldn't be identified as the one the officer was after. The result was that out of a handful of warrants they were able to serve but two, and as we wanted to question the company's agents a little, I employed an attorney to defend them. When they learned that we were going to defend a "nigger" they expressed great surprise and said I thought they would plead guilty. They got cold feet when they saw the were going to be called upon to prove their case, and swore to new complaints in the smelter's own court under the judge that is employed by them and who is dependent on them for his living. Doubtless the "nigger" can be sure he will be fairly dealt with by that band of Christian soldiers who are the servants of the smelter trust.

Outside of the men in jail and the ten on the works, the "niggers" that the Guggies paid the freight on are gone. We have with us here a Mr. Webster, a former Colorado hero. He seems to think that it was to his matchless intellect that the settlement of the Cripple Creek troubles of several years ago was due, and I am told that he never tires of telling what a hero he was when he stood bravely with a cannon in either hand and defied the miner with a shovel to make him budge an inch from the spot where his master had set him. At the present time he is a tin soldier for the state of Texas. As fine a collection of guns as any man ever carried grace his manly form, and Texas may indeed feel proud of its brave and fearless ranger. But giving even the devil his dues, I do not know that up to the present Mr. Webster has done us any injury or gone out of his way to persecute us. His sympathies are with the master, from which source I am told he derives revenue at the rate of five plunks per day, but I do not accuse him of doing wrong on that account. The highly developed ethical concepts of duty and honor that soar beneath the mile-wide bonnet of this valiant defender of right and equity could not be smirched by bribery, coaxed by flattery or driven by fear. I know not why he left Colorado, but he is with us here, so justice will and must prevail.

The smelter is doing practically nothing and the tracks are still crowded with ore they can not unload, and unless they make a few substantial concessions I don't see how they can expect to do any better. The company has a bunch of men—fifteen or twenty—trying to hire men on the streets of the city, but our pickets camp on their trail like they loved them, with the result that if they speak to a Mexican our men speak to him also, so they are not getting very many men to go to work. Fraternally yours,

CHARLES H. TANNER.

THE HEART OF THE CITY.

By Eleanor Wentworth.

It was black night.

The man and the woman stood on the edge of the city, hating it.

They were lovers and sought to go where they might keep their love always.

They saw the lights gleaming in the darkness and thought them demons hunting for prey. They heard the mills of the Oppressors grinding in the depths of the city and thought them relentless torturers, making night hideous with their gloating. They heard Vice stealing through the streets—Vice born of the weariness of human bodies and the numbness of human souls, and they cried.

"We cannot work here; there is only slavery. We cannot love here—there is only brutality. We cannot think here—there is such a turmoil. Let us leave the haunts of men. Let us be alone!"

So they fled swiftly and far to that Isle of Happiness which wealth can buy.

It is a truly wondrous isle—an emerald poised airily between the deep blue of a river and the deeper blue of the sky—a living, vibrating orchestra of tinkling rivulets, warbling songsters, and gentle, murmuring breezes; a wonderland of riotous color; the site of marvelous temples.

Here the lovers clasped hands and exclaimed ecstatically, "Ah, in this place Love will be with us always. The sunshine, the freedom will make him grow stronger each day. We will shut out all strangers, so that none may take him from us."

One thing they found in their fairyland that was more than wonderful; it was strange, even terrifying: From the center of the forest that covered the island there rose a monstrous structure, larger than any their imagination had ever conceived. It was built of a white marble that was dazzling to behold. Above the columns of its entrance, in Roman script, was the word PLENTY. But from the top of the rounded colonnade to the foot of the square base its whiteness was marred by spots of red. These spots were not merely on the surface; they were ground into the marble; they were a part of it, as the woof and warp of a fabric. The red was the life blood of Labor, which had reared that monument of PLENTY

The island was never wholly free from shadow of this temple. When the sun rose in the morning the dark, sinister finger began its progress toward the northwest, growing longer as the hours advanced; and after the sun had passed the meridian, that finger journeyed slowly and silently toward the southeast. Later came the sunset, transforming the dome of the temple into a mas of red—red blood. And last of all, like a cloak hiding both the good and the evil, the beautiful and the fearful, like the shadow grown all-embracing came the fathomless twilight.

There was something weird about that shadow. The woman and the man always remained beyond its reach, traveling from beach to beach to avoid it. They were afraid of it. They could not understand it.

No one came to the isle. They were entirely alone and, while the sun shone, believed themselves happy. They warbled and laughed and chatted, mimicked the songs of the birds, discovered odd nooks, and revelled in the flowers. But always they remained warily out of the reach of the shadow.

Soon, however, there came a time when the songs of the birds echoed hollowly, when the perfume of the exotic flowers nauseated them and the winds whispered tales of loneliness. The handclasp lost its spontaneity. Each wandered alone, seeking new things that could no longer be found. The harmony of color and tone was spiritless. The weirdness of the shadow haunted them more and more.

And Love, fearing the shadow, went away.

II.

Again it was black night.

The man and the woman stood on the edge of the city, hesitating, yet longing to enter.

They were seeking their lost love.

Breathlessly they listened to the tumultous beating of the heart of the city and understood that which they had failed to grasp before.

Rising noisily, inexorably as the cloud fog, they saw Brotherhood and Knowledge, and as they rose, Ignorance and Vice became impotent.

Above the mighty whirring of the wheels in the mills they heard a sound that swelled even as the wheels ground faster. "Solidarity, solidarity, solidarity," came the message—louder, sweeter, clearer. "Hear, hear, we hear," was the answer of the toilers. "Freedom, freedom," sang the wheels. "We come," answered the echo.

"Ah, yes; we come," cried the man and the woman. They walked into the city, joyously eager to share in the creation of happiness.

And Love walked in beside them.—From the Western Comrade.

Must never join a union nor go on strike. Must be willing to conform to rules, without question as to pay, hours, accommodations or other material considerations. In return for the work, however, we promise to regale them with the spectacle of the most useless class of idle spendthrifts ever known to history. Isn't this worth working for? THE VIRTUE OF SILENCE.

Some time ago Father Mathew, an English Catholic priest, was excommunicated by the Pope. As this was the first excommunication by the Church of Romo of an Englishman in 200 years it was surely news. After leaving the Roman church Dr. Mathew became a bishop of the Old Catholic church.

The London Times printed the facts and an exact translation of the papal bull issued in the case, in which Mathew was referred to as a "pseudo-bishop." Mathew sued the newspaper for libel on the ground that to call a man a "pseudo-bishop" is libelous. The judge charged the jury that not only Mathew but the Archbishop of Canterbury is a "pseudo-bishop" in the Pope's eyes, and that unless the newspaper published the bull in malice it must be acquitted of libel. The jury, reluctantly, as it seems, found for the defendant, but "deprecated the publication in England of the bulls of the Pope of Rome which affect the status of individuals."

These twelve stolid Britons thus clearly expressed a surviving British prejudice which the Socialistic revolt, the turmoil of radicalism, the growing dominance of "new ideas," so-called, cannot kill. They "deprecate" the publication of important news. To suppress and ignore facts and expressions of opinion seems to them the surest way out of trouble.

In the very spirit of these typically English jurymen, the British government, after dallying long with the militant suffragists, now propose to rid itself of them, not by punishing them when they commit crimes, as other criminals are punished, but by suppressing their publications and denying their right of free speech. A more futile plan could not have been adopted. —New York Times.

SOCIALISTS REBEL AGANIST WAR.

The Socialists are causing almost as much anxiety in Europe as the Balkan allies. These unreasonable people are actually objecting to being slaughtered in a quarrel they do not profess to understand and which nobody seems able to explain. In Germany, where they represent by far the largest political party, they are showing a solid front against the huge increases of expenditures for war purposes, and are making it very clear that they have no taste for war undertaken just to prove the supremacy of one nation over another. A like movement has been started in France, not on so large a scale, but still aggressively active.

These are steps in advance far more important for the welfare of the world than all the peace societies and arbitration courts ever accomplished or ever will. War is a game in which kings play and the people pay. They pay first with their money and finance the movement; later with their blood and bodies, the latter serving as pegs to score points. As long as the people like this arrangement, why shouldn't there be vast military preparations going on all the time, and plenty of bloodshed now and then? Militarism is one of the last strongholds of privilege. It is a splendid money-making machine for great interests; it affords a multitude of fat jobs for the aristocracy and gives certain windy gentlemen an opportunity to blow off a lot of steam in the way of sham patriotism. Such gifts of fortune were never surrendered without a struggle, and nothing can be more flagrantly absurd than the idea that reform in the war spirit will begin on top. It's the people's fight. They have to be trained up and educated to a realization of the folly they have been the victims of since the raising of the first tribal chief. When a great body of men like the Socialists of the world rebel against war as a waste and a crime, then, at least, there is hope ahead.—S. F. Bulletin.

IS THIS THE REASON?

The reported policy of the Wilson administration towards Mexico is impolicy. To make recognition dependent on Huerta's agreeing to refer all the claims of American citizens against Mexico to a mixed commission is worse than "dollar diplomacy;" it is dollar justice. The claims of Americans for damages done during the late murderous revolution in Mexico are good or bad, according to the facts in each case. If they are valid, they are valid against Huerta or his successor. They need no concession to render them fit subjects for negotiations. Those that our government is convinced are without merit should not be presented. The United States, if it persists in having all claims thrown in one great mass to a mixed commission, will be charging a price for its recognition that will measure its incapacity to adjust an international difference in accordance either with diplomatic usages of the spirit or equity.

The proposal is open also to the objection, that it contemplates the establishment of a wholly unnecessary tribunal of arbitration. Why not send our claims to the Hague for adjudication if we cannot settle them by negotiation? A few years ago we had a long-standing difference with Mexico over the "pious funds." The Diaz administration's interpretation of responsibilities was radically opposite to our view of the case. Both governments agreed to have recourse to the Hague tribunal, and the United States won the verdict. One would suppose that an eminent "pacificist" as Mr. Bryan is would be no laggard now in seeking reference to the Hague. Certainly our government would stand better in the eyes of its own people if it followed the precedent to which we have referred, than it does in making justice to American claimants a matter of the price Huerta is willing to pay for recognition. Amateur diplomacy is all the more deplorable when it is touched with Shylockism.—Boston Transcript.

BALLOT AS LABOR'S WEAPON.

Not since the industrial war in Colorado, when the Mine Owners' Association of that state rode ruthlessly over every principle of English liberty from the Magna Charta down, has there been in this or any country such cruel internecine strife as that now existing in the state of West Virginia.

The situation has been more flagrant in many respects than in any industrial war ever before known.

The courts, following the precedent established in the Colorado cases, have maintained the right of the governor of the state to declare not martial law, but to suspend civil authority over certain territory and the writ of habeas corpus therein.

If any have doubted the benefit to result to labor from having its own class in power politically, they have only to read the story of this industrial fight in West Virginia.

Its significance is the greater in that it is more than a local dispute; it is a fight of the capitalist class against the working class of America.

Here there is common cause between the political and the economic organizations of the working class. Of course it is no more true in West Virginia than elsewhere but conditions have there become so acute as to force working class solidarity.

When the contest becomes so fierce, it becomes at once apparent to the workers that the superiority of the capitalist class is due to the fact that every weapon he uses is derived from the power of his class in politics.

It is because he can control the administration of the law that makes him so formidable an antagonist. It is through the exercise of this power that he prevents labor from organizing and hampers the acts of the organizations already in existence.

A stream flowing down the mountain side is evidence of a spring or other source higher up. So also the exercise of power on the part of the capitalist class is evidence of the source from whence that power proceeds.

The economic power of capitalism is inferior to that possessed by labor. Were all industrial battles a contest between the economic power of each class, the victory would always be on the side of labor. But augment the economic power of the capitalist class with its political power, and in every fierce and long drawn out contest labor is the loser.

Let labor everywhere learn the lesson so apparent in West Virginia and add to its economic weapon the political weapon now so effectively used by its enemy and there will no longer be any necessity for industrial wars.

Don't forget that capital will do almost anything in the world for labor—except get off its back—and that is the thing labor wants most.—Californria Social-Democrat.

WHICH SHALL IT BE?

The Workers Want a Democracy, Not a Military Despotism.

The recent agitation and abandonment of certain military posts in favor of others nearer military posts in favor centers proves with luminous clearness and the damnable deliberateness of the powers of government in setting the stage for the final struggle before the working class come into their own. The present scheme to affiliate the militia closer with the regular army, to hold them in reserve of officers and men, to strengthen the infamous Dick military law and to increase the present enrollment of the regular army is only a continuation of that set of plans which, if completed, will place the workers of this country entirely at the mercy of their exploiters.

A military oligarchy controlled by a few will, with the aid of such an organization, be able to nip in the bud any movement of the workers toward complete emancipation. The ruling powers, the beneficiaries of the present industrial system, know that only by force can the onward march of the workers be arrested, and this movement on their part is only the plume on the crest of the "man on horseback" coming over the hill.

The danger of an invasion by a foreign nation is recognized as a humbug by all thinking men, and the worst that might happen in that connection would be the explosion of some of our jingoist capitalist editors in the midst of an editorial on the "Yellow Peril" or the eulogizing of that blood-thirsty patriot, the redoubtable Richard P. Hobson. These editorials, however, serve a double purpose—first, the armor plate trust gets fat contracts for its product along with cannon, etc., second, many trusting members of the working class are led to believe that a big army and navy are absolutely necessary. If they succeed in beguiling the most of the workers into this belief their plan will go on until consummation, which will mean the end of working-class progress.

The struggle between the oppressed and the oppressors, the ruled and the rulers, the workers and the shirkers, the toilers and the drones, has been going on through all the ages, with the workers gaining little by little, a point here and a point there, sometimes seemingly stationary for centuries, but always with a general drift towards the light, towards that day told by the prophet of Israel when "they shall build houses and inhabit them, they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit thereof; but they shall not build houses and another inhabit, they shall not plant vineyards and another eat."

It would be the sheerest folly on the part of the workers to ignore this move on the part of the masters and the stemming of the tide of working-class progress at this time would be an awful thing to contemplate. The united action of the workers now might block it, but once started, rivers of blood would be the only answer to our demands for redress from intolerable industrial conditions.—Edward A. Weick, in the United Mine Workers' Journal.

LAWS AGAINST VICE MAKE CRIME.

"To have no laws against vice, you mean?" cried the Observer, "Shocking!" "I mean precisely that," said the Cynic, firmly, "laws against vice, against the malum prohibitum, are bad every way. They do not check vice, and they make crime. They make it both directly and indirectly. Directly, because they create arbitrary categories of crime out of acts and tendencies that are not in themselves criminal. Don't you remember the bitter speech of the English statesman that "when Parliament has nothing else to do it can always make a new crime?' Indirectly these laws create crime in dozens of ways—notably by fostering commerce in vice, sometimes contraband, sometimes open and legal, sometimes even official. The Raines law, for instance, was aimed at the supposititious vice of drinking beer on Sunday. It turned out to be the most effective promoter of prostitution and aid to the white slave industry ever devised in the city, and if it ever affected the vice it was supposed to check, no one has noticed it.

Cause of Graft.

"Again, just as long as prostitution is a criminal offense, just so long will it be an open well of graft; and, what is a far unhappier thing for me to think of, just so long will our cities be debauched and degraded by taking revenue from these women, a dollar or so at a time, through fines in the police courts. It passes my comprehension how anyone can look at these human beings, outcast on the street, and see how poor and wretched and miserable they are, how forlornly cut off from any form of human pity or interest or love, how utterly devoid of incentive to be one whit different from what they are—and endure the thought that the great and rich Christian City of New York is willing to raid them and hound them and harry them before the police courts and debauch its conscience, if it has one, with $5 or $10 of their money.

Put Ourselves in Their Place.

"Why, in the last days of McClellan's administration I saw with my own eyes plain-clothes men on Broadway grappling and cuffing and beating these poor outcasts, driving them this way and that, and hustling them into the police van. That was 'enforcing the law' for you—a law against vice. you understand. I wished that some of the preachers and sheltered Christians who were crying for the suppression of vice could have seen that. I do not blame them or get impatient with them, because they think they are doing God service; they unconsciously assume that everybody's life is controlled by the same circumstances and influences that control theirs. The gay little French Queen was honest as the day, when she said that if the people couldn't get bread they ought to eat cake. I wished our protected Christian people could have a taste—just one—of the economic conditions, the industrial and domestic pressure that put those girls where they are, and the social pressure that keeps them there. I do not know the mind of Jesus as well, probably, as the preachers do, but they would have to show me chapter and verse before I'd believe He would be for 'enforcing the law' against them and sending policemen after them, or, for that matter, after anybody. Many policemen don't believe it either, any more than I do, so they sometimes 'wink hard with both eyes,' as Mayor Gaynor says, and try to keep themselves human. A few of the hardened ones make money by it perhaps, but whose fault is it? Simply ours, for the philosophical stupidity of permitting vice to be erected into crime!"—American Magazine.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS OF PROGRESS.

Intellectual progress among the masses is slow but sure, and while we Socialists are sometimes inclined to think that we are about the only torch-bearers of enlightenment in the community, it must not be forgotten that in other quarters signs of progress are not completely lacking.

Take, for instance, the Presbyterian church, even that portion of it popularly supposed to be the most benighted and unprogressive. The other day the Southern Assembly of that denomination in regular official meeting at Atlanta, Georgia, by a vote of no less than 133 to 44, decided to repeal the clause in the creed which announces the doctrine of "infant damnation." Not content with that, they substituted for it a positive statement to the effect that all infants are saved. This is distinctly encouraging, and leaving theological considerations aside, it evidently has a social import also.

There can be hardly a doubt that in making this creedal change, the assembly was impressed, though perhaps unconsciously, with the spectacle of infant damnation on this earth in the cotton mills in the vicinity. We consider their action an indirect though no less distinct slap in the face for the local exploiters of child labor in the Southern cotton mills. They felt, no doubt, that if the infants who die too young for capitalist consumption in the cotton mills were consigned to damnation there would be no profit whatever in disposing of them in that manner and no sense in such a disposition; that, in fact, the "infant damnation" clause reduces the Almighty to the moral level of a Southern cotton mill owner without even the incentive of gain as a partial justification. It is not indeed beyond the bounds of possibility that at some time in the distant future the Southern Presbyterian Assembly may even reach the conclusion that if God does not favor the damnation of infants in the next world, he does not approve of it in this one, as he desires his will to be done on earth as it is in heaven. We maintain that such an idea is distinctly conceivable even for a Southern Presbyterian Assembly, for it is not unlikely that within the next few years some of the clergymen attached to that section of the Presbyterian church will become more or less infected with ideas from the prevalent Socialism which is already making some impression on the churches, especially those farther north.

Then there is Mr. Bryan, a stalwart Presbyterian, who has just discovered that wars to some extent are fomented by business concerns which manufacture for profit guns, armor plate and battleships. In taking this advanced position, Mr. Bryan places himself abreast the German Socialist, Liebknecht, and the rank and file of the Socialist parties of the world generally, a feat which few people would have believed him intellectually capable of achieving. Yet so it is. And who will despair of progress after this?

May it not even be that if given time Mr. Bryan might reach the conclusion that this same desire for profit is also the thing that is responsible for the formation of the trusts? Who is so bold as to say that even this is impossible? It requires some stretching of the imagination, to be sure, but then, as Mr. Bryan himself remarked in the connection alluded to above, "I believe we have not yet reached the limits of intelligence in this country." He is most decidedly correct. We have not. But, then, we are getting there slowly, as the above two examples clearly indicate. We are advancing from the position of "infants crying in the night" to that of "infants groping for the light," which none will deny is distinctly progressive.

There is really no limit to the heights which the human mind may attain, and when we behold the Southern Presbyterian church and Mr. Bryan making such progress, the sight is well calculated to disperse pessimism and rehabilitate faith in the ultimate higher destiny of the human race. Progress may from time to time halt on palsied feet, but eventually she gets there just the same.—New York Call.

A SUGGESTED IMMIGRATION TEST.

Stanislaus Przybischewski, a Polish laborer, landed the other day from an emigrant steamship, and as is customary in dealing with his kind, was sent to Ellis Island in order that his fitness for citizenship and all-round desirability as a working animal should be passed upon.

As he stepped ashore on the proving grounds, a man in uniform halted him, and in a commanding tone demanded to know what kind of money he had with him and how much. Stanislaus, being used to obey men in uniform, dived into one of his interior compartments and hauled out a $50 bill. The uniformed person took it, examined it, and announced that it wasn't good in this country, and that he would change it for Stanislaus. He did. He gave him in exchange a piece of Argentine money worth about 20 cents, and it was not until Stanislaus was heading back to the New York shore that he began to suspect that he might have been short-changed. He managed to report the matter to the immigration officials and was taken back to the island, but failed to identify the man in uniform that had duped him. Then he returned and entered the land of the free to grow up with the country.

We are of the decided opinion that this transaction goes to prove that Stanislaus is a desirable asset. The ease with which he gave up on demand is a most promising sign of his continuing to do so in the future without objecting too strenuously or making trouble. It was for that purpose that he came here, although he doesn't know it, but those who will come into industrial relations with him know better and have no particular use for him for any other purposes.

Stanislaus may go into a packing house, a sugar refinery, a steel mill, or become a section hand on a railroad, but he will only stay there on condition that he keeps on giving up. He will produce five or eight or ten dollars' value daily by his labor and will give up at least three-fifths of it, which of course will be so much better than giving up $50 for 20 cents that it is not likely he will get wise to the game of giving up, unless perhaps the Socialists get hold of him soon after he has started yielding surplus value. Otherwise he may go on giving up for years, not only without being able to identify those who have robbed him, but perhaps without knowing that he is being robbed at all.

And if he does discover it and objects, it is altogether likely that he will meet up with other "men in uniform"—blue, with club attachments—who will do their level best to drive him back where the robbers can get at him again—as would for example certainly happen to him in Paterson, if he went to that place. There is many a Stanislaus undergoing that experience there now, as well as in other places, and though the Stanislauses may be able to identify the "men in uniform," it won't do them much good.

This particular Stanislaus happened to be broken in a little earlier than the others, and passed the initial test in a most gratifying manner. That he gives promise of making an excellent citizen from the standpoint of the gentlemen to whom God in his infinite wisdom has entrusted the property of the country, goes without saying. In fact, his experience might be made an official immigration test of desirability. Alacrity to obey the demands of men in uniform and a ready disposition to give up, could be made the object of an official experimental test on Ellis Island before the immigrants get to the mainland. We are admitting too many doubtful characters now, and as a selective test this process would certainly tend to weed out the undesirables. Those who display willingness to give up on demand are most likely to continue the habit afterwards, while those who do not readily respond to the test could be sent back whence they came, without getting an opportunity to make mischief. We proffer the suggestion gratis to the immigration authorities, believing that under present conditions there is no better test of the desirability of an immigrant laborer than one which demonstrates the ease with which he can be robbed by "authority."—New York Call.

THE MILLS OF MAMMON.

The mighty mills of mammon—how monstrously cruel are they!

The mills of production, upon which the entire human race depends for its life and sustainance are become as raving wolves and are turned upon the toiling millions, and they are grinding their lives away instead of furnishing them with an opportunity to live. The mills that should be run with an eye single to one cause—to furnish a livelihood for the race—are, instead, forcing the producers themselves to starve because they produce too much.

Aye, they are crushing their limbs into their mighty wheels and are no longer concerned with making commodities, but are interested only in grinding human lives into gold—dirty gold.

The bread shops are no longer interested in making bread fit to be eaten, but are concerned only in making gold for their greedy coffers, and hence the adulterated bread.

The dairies are no longer concerned with putting up pure milk for the nourishment of innocent and defenseless babes, but are looking only to their god of mammon, hence they make milk of chalk and water and alum.

The clothing industries are not in the business to make dollars, and hence we can no longer get the lasting clothing like grandmother once made.

The shoe trust has no interest in furnishing shoes to the barefoot, but to make the most money, and hence we are almost unable to keep shoes upon our feet.

Not a brewery nor a distillery is running to make drinks for men to drink, but to make money, and hence the very existence of whisky, rum, gin, wine and beer and all the poisonous drinks that lure the appetite to the destruction of humanhood into a drunkard's grave.

Railroads are not built and maintained for transporting purposes, but to make dividends for the stockholders, and hence the thousands of lives that are crushed by these traps of death.

No mine is run for the purpose of getting ore nor to dig coal to warm the human race, but to make money for the promoters.

Not a storehouse or a mercantile establishment is run to furnish groceries or clothing to the people, but to cause the people to divide up their earnings with the merchant.

Paper mills do not run to make paper that lasts and preserves the knowledge of the race, but to make gold, and hence the cheap, rotten paper that will not last but a few years at most until it makes it an impossibility for us to preserve the knowledge of our day as our forefathers did, but will make our civilization sink and be forgotten as did ancient Rome. And even the churches, I fear, are no longer run for the purpose of expounding ethical and moral teachings, but to furnish a living for a preacher who is too lazy to work and to fool the workers while masters rob them.

Day by day the mighty mills of mammon are grinding away every element of moral life, of spiritual life and of physical life throughout our land. They are crushing the bones of our youth into their mighty wheels.

They are forcing the little child to make the living of the father and mother.

They have become as a mighty leperous plague when they should be a blessing to humanity.

They gradually work to death our youth where they fail to kill them suddenly in their mighty wheels.

They are poisoning our darling babes.

They are driving our girls into prostitution, shame and death.

On every hand death is lurking where there should be fountains of life.

There are forts and arsenals where there should be life-giving institutions.

The class who produces all are robbed of all to heap filthy lucre into the slimy palms of idle parasites.

The mills of production—the mills that should produce the means of life and for the purpose of sustaining life are become the cruel jaws of death—the mills of mammon. All this because of private ownership of the means of life.

How long, O how long?—The Eye-Opener.

WAR AS THE BIG GRAFT.

A German paper, the Ilustrite Zeitung, got out a war number. It sought the advertisements of persons and firms engaged in manufacturing armaments, clothing, military supplies. A high official of the war office wrote letters to manufacturers, indorsing the patriotic publication. Some rival paper probably got the news, an investigation was started, with the result that the whole glorious war game has been exposed as a business, or, as we would say, loosely, a graft.

Dr. David Starr Jordan exposed that feature of military glory long since. The Krupps and others have been caught working up war scares. Their press agents operated on papers in Berlin and Paris, probably in London, too. Aggressive, inflammatory articles were gotten into French papers, in order that a cry might be raised for Germany to arm. France was declared to contemplate doubling an order for a supply of machine guns, in order that Germany might duplicate the order. So, too, German news of armament was circulated in exaggeration so that France would put more money in armaments. It is not beyond suspicion that German manufacturers and French manufacturers worked hand in hand. Each boosted the game of the other to make demand for guns, etc. Each so patriotic, too.

One of the leading German armor firms is financed largely with French capital, has two Frenchmen on its board of directors and transacted its business in French. The German firms pay enormous dividends out of their patriotism. They sell without competition. Officials don't care for prices. The people pay. All the European nations are kept worked up by rumors of new explosives, new cannon, new battleships ordered by other nations. The Krupps in Germany have made enormous fortunes, and they have used the circulation of such rumors to great advantage. If the Peace Congress organization would publish for international polyglot circulation the full revelations made by Herr Liebknecht in the Reichtag as to the machinations of the war material firms, the cause of peace would be advanced enormously. It is remarkable that some of our peace papers like the New York World do not tell the whole story of the German exposure. Ed Bernstein's condensation of it in the London Nation reads like some of the stories that were told of Boss Tweed, in his days of power in New York.

If the people of the nations knew how they were being played upon in appeals to their patriotism in behalf of war appropriations, they would put an end to the whole infernal "trade in murder." They would see what was behind imperialism, glory, conquest—chiefly a scheme to sell cannon, rifles, explosives, battleships to governments at big profits. Suppose all the people knew such a story as that told by a disgruntled agent of an English armament firm to a jury in an English court.

He was correspondent for the armament firm in South America. During the strained relations between Chili and Argentina, he kept in touch with both governments, giving the news of each to the other. Each was told the other was ordering battleships in England, and each, finally, in pure fear, bought battleships from the same firm.

In France, French and German capitalists interested in armor plate and munitions, obtained as a united syndicate a concession to work the iron ore at Quenza in Algeria, but the French papers laughed it out of existence. The syndicate was not dissolved. It went to work to dig iron ore in Morocco "for the equal benefit of French and German defences." Such things seem like comic opera, but they are sober reality. They are not new. The original Krupp, who has been ranked only after Bismarck and von Moltke among the makers of modern Germany, did business with Napoleon III. The British Armstrongs have a branch house in Italy, a member of the Triple Alliance. German firms have taken naval contracts in Russia. The German people have paid uncounted millions to the Krupps and others. The Krupps are the chief beneficiaries of German militarism. Reading between the lines of the German papers it is plain that the armament grafters over there are up to all the tricks of Standard Oil, and then some. They are powerful in politics, in the army and navy, at court, in finance, in the church. They are behind the fear frenzy as to England. They run a war-scare factory. And it is safe to assume that in England, France and Austria, Italy and Russia other armament firms do the same thing. Indeed, it is not beyond possibility that the armament firms have an international understanding. Publicity of these facts, the widest kind of publicity, will do more to stop war than all treaties or conferences. The Socialists all over the world will do their best in that line, but non-Socialist "pacifists" should help, and the first great movement they could start would be one which, taking for granted in each European nation a duty of defense requiring it to arm, would keep the business of war in each nation's own hands.

The London Nation says: "An international Labor party, looking out for things to nationalize, would do a great service to peace if it could persuade every civilized state to make an end of the private trade in war, and to manufacture its armorplate, its ships and its guns exclusively in its own yards and arsenals If a simultaneous wave of common sense could enforce that decision in Great Britain, France and Germany, we should expect to enjoy a surprising immunity from scares, and to note a sharp decline in the organized clamor for competitive armament." And with change of name the story applies to the United States. War is only Big Business at its heartless worst, and war is one thing that would surely be better under public than under private ownership and operation, pending the time for its annihilation. —William Marion Reedy in St. Louis Mirror.

DEBS TALKS OF THINGS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Eugene V. Debs, the great Socialist leader, talked on a variety of subjects at his room in the Kanawha when he was visited by a representative of the Kanawha Citizen the other evening.

"It is strange," he said, "that when the workers of this country constitute the majority, and the overwhelming majority, they are the only ones to be denied the things that so greatly concern their temporal advantage. Here is the Supreme Court of the United States with every member a corporation lawyer, representing the minority. How long would it take the majority of the country to get representation on the Supreme bench? They cannot do it. At least, they haven't been able to do it so far. The Congress of the United States is become discontented? We are charged with preaching discontent, and that torchbearer of civilization. It is the beginning of progress.

Intelligent Discontent.

"But the people are becoming discontented with this condition, and the time is coming when it will no longer exist. And why should they not become discontented? We are charged with preaching discontent, and that is what we do. But we do not preach discontent with the good and the wholesome. We seek to create enlightened discontent—discontent with the things that work ill to the whole people. Intelligent discontent is the torchbearer of civilization. It is the beginning of progress.

"Fundamentally, the labor movement is educational. It develops intelligent thought. The laborer's thoughts run on a higher plane. When education takes effect, the laborer becomes discontented with his lot. Think what intelligent discontent has done. Here is a man living in a cave. Suppose the cave-dweller had been content to dwell in a cave. Here are the American colonists. Suppose they had been content to live under the galling injustices of the English government—of King George as set forth in the Declaration of Independence? Here are millions of human beings in the chains of slavery.

Slavery.

"Suppose they had been content with slavery—and suppose the commercial and industrial interests of the northland had been content with the conditions that worked to their injury under a regime of slavery. And there are other instances without number. The history of this country, and the history of the world, is a continual history of strikes—of men who dared to strike for liberty. If the men who oppose strikes will reflect on the history of their own country, they will realize that it is only through a succession of strikes that this country exists. George Washington was a striker. Thomas Jefferson and Patrick Henry were strikers. Abraham Lincoln was a striker. Jesus Christ struck against the sins with which the old world was reeking in that day.

"The people of West Virginia should thank the coal miners of the state for striking. Take the strike spirit away, and you have robbed the American citizen of the American spirit. You can determine the status of a nation by the status of its working class—always, and everywhere. Consider China. There are no strikes there. The workers submit like 'dumb, driven cattle.' The nation rests on a foundation of slavery, and is debased to that level.

Not Individual Struggle.

"But this industrial struggle is not one of individuals. It is a fight for a principle. We do not seek to bring about personal ill feeling between the capitalist and the worker I do not abuse the coal operators of West Virginia. The fight for their material interests under the conditions that exist. We seek to create discontent with the conditions under which capital and labor are set against each other. But we do not countenance blind revolt. Intelligence is progress. Stir ignorance into revolt, and you will start a tornado; and it will have the effect of a tornado—destruction; but there will be no progress there.

"The remedy for all the trouble is for the workers to vote together. Let them organize, unionize, and co-operate—and then stand together as one man at the ballot box. They constitute the majority. Why, then, should they not develop the power of the majority?

"If the workers had voted together through the years that have gone, there would be different conditions today. Look at our laws, and at the construction and the interpretation of the law. Look up the definition of law. There can be no law where there is no power to enforce it. Law is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power.

Controlling the Power.

"But mark this: The man who controls the power—he is the master of the law. So far, in every age, the men who control the means of production have controlled the law-enforcing power; and in consequence the laws of every age have been made and interpreted in the interests of the ruling class. It is against a system in which the wealthy and minority class is always the ruling class, and in which the wealth-producing and minority class is ruled by the richer and smaller class, that we protest; not against individuals, and in the true sense not against a class—but against a system.

"There are three ages—savagery, barbarism, civilization. In the beginning we have the individual; then we have the family, and then the tribe. Tribes finally developed into nations. But in the tribe the man who had the greatest physical strength was the leader—the chief, under the law of physical prowess. To be a leader, a chief, or a king, the sole requirement was gigantic stature and strength; and the head of the tribal government could do as he would, without hindrance. But that age has passed; barbarism, too, has passed, and civilization is here. If you or I were to exert the strength of a giant to obtain our desires without regard for the wishes or the rights of our fellows, we should be in jail in five minutes.

Mental Robbery.

"But under civilization—and this is the point I would impress—under civilization, if I am a mental giant, I may not go about committing physical assault on my fellowmen and taking from them the things that are theirs, but I may subjugate them through my superior mentality; and thereupon I am hailed as a chief and as a benefactor to the race. From an ethical standpoint—as a question of morality—from a purely Christian viewpoint, what is the difference between this physical subjugation and this mental robbery? The physical giant no longer rules and takes tribute at will; and the time is coming when man will no longer be able to rob his brother through superior mentality.

"Under the Roman law the patrician literally owned the body of his slave, and could do with him whatever he pleased. He might kill him if he so desired. Then came the feudal system, and the feudal law—under which the lord could no longer kill his slave, but could still rob him. He could not own or kill, but he still owned the means of life—the soil, the implements of labor, all the means of production; and that amounts to the same thing.

"Today, we no longer have the master and the slave, or the lord and his serf. In their stead we have the capitalist and the wage-worker. We no longer have the feudal law. But we have laws that legalize the exploitation of the weak by the strong. In the feudal ages the serf had no voice in the affairs of state. The lords made the laws, and they owned a judiciary that interpreted the law. Today the worker has the ballot, and by its intelligent use he may obtain a voice in the councils of government But meanwhile the capitalist does in his way what the feudal lord did in his. He sits in the Legislatures and controls their discretion—and his representatives construe the law to his profit."—Kanawha Citizen.

ACCIDENTS IN COAL MINES.

The coal-mine accidents occurring in the United States during the year 1912 have been compiled by the United States Bureau of Mines under the direction of Frederick W. Horton. The publication which is now ready for distribution gives a resume of the accidents from 1896 to 1912, inclusive, with monthly statistics for the year 1912.

Mr. Horton in reviewing the year says: "During the calendar year 1912 there were 2,360 men killed in and about the coal mines of the United States. Based on an output of 550,000,000 short tons of coal produced by 750.000 men, the death rate per 1,000 employed was 3.15 and the number of men killed for every 1,000,000 tons of coal mined was 4.29. The number of men killed was the least since 1906, the death rate per 1,000 employed was the smallest since 1899, the death rate per 1,000,000 tons of coal mined was the lowest and the number of tons of coal produced in proportion to the number of men killed was the greatest on record. These facts offer indisputable evidence that conditions tending toward safety in coal mining are actually improving and that coal is now being mined with less danger to the miner than ever before. The general improvement in 1912, as compared with 1911, is shown by the following facts:

"In 1912 the number of men killed in the coal mines of the United States was 359 less than in 1911—2,360, as compared with 2,719—a decrease of 13.2 per cent, and this in spite of the fact that there were more men employed in the mines and more coal mined than in any previous year.

"The death rate per 1,000 men employed in 1912 was 3.15, as against 3.73 in the previous year, a decrease of 15.5 per cent.

'During 1912 for every 1,000,000 tons of coal mined 4.29 men were killed, as compared with 5.48 men in 1911, a decrease of 21.7 per cent.

"There was 233,000 tons of coal mined for each man killed in 1912, as compared with 183,000 tons in 1911, an increase of 50,000 tons, or 27.3 per cent.

"Although the improvement in 1912 was greater than in any previous year for which accurate statistics are available, partly due, perhaps, to exceptionally mild weather during the last few months of the year, decreasing the likelihood of disastrous coal-dust explosions, there has been an annual improvement for a number of years, as indicated by the accompanying table:

Number of Men Killed in and About the Coal Mines of the United States in the Calendar Years 1907 to 1912, Inclusive, With Death Rates.

	Number Killed
Years.	Total.	Per 1,000 Employed.	Per 1,000,000 Short Tons Mined.	Production Per Death Short Tons.
1907	3,197	4.88	6.93	144,000
1908	2,449	3.64	6.05	16 5,000
1909	2,668	4.00	5.79	173,000
1910	2,840	3.92	5.66	177,000
1911	2,719	3.73	5.48	183,000
1912	2,360	3.15	4.29	233,000

"It will be noted from the foregoing table that the death rate per 1,000,000 tons of coal mined has decreased annually, that the production per death has increased each year since 1907, and that the death rate per 1,000 men employed has steadily decreased during the last four years.

"This general improvement has been brought about by a combination of causes, the principal one of which has been more efficient and effective mine inspection on the part of the state mining departments and state mine inspectors throughout the country, supplemented by greater care on the part of both the operators and the miners. The investigative and educational work of the Bureau of Mines has kept both the operator and the miner alive to the various dangers connected with coal mining and has shown what precautions should be taken to avoid these dangers. The bureau is therefore gratified with the improvement shown, particularly as the greatest improvement relates to dangers concerning which the bureau has been conducting special investigations, as is shown later. The bureau, however, can not too strongly express its appreciation of the co-operation of the state mining officials and the operators in the work of making coal mining safer.

"Although there has been an annual improvement in mine-safety conditions since 1907, and a particularly notable one in 1912, a still greater decrease in the death rate can be effected. Whether or not such an improvement will be made in 1913 depends largely on the care exercised by the operators, superintendents, foremen and all others in authority, and by the miners as well, to prevent the rise of dangerous conditions and to avoid unnecessary risks when such conditions have arisen."

WHO ARE THE WORKING CLASS?

The Answer to the Question Should Make You Investigate Social Conditions.

Who are the working class? Many members of the working class, who dress after the fashion of their masters and ape their manners, would repel with lively indignation and scorn the suggestion that they belong to "the backbone of the country," the working class. They think that between these "hewers of wood and drawers of water" and the "upper ten" there exists a class whose fortunes and interests are neither.

The idea is fallacious. Manners may make the man, or nine tailors working in harmony and with might and main, may accomplish the feat, but neither manners nor the tailors give a man his class status. Nor can the nature of the person's daily occupation draw the line of class distinction, though the fact of any occupation at all being followed goes far in the direction of placing the subject in the ranks of the despised and rejected.

Many imagine that the working class are those who perform what they are pleased to refer to as manual labor ,as distinct from those they are even more pleased to call mental workers. But if this is so, where is the line to be drawn?

Who, think you, has to exercise the greater mental activity—the booking clerk, serving out tickets, or the signal man, passing the passenger safely on to his destination?—the office dignitary who works out the amount of the joiner's wages, or the joiner involved in the intricacies of staircasing and hand-railing?

As a matter of fact a little consideration will show us that it is impossible to draw the line anywhere, for the simple reason that there is no such thing as a distinction between manual labor and mental. The brain is the center of all activities. Every muscle in the body, therefore, derives its power of movement from the brain. It follows, then, that every muscular activity must be mental as well.

On the other hand, there is no possible means at present known by which any mental activity can find outlet to the world save through the exercise of manual or muscular effort in some form or other. A thought cannot be written without the muscular effort of wielding the pen, cannot even be spoken without the muscular exertion of moving the lips. So all mental labor that does not perish fruitless in the head wherein it is generated, must be manual as well as mental.

What is it, then, that divides the community into classes? What is that there is common between all those who constitute each class, yet is not common to the different classes? The answer to this question, when we find it, may throw some light on the first.

If we take a survey of those about us, our fellow members of society, we find them a motley crew. Some are old, some are young; some fair to view, some we shouldn't care to be mistaken for; some are big and strong, some small and weak; some are good, like ourselves, some are awful perishers. But none of these things can form the basis of a class division.

Shall we say that all the strong, or the good, form a class by themselves? Then class cannot go by families. There can be no working class families, or other class families. For there are long and short, strong and weak, plain and comely, in every family; and though, (of course), all crime is with the working class, not all the working class are criminals.

In the same way occupation does not supply the test, for the same families frequently supply the workers for both the office, the workshop and the factory; the salaried black-coat and the waged cloth-cap.

What, then, can it be, that divides and unites the people into classes?

There are two things and two things only we can discover that remain fairly constant in certain circles, seldom dividing individual families, although separating families into two great groups and keeping them apart. These are, the possession or non-possession of wealth, and the necessity or otherwise of working for money or selling one's energy.

A moment's thought will reveal the fact that these things are intimately connected. People possessing considerable wealth are not compelled to sell their strength and energy in order to live, while those who do not share in the ownership of wealth have no means of living except by means of the sale of their labor power.

So there we have it. The working class are the propertyless, those, with their dependents, who must sell the strength of their mind and body, for sustenance. What matter whether it is expended in mine or office? What matter whether it is paid for with salary or wages? All these trivialities vanish in the essentials that it provides. The propertyless have to work, to obey, to suffer unemployment, insecurity and poverty. The propertied live idle and luxurious lives—and dominate.

The working class, then, are those who have to sell their energy to live.

POETICAL

THE DEVIL'S SOLILOQUY.

One day as the devil sat musing alone
In the midst of his cozy warm fire,
And trying to figure the difference in guilt
'Tween a thief and an all-around liar,
His memory turned to the scenes of his youth
And his eyes filled with hot boiling tears,
So he took down his ledger and turned to a page
Dated back about six thousand years.

"I suppose," he said, as he glanced thru the book
"I am doing the best that I can,
For my business denotes a continual increase
Ever since the creation of man.
I've cribbed a good harvest for six thousand years
And should be content with the yield;
And give my opponent permission to have
The gleanings I leave in the field.

"I gathered a very diversified crop
Of merchants and lawyers galore;
I've bound politicians in bundles until
Every one of my fingers are sore.
I've fiddlers, gamblers and insurance men,
I've murderers, forgers and liars,
And I've filled up the furnace with green pugilists,
Till they actually put out the fires."

"I've railroad conductors and doctors to spare;
Horse traders and preachers to spend,
Republicans, Democrats, hoboes and yeggs,
And two or three newspapermen.
But there is one class I am hoping to say,
Can never gain entrance here—
Their souls are so dirty I am sure that they would Demoralize hell in a year."

"I refer to that thing, neither human nor beast,
The carrion crow of the world,
Who is never happy unless he can feast
On the wreck of an innocent girl.
A million of years in my warmest of rooms
His slander would never atone,
So I give them a match and advise them to start
A little hot hell of their own.."

With his fingers he lit an asbestos cigar
And placing his book on the shelf,
He muttered, "I may be a bad man,
But I have some respect for myself."

A REGRET.

"Who's Allen."

Accursed be thy name, O vinous drink,
Whether drained from drunkard's cup or silvered flask,
From thee my body, mind and soul doth shrink
As from the ancient and the fabled asp.

Too often in my younger days I quaffed,
Forgetfulness in poison seeming sweet,
And when reproached by friends I oft'etimes laughed
To hear them speak of "gutters" and the "street."

In tones and looks that should have been a guide
To one of careless ways and lack of will—
An outcast now, I must forever bide—
Forever drink, if I would conscience kill.

Too long at Bacchus' shrine I, ling'ring, knelt;
Too long the "Still, Small Voice" I hushed to sleep.
The tortures of the damned I since have felt,
When from my parched throat I strove to keep

The poison that defiled both brain and soul,
Till now a derelict I drift—I sink.
My misspent life is ebbing fast. The goal
Is nigh. I fear to see beyond the brink.

My soul from mortal self shall soon be freed
And I shall stand before His throne of grace.
I wonder if in this hour of direst need
He'll let me greet and "meet Him face to face"?

Alas! for years He called me, yet unheard.
My trembling soul at last must take its flight.
O if from Him I had a single word
Before my plunge into eternal night.

THE EDITOR of the Miners' Magazine has accepted an invitation to deliver an address at a picnic to be held at Hancock, Michigan, Sunday, June 15th, by Hancock Miners' Union, No. 200, W. F. M.

THE PRESIDENT of Craig Miners' Union of Owingsville, Kentucky, in writing to headquarters, expresses confidence that the strike will be ultimately won. A short time ago, while the strikers were holding their regular meeting in a church building, they were fired upon by the hired thugs of the company. This cold-blooded assault of the hired gun-men did not cool the ardor of the strikers, but only fortified their determination to continue the struggle until victory is achieved.

Copies of The Miners' Magazine are wanted of the following dates of issue: Dec. 9, 1909; Dec. 23, 1909; Dec. 30, 1909; Jan. 6, 1910; Feb. 3, 1910; Feb. 10, 1910; March 10, 1910; March 17, 1910; March 24, 1910; March 23, 1911; March 30, 1911; Apr. 20, 1911; Aug. 17, 1911; Aug. 24, 1911.

Any parties having copies of The Magazine of the above dates will do the Western Federation of Miners a favor by forwarding same to Ernest Mills, 605 Railroad Building, Denver, Colorado.

THE MINE OPERATORS' ASSOCIATIONS, the Manufacturers' Associations, the Employers' Associations, the Citizens' Alliances, the Kirbys, Posts, Parrys and all the other frothing enemies of the labor movement can never crush or suppress unionism as long as the men in the ranks of labor are true to themselves and loyal to their obligations.

IT IS NOW CHARGED that Haywood, Ettor, Giovannitti and other famous leaders of the I. W. W. during the Lawrence strike, feasted on porterhouse steak and mushrooms, and finished their sumptuous repasts on strawberries raised in hot houses.

As the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has discovered a shortage in the donations contributed to the Lawrence strikers of $10,800 that is unaccounted for, it may be that the leaders enjoying banquets had something to do with the leakage.

THE SO-CALLED INDUSTRIAL WORKERS organization has become a rabble and an unmitigated disgrace to the cause of labor. It can not have the support of any man with his eyes open who hopes for the coming of the co-operative commonwealth. Nay, more, it should have his opposition, since its antics are charged up to the Socialist movement and its anarchistic leaders miss no opportunity to seek to undermine the Socialist cause.—Social-Democratic Herald.

Whenever the unsophisticated become acquainted with the swindling methods of the Workless Wanderers, the I. W. W. will die of hunger.

"THE GOVERNMENT is in the market for men; it is advertising its wants."

This is the statement of Major Croxton, United States Infantry, a gentleman who is booming a scheme by which the movies will show the delights of army life and thus entice harmless laboring men into the ranks of organized murder. Thousands of feet of films are being prepared, and silver-tongued army orators will lecture as the reels unravel their attractive pictures. From an announcement of the plan we learn:

"Five parties will be kept traveling, each exhibiting motion pictures and enlisting recruits attracted by the display. Thirty thousand men are needed annually to fill vacancies. The five traveling parties, it is estimated, will bring in about 15,000 men, while permanent stations in nineteen of the large cities will supply 20,000. Each party will include a line officer, a surgeon and six sergeants. Regular theatrical methods will be pursued."

We are preparing for war. Stand up and shoulder your rifle. What will the war be for? Never mind. Shoulder your gun and keep your mouth shut. The government is in the market for cannon-food.—Coming Nation.

NO MAN ever ruled other men for their own good; no man was ever rightly the master of the minds or bodies of his brothers; no man ever ruled other men for anything except their undoing, and for his own brutalization. The possession of power over others is inherently destructive—both to the possessor of the power and to those over whom it is exercised. And the great man of the future, in distinction from the great men of the past, is he who will seek to ereate power in the peoples, and not gain power over them. The great man of the future is he who will refuse to be great at all, in the historic sense; he is the man who will literally lose himself, who will altogether diffuse himself, in the life of humanity. All that any man can do for another man or people is to set the man or the people free. Our work, whensoever and wheresoever we would do good, is to open to men the gates of life—to lift up the heavenly doors of opportunity.

This applies to society as well as to the individual man. If the collective man will release the individual man and let him go, then the individual man will at last give himself gloriously, in the fulness of his strength, unto the soeiety that sets the gates and the highways of opportunity, and opportunity will give you men.—George D. Herron.

IT OCCASIONALLY HAPPENS that members of unions get disgusted over some trivial matter, fancied or real, and as a result deliberately stay away from the union meeting. Then, when something does go wrong, they immediately put the blame for the mistake on their union. Before they waste another breath finding fault with their union, they should stop and ask themselves what is the cause of the trouble. In other words, find just where the blame belongs. When a union man does this, the ehanees are that he will find that the whole trouble started something like this: You and others were at stray meetings in the past. You never attended regularly and consequently you never were really posted on what was going on. When it came to doing anything, you never wanted to serve on any eommittee or attend to any duty of the union. You always wanted some one else to bear the brunt of the routine work. The grievances you had and still have rankled in your breast but you never presented them in proper form at the union meeting. What was the result? The entire work of the organization fell on the shoulders of a few. That was unfair to them and you who stayed away and refused to help were partly to blame for it. You, by staying away from the meeting, laid the foundation for the abuses and wrongs which flowed direetly from this state of affairs. —Exchange.

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT has reversed its decision in which it held that the grant of a patent gives to the holder thereof the power to fix the price at whieh the patented article may be sold after it has passed from his possession.

It is not infrequent for the Supreme Court to reverse its decisions, but it is seldom that a reversal follows so speedily upon the heels of an unpopular deeision as the reversal of its patent monopoly deeision. Not more than a year has passed sinee the original decision was made.

The Supreme Court is quite fallible. It is none to its discredit that, having erred, it should be moved to correet its error. There is a judieial doetrine, much in favor, by which an original error is perpetuated on the ground that to correct it would cause greater injustiee than to permit to stand, but with demagogues abroad in the land, with sensational newspapers discussing legal questions without any eomprehension of the principles of justice, and with the mob showing a disposition to question the righteousness of judieial deerease designed to entrench privilege and monopoly, what can a eourt do that has ears to hear and eyes to see, exeepting to reverse itself when it finds that it has fallen into error?

No one but a baseball umpire can make a rotten decision these days and get away with it.—Milwaukee Leader.

SENATOR KERN of Indiana, in delivering his speech in the United States Senate, in support of his resolution calling for an investigation of conditions in West Virginia, said:

"Men are being imprisoned in West Virginia today beeause they are Socialists, and newspapers are being suppressed beeause they preach Soeialism. Men are being discharged from the mines because last year they voted the Socialist tieket. Soeialism has grown and will grow just in proportion as wrongdoing is countenanced by the Legislatures and the courts. Those who voted the Socialist ticket last year should be held as patriots who go out on the first battle line, because they love their country."

The outrages committed by exploiters are doing more to advanee the cause of Soeialism than all the propaganda of orators and journals that are arrayed against the infamies of organized greed.

The erimes committed by the official chattels of West Virginia who were but the servile lickspittles of the coal barons while they yelled "law and order," have done more to arouse the workers of this continent to the soulless brutality of a master elass than a million of speeches and editorials. Capitalism, in its mad frenzy for dividends, is hastening the dawn of that glad morning when the sunburst of economic freedom shall expel the gloom of slavery from the face of the earth.

A NAMELESS POET wrote the following Tribune to his dog:

"If I ealled to him to follow he would trail o'er hill and hollow; he would never pause or leave me while he had the strength to erawl; he would stiek through fight and frolie—merry days or melancholic—asking only to be with me in my fortune or my fault. Yes, though shame and degradation made me shunned by all ereation, through the valley of the shadow and the paths where terrors dwell, with a love that does not alter, with a trust that cannot falter, he would follow me unflagging, though my roadway led through hell!

"Dog o' mine, you're shy on breeding ,but unless I'm poor at reading there is love and faith unending in those brown and gentle eyes, and although you're far from pretty, that's no eause to call for pity—you've a world of canine wisdom for a fellow of your size. So I love you 'eause you're loyal and your heart is truly royal, with a warmth and tender vigor that would befit a king, and beeause your dumb devotion is as measureless as oeean and as fervid as the passions that the poets love to sing.

"Yet the scientists aver that you're an ordinary eur, that in your canine eomposition there is not a hint of soul. Let 'em prove it, word and letter, but I know a whole lot better, and I guess your name is entered on the "fit for heaven" scroll. Truth to tell, when I have ended all the spaee it was intended I should spend upon this planet; when, in short, I've "got my cue," I shall think, good dog and plucky, that I sure am mighty lueky if they'll let me up in heaven where they've made a plaee for you!"

A MOTHER writes the following letter to "The Citizen" of Schenectady, New York:

"Editor of The Citizen:

"Will some one advise me just what to do. The house where I am living is to be sold, so we will have to move soon. I have looked all over for a place to live, but beeause I have three small children, no one will have me. What I want to know is which will be the best thing to do—give them away or kill them? It seems as if I will have to do one thing or the other, as I can not live on the street with them. If I try that, some great big brave policeman would arrest me and put me in jail, and I don't know what would beeome of my babies.

"Then again, if I kill them, God will never have them in Heaven, as a great many of the plaees I have tried to rent are owned by good Christian ehureh members, and, as they could not stand to live in the house with little ones, they surely could not stand to live with them in Heaven. I will look for advice in next week's paper, as time is short here. Yours truly, A MOTHER."

It is now in order for all the famous and celebrated upholders of large families to come to the rescue of this mother.

Gentlemen of national repute in politics and in the chureh, who have for years denounced "raee suicide" have now an opportunity to "make good." Here is a mother with three small children who declares that landlords have locked the doors against her simply because she has rendered obedience to the divine injunction: "Increase and multiply, replenish the earth." Here is a chance for Teddy the Terrible to achieve more reputation and advertising than he secured in Michigan while trying to prove to a court that he was a member of a soda water club.

IF CHIEF POSTAL INSPECTOR JAMES CORTELYOU would take a night course in geography, he would diseover he is living in America and not in Russia. This obscure official is twisted in his boundary lines, because he says he never will permit copies of the Philadelphia Vice Commission's report to be sent through the mails.

The report, while hardly fit for kindergarten work, will open the eyes of a lot of grown-up children, and for that reason Rt. Rev. Mercer of the Protestant Episcopal church of Philadelphia recommended that his diocese purehase 10,000 copies of the report and circulate same in the interest of moral reform.

But Office Holding Cortelyou has handed down his ukase to the effect that "not a copy will leave the postoffice, as it is not proper reading matter."

It's a question with thinking people whether to laugh or "cuss" at bantam roosters of the Cortelyou breed.—Toledo Union Leader.

If the report of the Philadelphia Vice Commission is so foul as to smirch the United States mails by admission, then how foul must be the conditions which breed vice and crime?

If the report of the vice commission contains language that would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of our average eitizen, then the conditions which bring forth such an ill-smelling report must be a disgrace to our boasted civilization.

Capitalism shrinks in terror from the exposure of the depravity and debauchery, bred from the profit system. The people, however, will know the facts, regardless of the ultimatum of an official liekspittle who prostitutes his position to smother the infamies born of an industrial system that is so criminal that even its publicity is so monstrous that it must be denied admission through the United States mails.

CONDITIONS in West Virginia, as revealed by Mr. Berger in reciting his experience as a member of the Socialist party investigating eommittee, are quite medieval, save as they are modernized by "bull moose" specials equipped with gatling guns with which the coal barons found sport in shooting down the striking miners and their wives and children.

When knighthood was in flower, it was great sport for the barons to gallop through the country eutting down unarmed peasants. It was their country and, of course, they had a right to do as they pleased. Then came the revolution, which changed the subjeet, with some of the first gentlemen of France losing their heads to give amusement to a pleasure-loving rabble.

In West Virginia the coal barons and the Standard Oil and railway corporations have complete title. There are no publie highways in many of the counties. They own everything. To step foot upon the soil is to become a trespasser upon their private domain.

When a miner leases a hut he binds himself not to entertain any stranger without the permission of the coal company's representatives. No one is permitted in the county, which is privately owned, save by the grace of the corporations owning it!

No such a condition of affairs can be found in any country of Europe. Even in Russia the czar is supreme, and no private capitalist can set up a state within the state and with an army of hired thugs deny to the subjects of the crown the liberties and rights which are common to all.

It has remained for the United States, "the land of the free and the home of the brave," in a state which has for its motto, "mountaineers are always free," to present such a shameful spectacle to the world. —Milwaukee Leader.

A Tip for Investors

RICH AMERICANS have so developed the habit of going over to England and buying up Great Britain's "ancient monuments and archeological treasures" that the House of Lords met the other day to see if there was no way of stopping the spoilation. One of the noble lords moved to insert in the "ancient monuments" bill they were discussing, a clause enacting that the sale of any ancient monument which was to be removed from the United Kingdom was to be declared null and void. He had heard that the owner of Stonehenge, who had offered the property to the nation of $600,000 and had been refused, had threatened to sell the stones to an American millionaire who would ship them across the Atlantic.

His proposal, however, was rejected on the ground of "practical difficulties in carrying it out," which is merely another way of reasserting the "rights of private property." So the American millionaire is still at liberty to purchase what he wants in the way of ancient monuments and archeological treasures.

In view of the continuance of this condition, it may be timely just now to suggest that rich Americans in their search for British property of this description should not overlook the House of Lords itself. It is an ancient monument of sorts, and still in a fair state of preservation, though it perhaps can hardly be considered an archeological treasure. "Archological relic" would possibly be a more fitting descriptive term, and as the British people now manifest some desire to get rid of it, there is reason to believe that negotiations for the purpose of shipping it across the Atlantic and setting it up somewhere on this side might meet with success. Some of our rich Americans have heretofore been buying it piecemeal for their daughters, in a matrimonial sense, but such purchased units still remain in Great Britain. A contract for the entire job lot in bulk is in order just now, and as the British people seem disposed to part with it on reasonable terms, it undoubtedly could be procured at a cheap rate. It isn't exactly private property, so there should be no "practical difficulty in carrying it out"—of the country. It would assuredly be much more ornamental, and certainly not less useful, than the circle of Druidical stones on Salisbury Plain, and, besides, it would have the advantage of being easily shifted from one social center to another, as its presence might be required in such places as Washington, New York and Newport. Even Chicago might now and then be permitted the privilege of putting in its claim for the appearance of the noble aggregation in its midst. Or it could be temporarily split into sections, groups, or even individuals, and apportioned to different localities at the same time, to be recombined and again split up as often as occasion demanded

Now that Morgan is dead, the field is open for any ambitious capitalist to secure this ancient outfit for America. It would certainly for some time to come be considered a "treasure" on this side, though the British people are fast ceasing to regard it as such, and now that they manifest a disposition to "spare their old nobilitee," the chance should not be overlooked, as such an opportunity may not occur again. If our rich Americans wait too long, the growth of Socialism may render the investment worthless and unsalable on this side of the Atlantic or anywhere else. For when "Dukes are three a penny," nobody wants them. The time to invest is now, before the property depreciates further in social value.—New York Call.

Suicide or Fight?

"AN EPIDEMIC of suicide," says the daily press, commenting upon the alarming number of persons who have chosen the short route out of an industrial hell during the past few weeks throughout Western Canada.

But after all, it is not more strange or certain than an epidemic of fever where no sewerage system obtains or the first principles of sanitation are not adhered to, as in railway construction camps.

As a matter of fact there are thousands of unfortunate men and women seeking jobs, penniless and in many cases in a strange land and being without money are, needless to say, without friends.

After being turned out by the landlord or boarding house mistress, and having made a day-after-day diligent search for a chance to sell themselves to a boss on the installment plan, the outlook becomes gloomy.

An attack of the "blues," sometimes referred to by juries as "temporary insanity," follows, and the victims mentally ask themselves: "What's the use?"

To the men it ofttimes resolves itself into a choice of sudden death or a slow process of starvation with all that that implies.

To the woman it may mean a choice between becoming a plaything for young rich-bloods in a house provided by society for the selling of their bodies, or death.

Who can know the mental agony suffered by the suicide previous to the time when they resolve to end it all?

How many of us would be too cowardly to face such a situation?

In a world dominated by human hyenas and grasping corporations, seeking only to enslave men, women and children, is it any wonder there are suicides?

On the contrary, is it not a seventh wonder there are not more of them?

If it were not for the bulldog tenacity of the race perpetuation instinct within our kind, especially among the working class, fewer persons would stay with the bitter struggle for existence.

Capitalism breeds all sorts of methods of securing a living, as every police court and social institution on earth amply testifies. Almost every married wage-worker in every industrial center nowadays is compelled to resort to all manner of means to make ends meet, from taking in the proverbial "roomer" to wasing dirty linen.

And what the single men and women do to earn a living is well known to every tenant of a modern boarding house or apartment.

A society that is fairly rotten to the core, a social system that breaks up the home and destroys the best intentions and strongest desires to live like human beings can beget nothing but the everyday stories of the daily press.

The fount from which it all springs is the labor market, and so long as men and women consent to make a commodity out of their very life force—ability to work, labor-power—the sad story will be a continued one.

The organized labor movement is the one buttress against the grinding forces of capitalism, and upon its growth and education depends a good deal of what the future has in store for mankind.

None can save the working class except the working class.

If ever there was a time for unionists to take a fresh grip and determinedly fulfil their age-long mission that time is now.

Be a live one.

Refuse to suicide!

Fight!—B. C. Federationist.

Should Think More and Talk Less

ARCHBISHOP SEBASTIAN G. Messmer of Milwaukee recently delivered an address on the subject of Woman Suffrage. His address, summarized, is as follows:

"My firm belief is that woman suffrage granted on the demand of the modern woman's movement, would do the greatest harm to the family and the state.

There is far too much unchristian, infidel sentiment connected with that movement for anyone who holds Christianity to set aside.

"The principles upon which this movement is supported are unchristian.

"I will not for one moment admit the absolute perfect equality of man and woman.

"The next step will be that woman has the same rights and the authority in the church as man.

"In the whole work of the human race, woman has another work to perform than man.

"Propagation of the race is only a condition required for the work intended by the Creator.

"The prevailing majority of Catholic teachers, theologians and philosophers deny the political equality of men and women.

"God has determined that woman should be inferior to man."

The sentiments expressed by the archbishop are in perfect accord with the ideas of men who lived generations ago. The archbishop, like many of the exalted dignitaries of the Catholic Church, go out into the graveyard of the past to find arguments to halt movements that have for their object the emancipation of the race.

According to the logic of the archbishop, equal rights for women are unchristian, but the potentate of the church forgets to prove his statement. If woman is not to have equal rights with man, then woman is the slave of man and the Christianity that gives its approval to such slavery is bereft of every vestige of justice.

Woman has struggled through all the centuries of time to stand side by side with man, and in spite of man and all the prejudices of the opposite sex, she has slowly but surely risen from her knees, until today she is looking man squarely in the face and demanding that she shall be equipped with the same weapons as the sterner sex.

She is no longer in the role of a beggar, but insisting that her hands shall hold the power to defend her sex and to redress the wrongs, that man—her brutal master—has imposed upon her.

The Arch-bishop has declared that "God has determined that woman should be inferior to man."

That declaration will not stand analysis and we shall attempt to prove from the Arch-bishop's own words, that he does not believe in it himself. If God has determined that "woman should be inferior to man" then why does the Arch-bishop contend that the woman granted suffrage, that her next step will be that woman has the same right and the authority in the church as man.

If the Arch-bishop believes that God has "determined that woman should be inferior to man" and he has faith in the omnipotence of God, then why does he fear that woman shall demand the same rights and authority as man in the church? Such sentiments from the Arch-bishop stamps him as a coward and proves conclusively, that he is conscious of the fact that woman on "a fair field and no favor," can demonstrate her right to be recognized as the equal of man.

The Arch-bishop should think more and talk less.

For Profit

THE GOVERNOR of West Virginia is drawing in his horns. With an investigation by the United States Senate threatened and with an investigation under way by a committee of the Socialist national organization, the puppet governor has lost his assurance and confidence that his mine-owning masters are the supreme law of the land. He has directed the militia to release prisoners held without warrant of law and the return of property confiscated in defiance of the federal constitution.

It is significant that both the United States Senators from West Virginia—one a Democratic mine owner and the other a Republican lawyer fresh from the federal bench—have defended the overthrow of civil law and the constitution of the state and nation.

Senator Goff, who justified the lawless course of the state authorities by pleading the "higher law" of capitalistic necessity, is typical of the men who, on the bench and in the legislative halls, are making a mockery of our institutions. How well this Senator serves his state may be better understood when the purpose of the mine-owning interests, of which he is a political puppet, is revealed. We quote from the Wall Street Journal:

> The labor that there is, is the free West Virginia mountain white labor. Its efficiency is 30 per cent and an average of 60 to 70 per cent is necessary for profits. By doubling the production on the same amount of equippment it would be possible to increase profits four-fold. The key is, therefore, labor. Until the foreign miner is imported to displace or to supplement domestic labor, conditions will not be favorable. West Virginia must do what Pennsylvania has done.

What the capitalistic interests purpose to do in West Virginia is precisely what Cromwell did in Ireland. They purpose to drive the mountaineers from their homes and replace them with foreigners whose ignorance of conditions will permit them to be more mercilessly exploited than it is possible to exploit the native mountaineers.

"West Virginia must do what Pennsylvania has done."

Capitalism has no sentiment, no love of country, no idealism. It is the universal hog.—Milwaukee Leader.

The above editorial in the Milwaukee Leader and the extract taken from the Wall Street Journal, furnish some food for the mental digestion of the working class.

Journals of the type of the Wall Street Journal are publications that frequently make eloquent appeals to the bone and brawn of America whenever the war clouds appear upon the horizon. The man born beneath the fluttering folds of the starry banner is portrayed as of the highest type of citizenship in times of impending trouble, but when he rebels against the machinations of industrial tyrants to reduce him to abject slavery or peonage, then subsidized organs of the brand of the Wall Street Journal become indignant that he should protest against his economic master and suggest that his place be filled by the man from the Old World, who is looked upon as more docile and less liable to resist greed in its demands for dividends.

But the Wall Street Journal forgets that the foreigner who took the place of the striker of Pennsylvania years ago, has learned something of the brutal methods of capital under the flag of a republic. He has learned that capital is as merciless beneath the canopy of an American sky as under the czar-ruled domain of Russia, and the foreigner is clasping hands with his American brother in the struggle to overthrow the hellish system that enthrones the dollar and degrades the man. The Wall Street Journal, like all other publications of its character even denounces in the most vigorous language the foreigner when he fails to be subservient to the despotism of industrial pirates.

The journals of capitalism play race against race and creed against creed in order that Shylock shall receive his "pound of flesh." But the great struggle for economic liberty covers the earth, and the working class of every nation is coming closer together and the time is not far distant, when the mouthpieces of capitalism can no longer delude labor by its specious sophistry.

Labor throughout the world is slowly but surely discerning the cause that breeds masters and slaves, and as intelligence advances, the closer comes the dawn of that morning when justice shall prevail in every clime beneath the sun.

The Tragedy Becomes a Burlesque

THE FOLLOWING appeared in an exchange and is worthy of the calm consideration of people who have given serious thought to crime and criminals:

"The Illinois vice commision has taken a trip to Washington and has invited prominent Washington Society women to tell them why women fall. Among those invited is Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, daughter of ex-President Roosevelt and a lot of other women who, no doubt, know a lot about vice by their own experiences, but care nothing about correcting it unless there is money in it. As a matter of fact, Longworth Street in Cincinnati is noted for its brothel houses, and is a big source of revenue to the Longworth family.

"At the sitting of the commission the main point to prove seemed to be that low wages does not tend toward vice. These high brow aristocrats gave as causes for vice among women such reasons as follows: Joy riding, rag time dancing, men, lack of education and resisting force, etc. As remedies, tax on bachelors, the whipping post, sex hygiene, the ballot and early marriage among men.

"Eight dollars a week for women was considered enough to live on and keep pure. What must the working people think of such legislators looking to aristocrats who claim that $18,000 a year is not enough to keep their daughters respectably and expect workers to live on $8.00 a week?"

It is somewhat strange that the vice commission of Illinois should call on women of the type of Mrs. Longworth for information as to the causes that lead to the downfall of so many women. When did women of the type of Mrs. Longworth become an authority for a vice commission to interview?

Had the fact that Alice has been charged frequently through the newspapers with smoking cigarettes and other escapades that add no dignity to the refined and cultured woman, anything to do with a vice commission calling on Roosevelt's daughter to ascertain the causes that make women social outcasts?

A vice commission that calls upon women of fashion or the "smart set" to gather facts concerning vice, becomes a farce and proves conclusively beyond every shadow of a doubt that such a commission lacked the mental stature to grapple with a problem that is attracting the gravest attention from the ablest men and women in every nation on earth.

For a vice commission to interview a giddy dame of fashion simply because she happened to be the daughter of a man who was President of the United States, looks like converting a tragedy into a burlesque.

Labor Opposed in the Legislature of California

THE ELEMENTS that usually oppose labor have been in evidence during the session of the Legislature of California. Every bill that was introduced that favored the working class met with the opposition of the corporate and commercial interests.

The following is taken from the Sacramento Union and shows the fallacy of the "identity of interests" between employer and employé:

"Senator Caminetti made almost his last stand for the labor unions late yesterday afternoon, so far as this session is concerned, when he tried to pass two bills in their interest, as well as in the interest of workingmen in general, who earn their livelihood in the bowels of the earth, but in both instances he got in the way of the 'steam roller' and was defeated once more in his efforts to accomplish that which the laboring men wanted.

"The bills related to men working in the gold mines of California. One of them required that all drills be used in connection with water, thereby making the task of drilling less dangerous to the eyes, as well as more healthful to the men employed in that line of work, but he was defeated, ayes 10, noes 20.

"The second measure provided for a straight eight-hour day for miners, and specified that the men were to count their time from the moment they entered the shaft until they left it, in other words "going and coming on the owners' time."

"It really looked as though he had a chance to pass the last named bill, but at a critical moment Senator Lyon, chairman of the committee on labor and capital, who all during the session had been a stanch friend of organized labor, threw his weight against the bill, and that settled it, for, like its predecessor it went down and out to the tune of ayes 14, noes 18.—Sacramento Union, May 13."

The "Bull Moose" in the last election dominated the State of California and the Legislature so far as its control was concerned, was made up of members of the "Bull Moose" political faith. It will be remembered that during the late national campaign the spouters and boosters for the reformers who broke away from the Republican party were profuse and extravagant in their promises to the working class, but the "Bull Moose" Legislature of California shows a record which will hardly meet the approval of laboring men.

The following taken from the editorial page of the Amador Ledger, a weekly sheet mortgaged to the interests of corporations shows to some extent the fight that has been made against all measures demanded by labor:

"The action of the Amador county mine operators and business men in sending a committee to Sacramento to oppose the Finnegan mining bills has stirred up the whole mother lode against this vicious legislation.

"Two of the bills were about to pass last Friday when the Amador county committee arrived in Sacramento, but they succeeded in getting them referred to committees for further amendment, and then sent word up and down the mother lode for assistance. Grass Valley, Nevada City, Auburn, Placer and Angels Camp responded, and delegations from these places are now in Sacramento assisting the Amador county people to defeat the measures.

"One of the bills provides for weekly pay days. This will necessitate the mines cleaning up weekly, and the stores boarding houses and other trades people will have to render their bills weekly, and it will create confusion all along the line.

"The Amador county delegation have appealed to everybody who is opposed to this legislation to immediately write or telegraph any Senator or Assemblyman whom they know to help defeat the bills.

"There is another bill that provides that when an employé is discharged if he claims that he has been discriminated against, he can have his case arbitrated. But Finnegan's collar to collar bill, permitting employés to eat on employers' time, and Finnegan's inspection bill requiring platforms to be put in the ladder ways every 60 feet are regarded as most obnoxious. Mr. Martin, the superintendent of the Utica mine, claims if these bills are passed he thinks the Utica Company will cease operations at Angels Camp, and a number of our low grade mines in this county might have to close down.

"Senator Caminetti and Assemblyman Dower seem to be alive to the situation, and have promised to do what they can either to defeat this legislation or to have the bills amended so they will not be so burdensome. Most of the delegation that went down from here last Friday returned Saturday as the Legislature adjourned Saturday night until Monday. Some of the delegation returned Monday, and Mr. McGee and Senator Voorheis went down Tuesday and will probably remain there until the session adjourns. Mr. Hamilton, the new state mineralogist, has come out in opposition to these mining bills after thoroughly discussing the matter with Mr. McGee, and his assistance will be very valuable in procuring the defeat of the measures.

"The chairman of the El Dorado county miner's association telegraphed that when they had their meeting a couple of weeks ago they did not have the bills before them, and did not know to what extent the legislature proposed to go.

"Since the above was written we learn that the fight on the mining bills has been waging all week in Sacramento, and up to our going to press is still undecided.

The eight hour collar to collar bill which counts as part of the eight hours the time in going and coming from work, also the meal hour, which passed the assembly, has been hour. A letter from the miners union dated at Jackson, and signed by M. C. Hoffman, as president and James Giambruno secretary, says among other things. "Under the present system miners go to work at any old time; some companies claiming that it takes as long as one hour for the men to reach their place of work." This will be news to this community. A committee from the Sutter Creek union is at Sacramento fighting for the bill. This bill and the 'dry hole" bill, and inspection bill, which provides twenty or thirty rules for working mines, from the storm center.

"The legislature has been flooded with letters and telegrams, from the mother lode against the bills. The final result will not be known until the legislature adjourns."

The laboring people should learn some lessons from this opposition which labor measures meet with in legislative bodies. This opposition coming from employers should expell from the minds of working men, that there is any identity of interest" between master and slave, and when once the employé becomes conscious of the fact that the interests of employers and employé are diametrically opposed to each other, there will come about a political solidarity among the laboring people that will crush the opposition of exploiters and parasites.

Some Interesting History

CALIFORNIA is passing through the same ordeal as that state passed through, when the cry was raised against the pig-tailed Mongolian more than thirty years ago.

Men whose hairs have grown gray in the labor movement will remember the fiery speeches of Dennis Kearney on the "sand lots," and will remember that the said Kearney visited the principal cities of America endeavoring to arouse the American people against the invasion of the "Chink" from the Flowery Kingdom.

But Kearney's furious outbursts against the Chinese were unavailing and only received the jeers and scoffs of the daily journals, whose editors branded him as an agitator and blatherskite.

The Chink was wanted by the exploiting class, for the simple reason that the rice-eater would work for less wages than the disinherited patriot who boasted of being born beneath the folds of "Old Glory." But as time passed on, the Chink invaded the commercial domain and became a competitor with the American business men, and then, the smaller fry in business raised a howl of indignation against the saffron-tinted son of China and pleaded for the assistance of the labor movement to expel the Chinese from our Western Coast. But the laboring man remembering the sneers and scoffs of his American brother in business, while the Chink confined himself to the labor market, paid but little attention to the wails of that element in business that felt the competition of the Chinese.

As long as the Japanese refrained from engaging in business, but was willing to work for others at less wages than the patriot born on American soil, the Jap was welcome in California, but when the Jap purchased or leased land and came into the market with his products, then the lightweight sharks in business in California, raised such a hue and cry, that a legislative body passed a bill to protect the American patriot in business, from the competition of the Jap in business.

It was all right, as long as the Jap worked for wages and worked for less than the ragged and hungry proletaire of America, but when the Jap dared to invade a domain that was sacred to the American exploiter, a law must be passed to either drive him back into wage slavery or force him to proclaim war against the United States.

If a war ensues between the United States and Japan, the workingmen of America will do the fighting, as the business men are always willing that labor shall share all the glories of war.

The Investigation Will Educate

THE RESOLUTION introduced by Senator Kerns of Indiana calling for an investigation of conditions in West Virginia, is worthy of more than passing notice. The senate of the United States is not made up of men representative of the interests of the working class, but on the contrary is made up of men whose interests lie with a class of privilege. The senate of the United States is frequently referred to as the "American house of lords," and yet, this body with all it loyalty to the upper strata of society was forced to give favorable consideration to the Kerns resolution.

The senate committee, through its sub committee, will make inquiry into the following principal charges:

"Does peonage exist in the coal fields?

Have strikers been prevented from free access to post offices?

"Have the immigration laws been violated and whether the district has been discriminated against?

"Have citizens of the United States been arrested, tried and convicted in violation of the laws of the United States?

Has the Sherman anti-trust law been violated in the railroads' relations to the coal properties, and the effect of this upon industrial conditions?

"Have firearms been imported into the district to create disorder which should exclude the West Virginia coal from competitive market?

"What conditions and circumstances led up to the recent strikes, martial law and indiscriminate lawlessness?

The question naturally arises as to what was the power or influence that forced the highest law making body of the nation to give a hearing to the demands incorporated in, the resolution introduced by the senator from Indiana? The answer is found in the strength of organized labor of this country and the socialist movement, both of which bodies, are fighting the battles of the oppressed.

Let us presume that there was no labor movement or socialist party in America, is there anyone who will contend for a moment, that conditions in West Virginia or any other state, would be forced on the attention of the senate of the United States?

Were there no labor or socialist movements the strikers of West Virginia would be treated with as little consideration as the peons of Mexico, and no man at Washington would have called upon congress to focus its vision upon the anarchy of plutocracy.

But the labor and political movement of the working class can no longer be ignored, even by the representatives of a master class, for men in congress who have their ears to the ground can hear the rumbling of the earthquake, and they know that anarchy in broadcloth breeds anarchy in rags.

They know that anarchy born of poverty, and industrial slavery may result in a revolution that might shake the pillars of our capitalist civilization, and ultimately, wipe out the murderous system of exploitation that deifies the dollar and degrades the man. By some, the investigation will be looked upon as a farce, but the reports that will come from such an investigation, should demonstrate to the laboring millions of this nation, that capital in its race for dividends, knows no justice.

Investigations must necessarily educate the working people, and a working class educated, cannot be held in the bondage of wage slavery.

Why West Virginia Is Different

By Frank J. Hays, International Vice President of the United Mine Workers.

THE CONDITIONS in West Virginia are different from those in other states. The mining camps are situated in the mountains.

The coal companies own practically all of the land, the houses and the stores in the mining territory, making it necessary for the coal miners' union to feed, clothe and house the strikers upon the beginning of any struggle.

This condition does not obtain in the large industrial centers. Without taking this into account it is impossible to properly comprehend the problem presented by the West Viriginia situation. These conditions have developed a feudal state in the coal mining regions that find no comparison exeept in the Feudalism of the middle ages.

It will take more than a few weeks or months to bring the West Virginia Coal mining situation to a successful termination for the workers.

It is a long drawn out struggle that will take time, energy and perservance to bring to a successful conclusion.

In fighting the situation in the New River District the miners' union has adopted a plan of taking care of every miner who is discharged because of his allegiance to and membership in the coal miners' union.

Every time a miner is discharged because of activity in behalf of the miners' organization we propose to make an organizer out of him and to keep him in the vicinity of the mine from which he is discharged.

Thus supported by the organization he will continue to talk unionism to his comrades in the mines. He will be a source of encouragement to the timid miner who fears discharge and discrimination. With the fear of starvation and eviction removed he will be in a position to enlist in the fight for the emancipation of his fellow workers.

We understand a splendid spirit for organization prevails among the miners in the New River field. If there is any great opposition to this plan of organization we will likely call out every worker in this particular region. We feel, however, that success will soon crown our efforts and that within the space of a few months the New River District will be one of the best organized under our jurisdiction.

We intend to pursue the same course with all the other coal fields in the state and feel satisfied that with the continued agitation and publicity splendid results will be achieved.

The Kern resolution introduced into the United States Senate has made a nation-wide issue of this struggle for human rights and it goes without saying that there will never be industrial peace in West Virginia until the miner's right to organize and to fully enjoy his constitutional rights is firmly established.

Every worker in the nation should be directly interested in this struggle because of the fundamental working class principles involved.

These are now endangered unless the proletariat of the land awakens to the deep signficance of the situation. We call upon the workers everywhere to lend us their hearty support and encouragement.

A SLAM FOR MORRISSEY.

P. H. Morrissey and his Railway Employers and Investors' Association that buncoed the poor simpletons on the Harriman and Illinois Central lines who joined it out of thousands of dollars, has gone out of business because it was not a paying institution, and Morrissey did not earn his salt, much less the ten thousand a year the S. P. donated to him. So Morrissey, on bended knee, begged for another job wherein he could serve his master.

Lest the boys on the C. B. & Q. get insurranced to death, we wish to say that any scheme of P. H. Morrissey to benefit labor is for the benefit of Morrissey and his gang, who run around in swallow-tail suits with white bow ties, leaving one in doubt whether they are looking at a waiter, an undertaker or a faker.

Morrissey was formerly a labor "bleeder," commonly called a labor leader, and so well did he lead the B. of R. T. boys that the brakemen and other trainmen get as much as $35 per month. Extra men; oh! No, brother, the regulars are getting about the same as the fellows who sell ribbons, while the common laborer has moved six notches above the "tallowpot" on wages. If it isn't true ask the next crew?

As for the Eagle Eye, they've doubled up on him until he doesn't know where "he's at." What is more, the Eagle Eye is a steady worker—so much so that the only way you can get one of them away from "his" beloved road is to short-circuit him out of the cab, some engineers even admitting they think more of their engine than they do of their wife.

Brother Roughnecks, Morrissey can lord it over you only as long as you stand for it. As our German friends would say, "Raus mit him!"

SABOTAGE VS. SILLY GAHOZH.

Agnes Thecla Fair.

Ever run across the "wise men" from the foolish East—the fellows who say, "put the fourth-class labels on the third-class cans"? Thereby delivering a knockout drop to capital. Like the high school boys and college chappies who shout "Rah! Rah! Rah! Bah! Bah! Bah!" They make a noise and leave an odor like a passing naughty-mobile, but that's all. The very fact that they wear a number of labels and carry a banner saying, "Tomorrow we're going to butcher the fatted calf and give King Capital half," shows how serious they are about saboting.

Again we find the preachers of sabotage with two red buttons on their coat lapel. One reads "Y. W. W."; the other, the size of a pie plate, reads, "I'm the guy that put the bull in bull con," which makes us roughnecks feel like saying, "Oh, well; oh, hell!" they have lots to learn.

Fancy one of us working girls going around with a sign on our back reading, "I'm the girl that put the ruff in roughneck." Anyone seeing such a sign would know that we were harmless as far as the master is concerned, and Mrs. Buncombe Jones would take her usual outing abroad, knowing "her" property was safe as long as we roughnecks were crazy with a new religion.

The capitalist class fear only one thing, namely, brains and a wise woman's tongue, is more dangerous to their profits than a thirteen-inch gun.

And when we say that any one advertising in a capitalist paper is being buncoed as this transitory stage, cannot bring them any returns from the working class, they begin to wonder who made us wise.

Or when we tell the workingman the capitalist press is not fit for lavatory paper, they fear the greatest power they have will slip from their fingers. Why any roughneck allows a capitalist press sheet to desecrate his camping place is a modern problem to be solved by the fair sex. Surely it must be very interesting to read how Mrs. J. Seth Glow is the heroine of two nighties or how Guvnor Ross of Massa Massa just ate six little children for supper to-night and smacked his cannibal lips.

It must be news for you to read of these cannibals giving their annual feed—

On golden platters with fruits so rare;
Satan must laugh how roughnecks fare.

CAPITALISM AN ENEMY OF THE FAMILY.

By Theresa H. Russell.

A public school teacher of New York city—a married woman, made application to the board of education for a year's leave of absence for the purpose of becoming a mother and of giving her child a few months of personal care before going back to work. Her petition was denied. From the press dispatches it may be gathered that the tender sensibilities of the male members of the board of education were shocked by the immodesty of her request, for we read that "discussion of the subject was cut short."

The woman school teacher audacious enough to make so outrageous a request is therefore left in the following position: She is married and presumably she must continue to teach school. I have known many school teachers and have yet to meet one that would voluntarily keep on with her long hours of nerve-racking work if she could afford not to. If the New York teacher did not find it necessary to work for a living she would doubtless not be working at this time. So we may assume that she is compelled by financial pressure to work for the support of herself and her child.

Prevention of maternity is in this country a crime. Legislators and moralists give such attention to the rigid enforcement of their edicts on this subject—except among the rich. Only recently we have witnessed a drastic "drag-net" prosecution of persons guilty merely of transmitting information concerning limitation of maternity.

So this avenue was not open to the woman school teacher unless she was willing to subject herself and her medical adviser to the brand of criminal and the chance of a prison sentence. The processes of nature being inexorable, there remains for her one other alternative—suicide. But suicide is also a crime in New York state.

With this perfect example of the justice and protection afforded to them by man-made laws, it is difficult to understand how increasing numbers of women can be so unreasonable as to demand a voice in making the conditions that are imposed upon them by the divinely appointed governing class—man.

There was one other alternative for the married woman who found it necessary to continue teaching school. She might have left her husband—or poisoned him.

Of course, under Socialism child-bearing and child-rearing will be regarded as valuable functions, and will be treated accordingly. But Socialism as we all know is an immoral and a pernicious doctrine because it would "break up the home!"

REPORT OF SAM KILBORN.

Mullan, Idaho, May 31, 1912.

To the Officers and Members of the W. F. M.:

As organizer of the Couer d'Alene district I have visited most of the mines and prospects, and the sentiment amongst the workers is for a stronger organization, and I am looking forward to good results in the near future.

There is considerable talk of one big union, but we must of necessity get our industry thoroughly organized, and other industries must be well organized before one big union prevails. So it is up to everyone connected with the mine industry to get busy and strengthen the organization that is fighting to better the conditions of the wage workers. With the men in the mining industry as one, part of the battle for industrial freedom would be won. Industrial solidarity will not be brought about by your paid organizers or executive heads. It depends on the workers in the various industries. Your organizations will be as you make them, so attend your meetings regularly, get in touch with the things that effect your livelihood, and remember that an unorganized worker is a menace to you at all times, for he is keeping from you the joys and luxuries of this life, and it is necessary to use every effort to get him with you in the great struggle against a master class. Do this, and the dream of the toilers would come nearer to fulfillment. It is the duty of every wage-slave to fight the class that steals from them the product of their toil. So get into the game. With solidarity we can beat them. They have had the best of it so far, but it was owing to our lack of organization, and when we did fight it was like butting our heads against a stone wall. We must forget personal grievances and put the organization first always, and when the day dawns on the mass of workers together on the industrial field the world will be ours.

In regard to the work in this district there are about 3,000 men employed in and around the mines, Wallace, Gem, Burke and Mullen. The minimum rate is $3.50 a day for underground men, and there is only one mine in this section, the Hecla mine at Burke, where you need a rustling permit to work. The rest of the mines and prospects hire the men at the mines. There are sufficient men here to work the mines, and there are men rustling all the time. In Wardner and Kellogg, a distance of twelve miles from Wallace, the minimum wage for underground men is $3, due to lack of organization; but I am pleased to state that the workers in that section are using their best efforts to bring about better conditions. The Bunker Hill mine uses their own employment office, and you must pass the examination and stamp yourself as an enemy to your class before they will give you the rustling permit. The Bunker Hill Industrial Union is still in existence, and the bosses do all they can to induce the men to join, but the Bunker men are opening their eyes and are getting tired of belonging to an employer's association that continually oppresses them. All other mines in this district hire the men at the mines. The employment office is on its last legs, and with a little effort on the part of the organized workers the rustling and permit card will become a thing of the past.

GLEANINGS FROM LIEBKNECHT.

"No Compromise, No Political Trading."

"When I speak here of our policy, I use the word without regard to anything immaterial or superficial, but in the sense which since the beginning of the party it has had for us in contrast to all other parties—in the sense of the policy of the class struggle, which has very often changed in form, btu in substance has remained the same—our unique proletarian class policy, which separates us from all other political parties in the world of bourgeois society and excludes us from intercourse with them."

"In certain circles there exists an inclination, or let us say, an effort, to desert the platform of the class struggle and enter into the common arena of the other parties. As all the other parties stand upon the basis of a political state, therefore their field of activity is necessarily confined to the spoils of politics."

"The question of tactics came up then in our party for the first time. Should we, in consideration of certain concessions to the laborers, aid Bismarck against the Progressive party and other opponents of his policy in the expectation of being then after that strong enough for a successful struggle against him and against the landlord, police and military state embodied in his person? Or did prudence and party interest demand that we, taking advantage of Bismarck's quarrel with the progressive bourgeoisie and other opponents of his policy, contest the Bismarckian policy, and organize the proletariat into an independent political party for the purpose of preparing it for the conquest of political power? . . . The tactics were everywhere accepted which has ever since been in force for the party down to the present day. These tactics consist in:

"Keeping clear the class character of the Socialist party as a proletarian party; to train it by agitation, education and organization for the victorious completion of the emancipation struggle; to wage a systematic war against the class state, in whose hands the political and economic power of capitalism is concentrated, and in this war to draw advantages as far as possible out of the quarrels and conflicts of the different political parties with each other."

"This foundation of the class struggle is:

"The main point of attack in the battle which the bourgeois political economy is waging with Socialism. The political economists deny the class struggle and would make of the labor movements only a part of the bourgeois party movements, and the Social Democracy only a division of the bourgeois democracy. The bourgeois political economy and politics direct all their exertions against the class character of the modern labor movement. If it were possible to create a breach in this bulwark in this citadel of the Social Democracy, the Social Democracy is conquered and the proletariat thrown back under the dominion of capitalistic society. However small such a breach may be in the beginning, the enemy has the power to widen it and the certainty of final victory, and the enemy is most dangerous when he comes as a friend to the fortress; when he slinks in under the cover of friendship and is recognized as a friend and comrade.

"The enemy who comes to us with open visor we face with a smile; to set our foot upon his neck is mere play for us; . . . the enemy, however, that reaches out the hand to us for a political alliance and intrudes himself upon us as a friend and brother—he and he alone—have we to fear.

"Our fortress can withstand every assault; it cannot be stormed nor taken from us by siege—it can only fall when we ourselves open the door to the enemy and take him into our ranks as a fellow comrade. Growing out of the class struggle, our party rests upon the class struggle as a condition of its existence. Through and with that struggle the party is unconquerable; without it the party is lost, for it will have lost the source of its strength. Whoever fails to understand this or thinks that the class struggle is a dead issue, or that class antagonisms are gradually being effaced, stands upon the basis of bourgeois philosophy."

RESOLUTIONS ON DANBURY HATTERS' CASE.

Whereas, The recent decision of the United States Circuit Court against 197 members of Locals Danbury, South Norwalk and Bethel of the United Hatters of North America, in the Danbury Hatters' case, gave judgment against the members of said organization in favor of D. B. Loewe & Co., manufacturing hatters, in the sum of $252,130.10, to be collected by liens against the property, savings accounts and household goods that are available for levy of said individual members; and,

Whereas, This is due to a principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States and twice maintained, that damages resulting from a strike may be collected from the strikers—not damage to property merely, but damage to business resulting from the interruption of trade; and,

Whereas, As a matter of form an appeal was made to the Supreme Court, but there is not a chance that that court will reverse itself on a decision already twice rendered; and,

Whereas, The hatters are to lose everything they may have accumulated in the way of property, savings and other valuables to which a lien can be attached; and,

Whereas, With such a decision allowed to become law by interpretation and precedent and used by the judiciary of the various courts, no union man could exist long or have any such comforts as home, land, real estate, savings account, or anything which would be a means of tiding him over a period of forced unemployment, sickness or injuries caused by industrial accident; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Local Union No. 934, District No. 10, United Mine Workers of America (located in the state of Washington) EMPHATICALLY PROTEST against the action of the United States Circuit Court in rendering a decision which jeopardizes the freedom of the working class who are organized into trades unions and who treat with their employers collectively and not individually; and, be it further

Resolved, That we are absolutely opposed to the practice of the courts of the United States in prostituting themselves in an effort to meet the needs of the employing class and thereby enslaving the employed class by encroaching on the rights of the legislative branch of our government by legislating into law by interpretation and precedent that which the legislative branch (who are subject to the vote of the people) dare not do; and, be it further

Resolved, That any such efforts on the part of the employing class to prostitute the federal courts to their use is a well-recognized sign of decay of power on their part and a sign of disintegration not to be despised by the working class; and, be it further

Resolved, That we call the attention of the entire organized labor and Socialist movement to the necessity for immediate action in both the industrial and political fields to meet this opportunity for industrial and political advancement for the organized labor and Socialist movements; and, be it further

Resolved, That the action of the United States Circuit Court, endorsed by the United States Supreme Court, in the Danbury Hatters' case is in effect peonage, and therefore unlawful, for the following causes:

1. By setting a penalty upon the efforts of the working class to keep pace with the increased cost of living, due to the differentiation caused by the price maneuvering of the employing class in its efforts to accumulate more than an honest share of the commodity value of all production.

2. By making it possible for the employing class to cause labor disturbances with the sole object of getting back the moneys received by the working class, and thus keeping them in a state of poverty which will require absolute obedience to the master's will, so as not to be allowed to earn and keep sufficient of their earnings to maintain a state of existence compatible with American standards of living.

3. By preventing the laboring class that are organized from saving their earnings.

4. By preventing the laboring class from owning homes.

5. By shifting all of the real or acquired property into the hands of the employing class.

6. By creating SLAVERY by peonage; and, be it further

Resolved, That the above resolutions be printed and copies sent to all labor and Socialist organizations and their periodicals; also copies to the President, Attorney-General and Secretary of the Department of Labor of the United States and the Congressmen and Senators of the state of Washington, now at Washington, D. C.

COMPENSATE THE CAPITALISTS?

Should the Workers Pay the Exploiters for Loss of Opportunity to Exploit? Think It Over.

We Socialists are sometimes requested to state our views regarding compensation.

Of course, this always refers to compensation of the capitalists for the expropriation of the means of life. Appropriated by the master class.

Let us examine the matter a little. In the first place, what do we mean by our terms, for if we are to master the subject under discussion, we must, as Mill taught us, understand the import of our words. Compensation, then, means a recompense, an equivalent, that which supplies the place for something. According to Webster, to compensate, is to make amends; to give an equivalent. Very well, let us take this authority, and we shall get on nicely.

We therefore have under consideration the question of rendering to the master class an equivalent. We have to make a statement anent a recompense. Are we to make amends? i. e., should we compensate our exploiters for loss of opportunity to extract rent, interest and profit from ourselves.

Now, the Socialist affirms that by violence, robbery, and cunning the master class have in the course of time, appropriated the earth, and in so doing, have exiled and finally dispossessed the workers from all share in the said earth, and have compelled the workers to toil on this said earth in the interest of the appropriation, the penalty for refusal being starvation and extinction. No capitalist can produce the slightest evidence that the world and its potentialities belong to his class. His claim is, might is right, his argument is force, his method is compulsion, and his standard of morality is in keeping with his mode of existence and wealth production.

But an enlightened working class are becoming discontented with the present system of society, and insist that the master class should not be permitted to continue in control of human affairs, they being of no further use to society, and are a barrier to the natural development of the human race.

Now, apologists for capitalism ask about an equivalent, supposing the workers should expropriate. But we reply, the world belongs to no section of society in particular, and the capitalist class are only a minority and have no exclusive right to the said world, or if put in the form of a syllogism, it would be as follows:

No one section of society owns the earth,
But the master class are a section only,
Therefore, the masters do not own the earth.

Of course, this applies equally to the workers as being a section of society, and, indeed, we do not desire to own it in the sense now understood. We common people are quite content to destroy the masters' control, believing that our mother earth will jog along serenely without a human "owner."

No, the point is, the masters have wrongfully appropriated the world. So, before deciding on the question of equivalent, or amends, let us see what the word appropriation means. Perchance it will clear the atmosphere a little. Appropriation, v. t. To put apart for a particular purpose, or one's self; to assign appropriation, then, is the act as stated. Now I really think the readers of this article will see the significance of this at once. Just fancy, foolish apologists asking us to make amends to wrongful appropriations of a world that doesn't belong to them, when the said act consists in setting apart for a particular purpose (profit) at our expense. Behold then the master class who have assigned unto themselves the earth and all the good things in it, having the cheek to ask us (who own nothing) to make amends; to give an equivalent, to offer recompense.

But what of the masters' capital? Well, what of it? Look here. The capitalist has no exclusive right to the earth. The earth is the mother of all wealth, but labor is the father, and the capitalist is a parasite.

But to capital! the capital! Have patience a moment, study this syllogism:

All wealth is produced (from the earth) by labor,
But capital is part of all wealth,
Therefore, capital is produced by labor.

So the wretched capitalist has no leg to stand on. Now, workers, what about giving an equivalent. In the first place, the masters have nothing due to them, and, secondly, we are unable to give an equivalent for mother earth and the instruments of production, because we have nothing to pay with, unless we could catch Mars in a net, or the moon, and offer these as an equivalent. But when our idle rich, and cunning exploiters, and the other parasites who go to make up the master class, hint at compensation, then must the people remember the blood of millions spilt on the altars of capitalism. If they ask us these things, let us demand an equivalent for the workers slaughtered daily—for profit. Remember the commune of 1871, remember 1848, rememger the Ureka stockade, remember the Titanic, and mining disasters innumerable, the bloody battlefields. Yes, let us ask 'amends' for our brothers and sisters. Oh! fellow workers! 'tis impossible, the insolent master class are so impotent to render an equivalent for our maimed bodies, and for our wasted lives, and shattered hopes and aspirations, as we are to compensate them for centuries of evil doing.

Then let the capitalist evildoers be thankful that compensation is impossible; for if an "equivalent" could be given, one could be demanded. Let the capitalist be glad, that we do not demand an equivalent for millions of our class slain at Mammon's altar. Our mission is to expropriate, i. e., to disengage from appropriation, so that the entire human race may become a mighty association of happy people.—H. J. Wilkes, in "The International Socialist."

SLOT-MACHINE UNIONISTS.

Some workers look on their trade union as a slot machine. They think that by putting in fifty cents a month, $6 a year, for instance, an eight-hour day and an increased wage scale will automatically roll out.

A trade union is not a thing in itself.

Men talk about their union as if it were something separate, distinct and apart from themselves. They growl about the union. They bemoan its shortcomings, and overlook entirely their obligations and their failures.

They fail to see that they themselves are the union, and only as they live and talk and act as union men will the union prosper and be what it was intended for—simply an instrument to make possible the collective action of workers.

A union is not a machine that you can stand up against the wall to throw rocks at, and then secure benefits every time the mood comes over you. You! You! You are the union.

Don't be a slot-machine unionist.—Exchange.

"WORKING PAPERS."

To an official window in one of the city departments of New York a man came recently, leading his little daughter. "I can't get work," he said bitterly. "This child can. They are hungry at home. May she have a permit?"

She was 14 and met the other requirements of the law. So the city of New York gave her the desired legal document, the "working papers," as the children call it. The man and his daughter went out together, the little girl to join the great army of toilers, where the insistent sign of industry, "Girls Wanted—Boys Wanted," always swings in the wind; the father to swell the ranks of unemployed men.

Last year 40,530 children in New York city went the way of that little girl past the official window carrying their working papers with them. Throughout the United States there are some 2,000,000 of these child breadwinners less than 15 years of age. These papers are the passport to freedom from home constraint that economic independence assures. One sociologist has told the story of the 16-year-old girl who, in a dance hall of dangerous repute, tossed her head in defiance of the threat of paternal objection: "I pay the rent," she said 'What can my mother do to me?"—World's Work.

ANTHONY CAMINETTI.

State Senator A. Caminetti has been appointed by President Wilson as commissioner-general of immigration. The appointment is an honor to California, for he has served the state almost continuously since 1878 as district attorney of Amador county, as state senator, as representative in Congress, as code commissioner and finally as state senator—always serving with distinction and always giving service that endeared him to the people. Paul Scharrenberg, whose courage, ability and high sense of honor have caused the State Federation of Labor to send him to Sacramento as its legislative representative, says this of Senator Caminetti's appointment:

"The appointment of Senator Caminetti to the post of commissioner-general of immigration is not only a well-deserved recognition of an exceptionally worthy man, but is also a real service to the men and women of labor.

"No one among the forty senators in our Legislature has rendered better or more efficient service to organized labor than Senator Caminetti. His leadership in the battle for labor's anti-injunction bill is only one of a dozen other struggles in which he led with unmatched ability and rare courage. Senator Caminetti was one man among the few in our State Senate upon whom labor could always depend.

"His position upon a 'labor bill' was never in doubt, and no one who knows the valiant old fighter will for a moment doubt that in his new place of honor his sympathies will always be with labor.

"Surely, organized labor has reason to congratulate itself upon the appointment of Senator Caminetti. Likewise may California take pride in the recognition of one of her best and ablest sons."

In his long and exceptionally useful public career Senator Caminetti has not accumulated a fortune, but he is rich in the good will and respect of the people, which is greater riches than a vast accumulation of stocks and bonds. —San Francisco Star.

WILL SOCIALISM DESTROY THE HOME?

The ruling class through its retainers continues to spread broadcast its shameless misrepresentation of Socialism.

Among these no calumny has ever been more persistently circulated than the one charging Socialism with being an organized assault upon the sancity of the marriage relation and the family ties. This has usually been buttressed with additional slanders that Socialism was grossly immoral and that it would undermine the very foundations of society.

When you encounter the next falsifier of this sort put before him the two following statements made by Dr. C. W. Woodward, health officer of the District of Columbia, to the Senatorial Vice Commission, at its recent session at Washington, D. C.

First—Fifty per cent, or one-half, of all the men, as shown in the hospital records of patients, for all causes, are diseased and ten per cent afflicted with loathsome diseases.

Second—Ten per cent of all the recorded births in the District of Columbia last year were illegitimate, the mothers being between thirteen and twenty years of age in a majority of cases.

That is what now exists under cauitalism, a condition not only shocking in the extreme, but threatening to consume society in its own moral putridity.

According to this showing half the man are diseased, ten per cent of them with loathsome maladies, and one out of every ten babies born is illegitimate.

Here is capitalism for you, dear reader, with a vengeance.

And yet there are thousands of servile defenders of capitalism who have the unlimited gall to charge Socialism with having immoral designs upon society. These miserable mercenaries of the master class, who "crook the pregnant hinges of the knees where thrift may follow fawning," have their olfactories insulated so that the foul stenches of capitalism beneath their noses do not offend them.—Canton Socialist.

THE EBBTIDE OF MILITARISM.

When, a few months ago, the French government decided to raise the term of military service from two to three years, thereby adding some 200,000 men to the standing army, the action was not only represented as being unanimously concurred in by the nation at large, but was received with enthusiastic acclaim both by the populace and the soldiery. Anti-militarism had disappeared, swallowed up in the flood of patriotism that had been let loose. It suddenly became apparent to all that it was sweet and proper to die for one's country, and even the fellows who were scheduled to do the dying were, if anything, more enraptured by the prospect than the others who were urging them to die, if need be. It was a sacrificial era and the victims were the most willing of all to immolate themselves upon the altars of their country.

With those who were acquainted with the resources of mendacity at the disposal of the capitalist controlled press, there was considerable ground for doubting the truth of this presentation. There may have been something of a "wave of patriotism," in all probability artificially stimulated by the hired claquers of militarism. If so, it seems to have subsided. The military fit is over and the voice of returning sanity again rises above the diminishing roar of receding jingoism.

From all over the land come reports of vast meetings of protest, attended by hundreds of thousands of participants. Though prohibited by the government, it has proven powerless to stop them, and its armed forces have stood idly by without daring to interfere, while militarism has been publicly denounced from hundreds of platforms. The army officials have been busy with court-martials on soldiers who have taken part in these demonstrations, and the general current of public opinion sets stronger than ever before in the direction of anti-militarism. The increase blood tax will not be paid without strong protest from the voice of labor, and it is now said to be doubtful if the administration can carry out its projects in the face of the growing opposition. Evidently capitalist patriotism is being rapidly exhausted in France as a stimulant to war, and systematic misrepresentation fails to strengthen its effect in the least degree.—New York Call.

POVERTY IN UNITED STATES.

"It may shock our national vanity, but it is true nevertheless that from 10 to 20 per cent of our fellow Americans are in real distress; that 20 to 30 per cent are living constantly below a physical efficiency minimum, and that even a higher percentage do not receive an income sufficient to maintain either economic or social efficiency."

This statement is made by Arthur James Todd, Ph.D., department of sociology, University of Illinois, in concluding an able article replete with facts and figures dealing with the question of poverty in the United States.

We have been taught to believe that poverty was distinctly a product of the overcrowded countries of Europe and Asia, and that our country afforded untold opportunities for all who were industrious, yet here are facts showing similar conditions existing here without the same excuse, for surely we cannot conceive of this country suffering from an excess of population.

We are shortly to have a convention in Seattle of the National Conference of Charities and Correction. It would be well if this body would as certain the fundamental cause calling forth charity, and of the evils that call for correction, and publish their finding broadcast. This same organization through one of its speakers at its last meeting stated that perhaps one-fifth or one-fourth of our total population in this country, moves along the poverty line. sometimes on the line, sometimes above it, but never very far from it. Recent studies in standards of living and wages among American wage-earners show that fully one-half of the workers of this country do not earn $600 a year. Three-quarters get less than $750. Only one-tenth earn more than $1,000 a year. This means that at least 5,000,000 of the male workers of America receive less than $600 a year.

In the face of these facts our so-called statesmen are puttering over joblots of laws, trying to regulate everything under the sun, but never making a single sensible move in the direction of adjusting our social relations in a manner to make it impossible for parasitism to exist.

In the realm of physical science we long ago discovered that parasites will weaken and finally destroy a body that they infest if allowed full sway, but we fail to see that exactly the same is true with regard to our social system. Quackery will never cure any disease, we must cleanse and purify the system, social as well as physical, thereby making it impossible for disease germs to thrive therein.—Seattle Herald.

ATTENUATED PROSPERITY.

Figures have a most disconcerting way of making the best laid plans of the prosperity organs for fooling the public "gang a-gley." That is, they would if they were not so cheerfully obscured, garbled, distorted, or outrightly falsified by those same organs. For it's an absolute certainty that were all the figures pertaining to our social and economic structure as a nation known to the average voter, and their full meaning grasped by him, there would shortly ensue a political upheaval in this country of a magnitude to startle the whole world.

Take, for instance, the single item of statistics dealing with the value of estates left by New York decedents. It has been found that of all the deceased adults in that city 85.3 per cent left no estates whatever. Estates of from $300 to $1,000 were left by 4.3 per cent, while 5.3 per cent left estates of from $1,000 to $5,000 Another 1.8 per cent who left estates valued at from $5,000 to $10,000. Another 1.8 per cent left estates of from $10,000 to $25,000. Last, but, not least, 1.5 per cent left estates of more than $25,000.

From these figures you will perceive that approximately 90 per cent of the decedents, or nine out of ten, left estates of less than $1,000. Also that those who left no estates whatever outnumbered the others by nearly six to one.

Pretty good showing, that, for the richest city in the world, eh? And, being the metropolis of the United States, the conditions obtaining in New York in this connection may fairly be presumed to be typical of the rest of the country, at any rate the urban part of it, which means the greater part in point of population. As for our farmers, I need only mention here that the great majority of them are either renters or mortgage slaves to make the indictment against dollar civilization complete.

Yes, gentlemen of the dollar press, pooh-pooh them as you like, but these figures tell a tale whose somberness not even your very best brand of frenzied prosperity eloquence can dispel or gloss over. And, in view of that tale, I challenge you to come into court and prove to tbe satisfaction of a right-minded jury the soundness of your boast about "the nation-wide era of general prosperity which we are now enjoying." For I take it that we are all agreed that if a man has had ever so limited a go at prosperity, there should be more to show for it at his death than a gripful or so of old clothes. El Tuerto, in Coast Seamen's Journal.

AN "EXTRA" IN HADES.

It was a dull night in the office of the "Hades Pitchfork," hell's sizzling daily.

The best demons on the whole staff had been combing the dominion for twelve hours, and the best that could be dug up was some re-hashes on mine horrors, strikes, railroad wrecks and an incipient war scare in the United States and Japan.

But suddenly the monotony of the night was broken by a grizzled demon with red whiskers who dashed in the door and made straight for the sanctum of Lucifer himself. This particular demon had spent his span on earth working for the Associated Press, and everyone in the office knew that nothing but the sensation of a year could make him rush like this.

The door to the inner sanctum banged shut and the outer office held its breath. The resultory rattle of machines ceased, small copy demons halted midway in their trips from the few spacers at work here and there to the doors of the composing room. The mahogany-hued demon who had been lolling over the city desk in the corner sat up and pushed a buzzer, yelling into a transmitter, "More steam below!"

The door to the inner sanctum swung open and the aforementioned grizzled demon issued forth, closely followed by "the old man," wearing the smile which only appeared on such occasions as the well-remembered night when the story of the white slave investigations reached the "Pitchfork."

The star demon seated himself at a nearby desk, and seizing a sheet of asbestos paper, ran it into the machine and grabbing a lighted cigarette from the fingers of a copy imp standing near, he began to pound out his story.

Lucifer stood behind, looking over his shoulder, and tore the sheets from the machine almost before the last line was written. Glancing hastily at the first line he handed the copy to a waiting imp, who immediately plunged headlong for the doors of the composing room.

When the story was finished, old man Lucifer started for the door to the composing room, but was met half way by the copy imp with several sheets of steaming galley proof in his hand.

The old man seized the proof and dropped into the nearest chair, and all the rest of the demons gathered around.

Looking over the shoulders of the old man they read:

"Special to Hell.—The sensation of the earthly year is the election of Du Pont of the powder trust, and Hudson Maxim, ordnance expert, as honorary vice presidents of the international peace forum. Carnegie of the steel trust, in a special interview, declares that war is almost at an end. . . . "

AN ORIGINAL CAVE MAN HEARD FROM.

An original cave man has developed in Salt Lake. As an apostle and oracle he utters from his cavern sentiments that would ho honor to a head hunter of Borneo. In the name of God and true religion, Charles W. Penrose, apostle and prominent Mormon journalist, advocates murder, carnage, the shedding of blood and the division of mankind in that most criminal and terrible division known—division into warring nations.

Let him speak for himself, what he says will represent to the reader more clearly than anything we can say this atrocious attitude in the name of holy religion.

"Wa ris not inexcusably, religiously wrong," was a declaration made in the Mormon tabernacle Sunday afternoon by Elder Charles W. Penrose of the first presidency of the church, in criticism of a peace day address delivered from the same platform a week before. "The time hasn't come when war can be abolished," he continued, "and war is not always wrong. There are times when war is proper and there have been times when God commanded it."

We have been taught that religion includes all that is most sacred and clean and pure in the human heart. We have been taught to associate it with peace, good will and above all that divine love that knows no wrong. We have been taught that religion is the opposite of anything that is cruel, criminal, unclean, vile or vicious.

War is everything that is cruel, criminal, unclean, vile and vicious. It is not simply murder; it is mass-murder. It is not simple lack of love; it is the wild, elemental unchaining of all the hates, furies, cruelties, atrocities of bottomless hell. It is the arraying of man against his brother, man in the most criminal, inhuman and soul killing attitude it is possible. It is crime and slaughter, and inhumanity piled mountain high. It is a reversion to the brute. It is a lapse of all morality and all cultivation. It is the glutting of blood-lust and fury and madness.

To hear such primitive sentiments, such barbarism, given the sanction of God and religion is to have our modern ears surprised and grieved by a harsh, terrible and unwonted sound. Think of it! Penrose puts God in the light of a butcherer of men, a sacker of homes, an arrayer of man against man in deadly and terrible hatred—the same God who, in His books and through such oracles at Penrose teaches that forgiveness, forberance, love, kindness, brotherhood, peace, good will, harmony, is the divine way.

Such men as Penrose can do nothing less than make religion a mockery in the mind of the truly modern man. To the modern mind he and his kind cannot appear as anything less than moral freaks, a survival of that promitive religion associated with cannibalism, head hunting and bloody human sacrifice. A man who would give voice to such sentiments as he uttered in the Tabernacle Sunday knows no more about the true religious or ethical evolution of man up from the cave man than the cave man knew about true religion.—Inter Mountain Worker, Salt Lake.

THE YELLOW SLAVE BECOMES THE MASTER.

Money is the universal language that everyone understands. But as any other language, it lends itself readily to the expression of great ideals as well as to base intentions; it may be a means of expressing joy as well as grief, exaltation as well as depression, hope or despair. But you are helpless in this world of ours without money, and you must sell your self in order to get it. The value of both men and things is measured by money. If you inquire of the worth of a man, the answer is given in terms of money.

It is, therefore, only natural for men to strain every nerve in their efforts to acquire money as fast as conditions will permit, without being overinquisitive as to the moral quality of the means employed in this endeavor. The consequences of this are the demoralizing of human society, the brutalizing of men and women, the commercializing of the most tender human relations and the unscrupulous sacrificing of human lives upon the altar of the golden calf. Even the minds of children are poisoned with the lust after money, and when their time comes for choosing a vocation, their ambition is not directed by a desire to find the means of developing their individuality and giving it the fullest possible expression, but by the wish to make money. And they are, at least in many cases, compelled to do so, because of the necessity to make a living. That is what we call modern civilization.

The servant, money, has become the all-powerful master, and the master sacrifices nimself and what is best in him to the service of his yellow slave.

How can we escape this perversion? By doing away with the economic system which makes commodities out of human beings and recognizes no other obligation as binding among men than cash payment. It is Socialism which will emancipate mankind from the tyranny of the yellow slave and establish character, will power and social efficiency as the standard of human worth.—Buffalo Socialist.

LABOR AND THE JAPANESE QUESTION.

While there has been gallons of ink expended on the discussion of the Japanese question, and eminent statesmen have made country-wide trips. in an effort to influence the official actions of California, there has been only one angle of the conditions that have received consideration. Although the little brown men from Nippon have been active factors in the industrial life of California for a score of years, it has only been of recent times that any objections have been made to their presence. The uproar that is being raised against the little brown men is not the result of any objection on the part of little or big business to the competition of the Jap to American labor, but to the fact that he is now competing with them on the farm and in business.

Hailed as a Cheap, Efficient Worker.

So long as he was contented to devote his efforts to increasing the profits for the American land owner, he was eulogized as the savior of the state. As a porter, as a farm, dairy or orchard laborer, driving down the rate of wages, he was a valuable addition to the industrial barons of the state. After the course of years, schooling himself in American methods and customs, Mr. Jap decided that he had learned his lesson, and began to put into practice for himself the efforts formerly expended in his master's behalf. In a small way at first, he offered no serious competition to the white business man, who anxious to keep the cheap labor in the state, encouraged those who branched into business. Today, the Japanese, with 850,000 acres of land under lease and owned, offers a serious problem to the white farmer and business man. Good enough to do their dirty work, but not good enough to own land and compete with them in the business world.

The Wail Comes From "Cockroach" Business.

It is not an uprising against the unfair competition offered to the workers in laundries, workshops, canneries, farms or orchards that causes the great stir, but you notice that it hinges on the ownership of the land. As workers they will be still welcomed, but as farmers or merchants they are not wanted. It is the custom of our industrial system to welcome any force that tends to reduce cost of production, but beyond the ranks of a worker it is "taboo." "Grind down the wages and lower the standard of living, but don't dare invade the sacred realm of our business." Little business feels that it has been warming a viper, whereas the conditions that now exist are the natural outcome of the forces business itself set in motion.

On a Cross of Their Own Construction.

The Japanese was a willing student. He learned his lessons rapidly and he learned them well. The same persistency which made him the dangerous factor on the industrial field is hewing his success in the realm of business. We refuse to weep over the self-inflicted tortures of the "cockroach" business man or farmer. We, as workers, have had to furnish our own sympathy as well as seek for our own remedies. The business men drove our brothers and sisters out of whole California industries with imported Japenese labor, and if the Jap, in turn, does the merchant and farmer up, we should worry. It is too bad that these conditions maintain; that the little brown men should be so ungrateful as to leave his "sphere" and menace the prosperity of his benefactors. It is too bad that business men are forced to suffer from the conditions they or their fathers promoted, but such are the unscrutable ways of Fate. They are being crucified on a cross of their own construction.—Wyoming Labor Journal.

ARCHBISHOP HARKS BACK.

Women's suffrage must take its place with republicanism, free unsoury and Socialism, not counting in the Jews, who have been anathama from the beginning, as an "unchristian," "infidel," "atheistic" and devil worshipping device which, if permitted, would "undermine religion" and "destroy the family." It is quite as bad as the Copernician theory before it was reconciled to the eternal truth.

It seems that having a more intimate acquaintance with "God's plan" than Cardinal Gibbons, who recently rebuked Inez Milholland for stating that Catholic ecclesiastics insist that "faith and morals" are involved in the question of women's suffrage, Archbishop Messmer, speaking with the authority of his high office in the Roman church, says:

"If we come to the question of equal rights, which is the question of woman suffrage as it is presented to us, then the question becomes for a Catholic, for a Christian, a religious question."

The archbishop having discovered a religious question in equal suffrage, opposes the granting of the franchise to women. "God," he says, "has determined that woman should be inferior to man." Yet he is willing to concede that when God determined woman's inferiority, He did not propose to bar her from participating in school elections or from holding minor offices. It is when women go to Congress that they run counter to the original plan. The archbishop says:

"There may be no objection to granting women a certain modified suffrage. It makes a great deal of difference whether a woman is elected on the school board of a city or whether she be elected to the Congress of the United States."

She may be a queen and make laws by divine right, but she becomes hopelessly inferior when, instead of being born to the purple, she is elected to perform legislative functions.

It is well to have these religious questions in our political affairs cleared up by the voice of authority, so that we may know precisely what God's will is before the voters or the Legislature and Congress seek to nullify it.

It is, however, confusing to find men contradicting one another who profess to know exactly what God's designs were when He labored six days and created the earth, fashioned Adam from the dust, breathed the breath of life into him, subsequently causing him to fall into a profound slumber, and extracting a rib surreptitiously, from which Eve, the first woman, was made.

There are bishops and archbishops and cardinals who tell us that there is nothing irreligious in women's suffrage. There are none in the United States who denounce republicanism because it was introduced by "infidels" and "atheists" and "heretics," though in Europe, even today, republicanism is classed with Socialism, while one of the popes condemned it as "unchristian." For it denies the doctrine of "divine right," upon which the papacy rests its claims to temporal power.

The archbishop's onslaught on women's suffrage is to be placed in pamphlet form and distributed by the Rev. Peter Deitz of the Militia of Christ. As a twentieth century survival of medievalism it should command a considerable circulation, revealing, as it does, the wide gulf which separates modern civilization from the age of faith.—Milwaukee Leader.

"RUNNING DOWN WHITE SLAVERS."

An Undertaking that Portends More than People Generally Believe.

Young Mr. Rockefeller is still leading the vice crusade in New York. Another report has been put out, showing an enormous traffic in "white slaves." The "white slave" is largely a myth. No one ever saw "white slaves" but the vice crusaders. The national government has been looking into the traffic and the inspectors are discovering that most of the reported white slaves are anything but innocent victims. An official of New York city, one in an excellent position to know the under side of things in the metropolis, told me not long since that the "white slave" feature of Gothamite vice was altogether imaginary. Men of the world, rounders everywhere, proclaim that the "white slave" talk and writing is a huge case of exaggerated sensational sentimentalism. There are plenty of women of evil life in all large cities, but these are not "white slaves." The inmates of "houses" may be in debt to mistresses, but they are not held prisoners and cannot be. But as young Rockefeller is putting up the money for the "white slave" hunt, of course, "white slaves" have to be produced. I'd think better of vice crusades in New York City if young Rockefeller wasn't financing them. The same way with the Anti-Saloon League. tI would be more effective in many states, for prohibition, if it were not generally understood that the elder Rockefeller was, and is, its angel. There's nothing like stirring up a vice crusade or starting an anti-saloon fight to distract public attention from the iniquities of certain corporations. A loud cry for the reform of vice and liquor conditions is the most effective of all red herrings to drag across the trail of the big economical malefactors when they are being pursued by the public. In this latest report from New York, one of young Mr. Rockefeller's sleuths has discovered that girls do not enter on lives of shame because of poverty, but because they have been deceived in love. This is a "dodge." Girls are seduced because of too fond love; that is true. But not every girl seduced enters upon a life of shame. Very rarely does a betrayed girl whose parents have means go upon the town. She does not have to. Her parents take care of her. They hide her shame. Its fruit is lost and the girl generally marries and stays respectable. It is the poor girl who, after seduction, has to look for work. She cannot live without work. Her shame is known. Such knowledge prevents her from securing employment. Her parents cannot help her. Her one recourse is to go upon the town. It appals good people to know how many women of the town are supporting their children, how many of them are giving of the wages of sin for the support of parents or the education of brothers or sisters. If this does not reveal an economic reason for prostitution, what does it reveal? Of course, seduction has not an economic reason, though even in this it must be admitted that the girl whose family has means and some social position is much less liable to meet a misstep than her poorer sister. She is better safeguarded in every way imaginable. The women on the town, of well-to-do antecedents, with an education, with refined connections, is extremely rare. One in ten thousand is the proportion. That girls of good family and good circumstances do "fall," we all know, as they are but human, but they don't fall so far as the poor girls do, simply because they have not to support themselves. They can conceal their misfortunes. They are, thus, not shut off from honorable marriage. The poor girl, with her published shame, cannot marry, and cannot find work. It is she who is forced to sell herself. And this is why and how poverty produces prostitution, despite the denials of young Mr. Rockefeller's vice or "white slaves sleuths."—From The St. Louis Mirror.

WILSON'S ALASKAN POLICY.

You know what has been the embarrassment about conservation. The federal government has not dared relax its hold, because, not bona fide settlers, not men bent upon the legitimate development of great states, but men bent upon getting into their own exclusive control great mineral, forest and water resources, have stood at the ear of the government and attempted to dictate its policy. And the government of the United States has not dared relax its somewhat rigid policy because of the fear that these forces would be stronger than the forces of individual communities and of the public interest. What we are now in dread of is that this situation will be made permanent. Why is it that Alaska has lagged in her development? Why is it that there are great mountains of coal piled up in the shipping places on the coast of Alaska which the government at Washington will not permit to be sold? It is because the government is not sure that it has followed all the intricate threads of intrigue by which small bodies of men have tried to get exclusive control of the coal fields of Alaska. The government stands itself suspected of the forces by which it is surrounded. Simply to say, "We are not going to do anything about the forests," when the country needs to use the forests, is not a practical program at all. To say that the people of the great state of Washington can't buy coal out of the Alaskan coal fields doesn't settle the question. You have got to have that coal sooner or later. And if you are so afraid of the Guggenheims and all the rest of them that you can't make up your mind what your policies are going to be about those coal fields, how long are we going to wait for the government to throw off its fear? There can't be a working program until there is a free government. The day when the government is free to set about a policy of positive conservation, as distinguished from mere negative reservation, will be an emancipation day of no small importance for the development of the country.

What I am interested in is having the government of the United States more concerned about human rights than about property rights. Property is an instrument of humanity; humanity isn't an instrument of property. And yet when you see some men riding their great industries as if they were driving a car of juggernaut, not looking to see what multitudes prostrate themselves before the car and lose their lives in the crushing effect of their industry, you wonder how long men are going to be permitted to think more of their machinery than they think of their men. Did you never think of it? —men are cheap, and machinery is dear; many a superintendent is dismissed for overdriving a delicate machine, who wouldn't be dismissed for overdriving an overtaxed man. You can discard your man and replace him; there are others ready to come into his place; but you can't without great cost discard your machine and put a new one in its place. You are less apt, therefore, to look upon your men as the essential vital foundation part of your whole business. It is time that property, as compared with humanity, should take second place, not first place. We must see to it that there is no overcrowding, that there is no bad sanitation, that there is no unnecessary spread of avoidable diseases, that the purity of food is safeguarded, that there is every precaution against accident, that women are not driven to impossible tasks, nor children permitted to spend their energy before it is fit to be spent. The hope and elasticity of the race must be preserved; men must be preserved according to their individual needs, and not according to the programs of industry merely. What is the use of having industry, if we perish in producing it? If we die in trying to feed ourselves, why should we eat? If we die trying to get a foothold in the crowd, why not let the crowd trample us sooner, and be done with it? I tell you that there is beginning to beat in this nation a great pulse of irresistible sympathy which is going to transform the processes of government amongst us. The strength of America is proportioned only to the health, the energy, the hope, the elasticity, the buoyancy of the American people.—The World's Work.

SEWING SEEDS FOR FUTURE TROUBLE.

Conditions in the City of Washington are perhaps no worse than in any other city. Landowners are more favored there than elsewhere because half of the cost of the local government is borne by the Federal Government. This arrangement tends to make local taxes less and land values and ground rents higher. It is a fine arrangement for the landowners, but the condition of the classes who perform useful labor is about the same as elsewhere. What that condition is was shown in a report of the National Civic Federation, one of the numerous "philanthropic" organizations which oppose effective remedies for evils they claim to deplore. This report says:

"In Logan's court, in a little over half a block in length, there are nine houses of six apartments each. These fifty-four apartments at the rear are within a few feet of the back of forty other apartments, contained in ten houses, which front into Logan's court. The passage between these two rows of apartment houses forms a second alley within the block. This alley is used for garbage and trash cans and is continually filled with washing strung on lines high in the air. By actual count it was found that there was one garbage can for each six apartments. Said a tenant: 'The basement rooms is a little damp, but that isn't the worst of it. The smell from them garbage cans is awful. You see the folks that live upstairs don't come down to put the garbage in the cans. They just throw it at the can and it never has a lid on and the smell and flics is something awful.' One outside toilet is found here for each four families.

From the same report the following account given by a teacher in one of the public schools, of her experience in searching for a truant child is quoted:

"The front room was extremely dirty with filth of many kinds and particularly that of chickens on the floor. Over in one corner was a bundle of rags, which had evidently been used as a bed. There was no furniture in the room and the girl, who told me she was in service down town, but was visiting her aunt, led me into the kitchen. As no one was there, she said, 'come upstairs with me; my aunt is upstairs.' I started, and when half way up could see into a room where a colored man was lying on the floor drunk, and I heard the voice of a woman, seemingly in altercation with him. Then the woman called out, 'For God's sake, don't you bring any one up here!' I went back to the kitchen, and the woman came down there.

"The room was so dark that I could scarcely distinguish her at first, but after a while I saw that her face was almost eaten away by a cancer, one of her eyes having been destroyed. I asked her who the man was upstairs. She said, 'He is just a friend of mine. He works at the —— hotel and came down here to spend his afternoon off." I then asked about the little boy and she said he was the child of a woman who was in service downtown and who came to see him often and paid her a little something for keeping him.

The reason these conditions exist may be found on another page of the same report. Speaking of the Logan court tenements, it says.

One man owns nine tenement houses of six apartments on Pierce street and also the ten houses of four apartments each, making in all ninety-four apartments. One of the apartments in Logan's court is used as a repair shop for the janitor who looks after all the houses. The other thirty-nine rent for $7 per month each, and they bring in $273 per month. One set rents for $7 and another for $9 per month. The total income per month from these groups of tenements, assessed for taxation at $15,600, is approximately $714, or $8,568 per year. Note the discrepancy between the income and the assessed valuation. This is another respect in which Washington is a "model city."

It is not strange that such living conditions should breed thugs and rowdies, such as disgraced the nation at the time of the suffrage parade. Charles Edward Russell has well described this in the Coming Nation:

Along that line of march for more than a mile stood thousands and thousands of young ruffians and rowdies, coarse, brutalized, savage bullies, that manifestly were without even a rudimentary sense of common decency; vicious, depraved, ignorant youth. Where do they come from? To any experienced traveler in American cities they are no novel sight. We are bringing them up like this by the thousands in every city where human beings are crowded together like beasts and swarm and wallow in conditions that crush out of them every human instinct. These are the product of the slums.

Consider them carefully, you that dwell in purple and palaces. To-day you are laughing because these unfortunate and benighted outgrowths of your system broke up a suffrage parade and voided their tobacco juice upon these women. Look to it well. On another occasion they will with as little compunction do far worse things to you. You have tolerated the breeding of this evil. Look out that it doesn't fall upon your own heads.

Congressman Henry George, Jr., introduced a bill at the last session of Congress, which, if adopted, would have made a beginning at removing the cause of these evils. Of course it did not even come to a vote. To have let it get that far would have taken up some of the valuable time needed to vote appropriations for new battleships or support of the army in the Philippines.—San Francisco Star.

SHORT AND SNAPPY.

Random Raps at Exploiters and Hypocrites.

There is said to be a wide gap and a mighty difference between the lowest man and the highest ape. Without doubt this is true, for science has failed to discover an ape that will work 300 days in a year, and hand four-fifths of what he produces to another ape who gives him permission to work.

In connection with a mutiny in a Russian prison, the cable announces that "troops restored order." The world would be appalled if it knew but the tenth part of the tragic happenings connected with the restoration of order!

The world would shrivel and die but for the workers, but the workers get least of the good things, while the shirkers get all.

This is a world of ideas not of ideals. We cannot be true friends, or sisters, in a world of profits.

If the worker has always been treated as a worm, it's a long worm that has no turning.

In spite of the fact that matches are supposed to be made in heaven, some of them are tipped with brimstone.

Ruskin on wage-slavery: What talk you workers of wages? Whose is the wealth of the world but yours? Whose is the virtue? And do you mean to go on forever, leaving your wealth to be consumed by the idle, and your virtue mocked by the vile?"

Morality and political economy, says Balzac, unite in repelling the individual who consumes without producing.

The starting point of the development that gave rise to the wage-laborer as well as to the capitalist was the servitude of the laborer.—Marx.

Professor Huxley was scarcely a Socialist, but he was a man of humanitarian instincts, and was keenly alive to the horrors of the existing social system. "If I thought that civilization would not get past the present stage," he said, "I would hail the advent of some comet, to sweep the whole away to oblivion."

Charity helps a few for a little whole. Labor wants to make it possible for people to assist themselves for all time.

In a state, pecuniary gain is not to be considered to be prosperity, but its prosperity will be found in righteousness.—Confucius.

When meat trade people combine to put up the price, it may certainly be called joint action.

"More for Need and less for Greed" is good. "All for Toil and naught for Spoil" is better.

Socialist propaganda is not the protest of ignorance. If it were all the old parties would be uttering it.

Charity is like pouring water down a chimney, and keeping the doors open. The hole will never fill.

The desire of riches does not proceed from a natural passion within us, but arises rather from vulgar, out-of-doors opinion of other people.—Plutarch.

The non-workers are ever increasing. Improvements in machinery are continually driving men and women out of employment. At the other end of the scale the great increase in production is enabling more idlers to live on dividends drawn from trusts. Those who work must keep those who don't work.

The hideous and savage struggle for a crust is quite unnecessary. Machinery has made possible production on such a gigantic scale that if everyone worked, and none loafed on rent, interest, and profits, and none were unemployed, and none were engaged in useless work, such as soldiering, lackeying, etc., there would be plenty of necessaries of life for everyone, and each would require to give very little labor to this work.

Fasting is regarded as a good cure for indigestion. If continued long enough it is a sure cure for all troubles of life.

A WISH.

Do you wish the world were better? Let me tell you what to do:
Set a watch upon your actions, keep them always straight and true;
Rid your mind of selfish motives, let your thoughts be clean and high—
You can make a little Eden of the sphere you occupy.

Do you wish the world were wiser? Well, suppose you make a start
By accumulating wisdom in the scrap-book of your heart;
Do not waste one page on folly, live to learn and learn to live;
If you want to give men knowledge you must get it ere you give.
Do you wish the world were happy? Then remember day by day
Just to scatter seeds of kindness as you pass along the way;
For the pleasure of the many may be ofttimes traced to one,
As the hand that plants the acorn shelters armies from the sun.—Exchange.

POETICAL

THE FIRST BACHELOR.

When Adam "batched" in Paradise, before the cook had come,
He found his housework irksome and it was neglected some.
Ad wasn't lazy, either—he was up at early dawn—
But he wouldn't air the bedding and he wouldn't sweep the lawn.
And the serpent heard him muttering "I won't wear any clo'es Until I find a good fig leaf on which the button grows."
Beneath the couch Edenic was collected such a store
Of miscellaneous rubbish as was never seen before;
While in the primal kitchen was a mess which I declare
Was quite enough to make a Christian woman swear.
Then the Lord looked in upon him and He gave an awful groan,
"It is not good, I see," He said, "that man should be alone."
And all terrestial trouble from that very date began,
For Adam soon thereafter had become a "family man."
He had planted hogs in Eden, sown his "garden sass" and thrived,
But he left the dishes standing till the day that Eve arrived.
—Walter Hurt in the Culturist.

TEN LITTLE ROUGHNECKS.

Agnes Thecla Fair.

Ten little roughnecks went out to dine;
One overate, and then there were nine.
Nine little roughnecks discussing 'fairs of state;
One spoke of Democrats, then there were eight.
Eight little roughnecks banded close together;
All talking six hours in any kind of weather.
Eight little roughnecks, all with knowing eyes,
Knocked out King Capital because they were wise.
Eight little roughnecks, all keeping mum,
Copped off the industries and made things hum.
A really, really roughneck always wants more;
Out he reached and grabbed the land, with water rights galore.
Just where to put King Capital, no one could tell;
We asked a really roughneck, who said, "Go to h—l!"

THE STUDENT'S HERITAGE.

Frederick Frye Rockwell.

Hark! Have you caught the warning in the wind that sweeps the world?
Or have your ears been deaf to it, and have your eyes been turned
So fixedly upon the Past, that round about you whirled
Unnoticed and unheeded the revolt of the earth's spurned?

You shall not long stay blind to it; they cannot long shut out
With ivied wall and book and gown the living world beyond.
The stirring tread of marshalled men, the struggle's charge and rout,
Shall reach you yet, and grip you in its world-inclusive bond!

Your heritage, your heritage—the blood that's led the fight
For freedom from all tyranny, for human rights, for man—
Why leaps it not to battle now, where in the van of Right
The bugle-call to danger sounds, as since the strife began?

Your heritage, your heritage—the knowledge of the years
Poured in your laps unstinted from the myriad-handed dead;
Abandon not their trust to you while wrong yet re-appears:
The war for Right still calls, as when your sires and their sires bled!

IN THE SLUMS.

By Alexander Blume.

The mingling of a thousand babbling tongues
Comes noisily upon the ear;
The coughing from a thousand bleeding lungs
Arises, chilling us with fear:
The wailing of wan babes, sickly and thin,
Gasping amid the sweltering heat,
The low and hissing voice of hideous sin,
The drunkard reeling down the street.

The harsh, shrill laughter of children at play,
And boisterous cries from revelers' dens:
The chill miasma of filth and decay
Arising from the human pens;
The slow and stealthy tread of brooding crime,
The moaning victims of murderous fight;
High over all the pall of dirt and slime—
God, what a scene—the slums at night!

Yet those who live and act those awful sights
Are human beings, pulsing life;
The image of their kind, who from the heights
Of opulence ignore this strife;
Filled with the hottest of fierce passion's fires,
They love and hate and live and die,
And, too, are subject to the same desires;
In joy they laugh; in paln they cry.

Thus from the very day when life began,
To toil and struggle has been their lot,
Crushed by the cruel, rapacious hand of man,
Here they are forced to stay and rot.
Far away from sunshine's joyous light
And nature's pure, sweet balm of health,
They live in realms of black, eternal night—
Their masters gorge and swill in wealth.

But slowly gathering within their veins
Is venom, born of aeons of hate;
In silence grim they bear their racking pains,
With muscles tense the hour they wait;
Comrades, rejoice, the hour draws daily near
Of blessed freedom, joy and light.
Well may the bloated slavers cower in fear,
As they view Labor's growing might.

A WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW was passed by the Legislature of Iowa. The world moves.

PRESIDENT MOYER of the Western Federation of Miners left last week for Carlsbad to attend the International Mining Congress. He expects to be gone two months.

PRESIDENT GOMPERS of the American Federation of Labor has been operated upon for mastoiditis. His friends entertain the strongest hopes for his complete recovery.

VICE PRESIDENT MAHONEY returned to headquarters last week and will probably remain at headquarters while President Moyer is in attendance at the International Mining Congress.

A LETTER from the secretary of Skidoo Miners' Union No. 211, W. F. M., of Skidoo, California, contains the information that the mill and cyanide works were destroyed by fire recently, and it is the opinion of the secretary that matters will be at a standstill for some time to come at Skidoo.

LET ME SAY to young men, this age is weary of the polite and weak camp-followers, weary of servility, weary of cringed necks and knees bent to corruption. This age is calling for soldiers, calling for strong characters, calling for men of high purpose, calling for men who have convictions of their own and who have the courage to act on them."—John P. Altgeld.

WHEN THE SENATE COMMITTEE shall conclude its investigation of conditions in West Virginia, the royal family should withdraw its objections to the Duke d'Abruzzi's passion.

In all of Italy there is not such a figure as Gassoway Davis, while Sicily may be searched in vain for as murderous a crew as the "Christian gentlemen that God in His infinite wisdom has placed in possession of the coal fields" of West Virginia.

They are the real thing—no effete descendants are they of thieving cut-throats. They are, as the first Bonaparte said of himself, their own ancestors—and their own thieves.—Milwaukee Leader.

THE FEDERAL GRAND JURY, sitting at Charleston, West Virginia, has brought a sweeping indictment against John P. White, president of the United Mine Workers of America, and other national and district officials of the organization. The indictments are brought under the Sherman anti-trust law and the officials of the United Mine Workers are charged with entering into a combination in restraint of trade. These indictments are looked upon as a retaliation against the miners who have been able to bring about a congressional investigation of the lawlessness that has prevailed in the strike zone.

The mine operators used every influence to prevent the passage of the Kern resolution in the United States Senate, and when they failed to crush the Kern resolution it seems that a federal grand jury has been used to bring in indictments to be used as a club against the miners.

THE NATIONAL CROATIAN SOCIETY, which held its last convention at Kansas City, Kansas, adopted the following:

"Members disabled while intoxicated, fighting or acting as strikebreakers shall be barred from receiving any damages whatever."

The National Croatian Society pays its members an insurance of $800 at death, and if any member is disabled or injured, he receives a certain sum of money, graduated according to the seriousness of the injury. The member likewise receives sick benefits, but the man who becomes injured or ill through drunkenness or who becomes disabled through following the dishonorable occupation of a strikebreaker, forfeits all rights to benefits.

This resolution was introduced by Anton Lessich of the Western Federation of Miners, and members of the National Croatian Society must govern themselves accordingly.

WILLIAM E. TRAUTMANN, ex-secretary of the I. W. W., has again gone to bat and lined out a five-column "open letter" at Big Bill Haywood, charging that the latter was informed of the corruption and autocratic methods of the present secretary-treasurer, Vincent St. John, and his gang of "free speech" fighters. Trautman declares that when he presented evidence to Haywood showing how St. John was manipulating affairs, Haywood exclaimed that it was "bad business" and intimating that he would stop the abuses. But nothing has been done, nor is it likely that an I. W. W. convention can rescue the organization from the crowd now in control, for, Trautmann points out, "at the last convention of the I. W. W. two delegates, one of them a paid officer, admitted as delegate contrary to constitutional provisions, had about two-thirds of the voting power of the whole convention, and the other twenty-eight or twenty-nine delegates controlled the balance of one-third; all contrary to the constitutional enactments of 1907.'' Delegates opposed to ring rule were unseated, and the two individuals in question had the power to dictate who would go on the ballot for election as officers. That is fine democracy, indeed, and Trautmann says that the I. W. W. is about done for.—Cleveland Citizen.

THE POLL TAX is direct action of the capitalist class on the ballot box; disfranchises Southern workers by hundreds of thousands. As Gripenuts Post says: ''There's a reason.'' Just look it up, please.—The Rebel.

There is certainly a reason for the poll tax. The class that rules knows that the working class, as a general rule, is limited in financial resources, and the class of economic power knows that poll tax is a barrier to the impoverished workingman casting his ballot. The frenzied maniac who exclaims, ''Hit the ballot box with an axe!'' lacks a sufficient amount of brains to realize the potency of the ballot.

Regardless of the fact that the class of privilege is doing everything within its power to make it more difficult for labor to exercise the right of suffrage, yet a so-called proletaire element is continually shouting that the ballot is but a ''paper wad'' and is worthless in the battle for industrial liberty.

''There's a reason.''

C. H. TANNER, Organizer for the Western Federation of Miners and who has had charge of the strike at El Paso, Texas, has sent us a paper issued by the C. T. Ludwig Detective Training Correspondence School of Kansas City, Missouri, containing the portraits of nearly a score of detectives who have graduated in the institution that equips sleuths who hunger for blood-money. The paper contains not only the portraits of the gumshoe graduates but likewise letters paying glowing tributes to C. T. Ludwig, whose school prepares moral perverts for their dirty work. One of these graduates secured a job at El Paso—but his cleverness, secured under the supervision of Ludwig, did not enable him to escape detection. He was uncovered in his dirty work and El Paso knows him no more.

Schools that have been established for the training of detectives shows that there is a demand for that class of vermin. They crawl into the labor organizations and are present at every conflict between employer and employé, to furnish or manufacture testimony against the class that is waging a battle against industrial slavery.

THE ANTHRACITE COAL MINERS, as a result of a decision recently made by United States Commissioner of Labor Charles P. Neill, as umpire on deadlocked questions submitted to him by the anthracite conciliation board, will receive nearly $500,000 back pay. The miners have won a victory in three or four cases submitted to the umpire. The principal decision in which the men are awarded the back pay sustains the position of the mine workers that they were entitled to the seven per cent. bonus under the sliding scale of March, 1912, the last month the old sliding scale was in operation. Under the new agreement entered into between the coal companies and the miners the sliding scale was abolished on April 1st last year.—Exchange.

The miners have won a decision which will give them back pay to the amount of $500,000.

Let us suppose that the miners of the anthracite regions had no organization how much back pay would they have received as individuals?

The laboring man who stands outside of the labor movement and expects to receive any consideration from his boss, has unfurnished apartments in his mental garret, and if he has any friends they should place him in an institution where imbeciles are cared for.

THOMAS GAFFNEY, a member of the Legislature from Nome, Alaska, was given a farewell banquet before his departure from Juneau. Mr. Gaffney was recognized as one of the ablest men in the Territorial Legislature of Alaska and his attitude on labor measures proved him an unflinching champion of the rights of the working class.

Gaffney was formerly a member of Butte Miners' Union and was a charter member of the Miners' Union at Nome, Alaska.

The Alaska Daily Empire paid the following editorial tribute to Hon. Thomas Gaffney on his departure for his home:

''The departure of Representative Thomas Gaffney for his home at Nome takes away from the capital the last of the non-resident members of the first Alaska Legislature that made the early spring months of 1913 notable ones in the affairs of our great territory, and removes from our city a sturdy, courageous character that we have all learned to admire and like. Mr. Gaffney is a man of strong convictions, an active, conscience and a capable mind that has been trained by an experienced life among the working classes of the West. While he was recognized in the Legislature as the special friend of the workingman, his viewpoint was, generally speaking, broad, and his genial disposition and gentlemanly conduct gained friends for him among those of all classes. He returns to his Nome constituency with the knowledge that he has fought a good fight and kept the faith. The Empire predicts that the people of Alaska will hear more from Mr. Gaffney as the years pass on.''

WILLIAM WOOD of the woolen trust, who was charged with being the principal actor in the conspiracy of planting dynamite in the Lawrence strike, has been acquitted. Wood is a multimillionaire, and it is seldom that men with corpulent bank accounts are called upon to wear the garb of a convict, even though the crime committed is a felony.

It was established beyond any reasonable doubt that the hirelings who planted this dynamite were paid from the coffers of the Woolen trust, with the cognizance of Wood.

But the attorneys of Wood placed the blame on Pittman, the pal of Wood, and as Pittman committed suicide when his infamy was uncovered, it was perfectly safe to lay the crime at the door of a man whose lips were sealed in death.

During the trial, and after, charges were made that jurors were approached with bribes, and we are told through the press that a grand jury will immediately investigate such charges.

Wood is acquitted and the investigation of a grand jury will be but a farce. The power of money has prevailed in the trial of Wood, and the results of that trial will impress more strongly on the minds of the great mass of the people that it is almost impossible to fasten crime on the malefactor whose wealth gives him social standing with a class of privilege.

FIERCE DENUNCIATIONS are being hurled about in labor circles in New York.

While the American Association for Labor Legislation, scores of trade unions, Socialist branches and sympathetic organizations were adopting resolutions condemning the Foley Workmen's compensation bill which was prepared by insurance companies and the Civic Federation and forced through the Legislature (but vetoed last week by Governor Sulzer) the Board of Business Agents rode to Albany in a special car stocked with cigars, refreshments, etc., to lobby for the Foley bill.

Now the unions are demanding to know who paid the bills, and knives are being sharpened to lift the scalps of some of the business agents who plugged for the bill without the knowledge or consent of their organizations. The Foley bill was a mess of pottage and designed to block the enactment of a real workmen's compensation law such as exists in Ohio, Oregon and other states.—Cleveland Citizen.

The membership of organized labor in New York should secure the name of every business agent who was lined up by the corporations to place a fake compensation bill on the statutes of New York, and the name of every Judas should be published in the labor and Socialist press of America, so that the rank and file may know the traitors who sell themselves for a ''mess of pottage.''

The so-called ''labor leader'' who commits treason to his class should be advertised, so that he may be shunned by every honorable man in the labor movement and receive the contempt and the scorn that are due to moral degenerates.

A LEADING NEW YORK BANKER made a speech in Detroit the other day in which—with that peculiar capitalistic philosophy that advises in one breath to save money and in the next to spend it in order to make business good—he declared that eighty per cent. of the men of the nation, after they reach the age of sixty-five, are dependent upon their children for sustenance.

Many of the rest, excepting the few retired rich men, are public paupers compelled to pass their declining days in poorhouses and various fraternal and charitable institutions.

This is a terrible indictment of our so-called civilization, where, after men spend a long lifetime in producing wealth for the ''richest country in the world,'' they are condemned to die as dependents and paupers!

What about the ''incentive'' that has been preached to the struggling, sweating, working class these many years by the smug bankers and other ''successful'' business men, who never produce a dollar's worth of wealth?

What about the happy homes in old age that are preached about by smooth tongued sermonizers who support the capitalistic system and abhor Socialism for fear that it may ''divide up'' the wealth so that a few won't have all?

It is a safe guess that the New York banker and his class will even oppose an old age pension law under which industry as a whole would be compelled to deal out a moiety of justice to the veterans of the industrial system that enriches them.

There would be no poor people in America today, as that term is understood, if justice were enforced in our political and economic institutions.

There would be no involuntary pauperism if the masses of the poor did not possess an accursed ignorant and superstitious reverence or fear for the privileged class.

Poverty and suffering will be abolished when the poor become brave and honest enough with themselves to abolish it.—Cleveland Citizen.

College Students to Be Trained for War

BY R. A. DAGUE.

THE FOLLOWING ANNOUNCEMENT was recently sent out by the Associated Press:

"Washington, D. C.—College men, under the latest scheme devised by the War Department, will be organized into a reserve corps of officers available for the command of volunteer troops in case of war. Secretary Garrison and Major General Leonard Wood, Chief of Staff, would establish two camps of instruction, one at Gettysburg, and the other at the Presidio at Monterey, Calif., where the students would be sent to be placed under direct instruction of regular army officers who will be detailed to the two posts.

"Under the plans, students volunteering for instruction and drawn from the Eastern and Southern Universities would be transported to Gettysburg, while those from other sections of the country would go to the Pacific coast. The plan has been carefully worked out and able-bodied students over seventeen years of age will be given opportunity to learn the duties of an officer in command of men."

Only a few weeks ago the announcement was made that "an Army League of the United States" had been organized, the object of which is to secure legislation authorizing the creating of an immense federal army, and now we are informed that college boys are to be given military training.

It is very evident that David Starr Jordan was correct in the statement he recently made that "a very great effort is being made the world over to fill the air with war talk."

I warn innocent college students and all boys against the efforts to inoculate them with the virus of war—of murder! Bright uniforms, glistening bayonets, waving flags, the glorious strains of music from the military bands, the gold lace and prancing steeds are inspiring—but these things are not war—no, no!

My pen is too feeble to tell you of the awful realities of war. I can only say that the soldier is expected to obey his officers. But now look: Over there, beyond the ravine, are thousands of other boys, not one of whom you have ever seen, or who has ever done you any harm. They are nearly all working boys.

Now you are ordered by an officer to rush at them like demons and to run your bayonets through their hearts to slash open their skulls with your sabres, and with the butt ends of your guns beat out their brains! The battle is on! Oh, God! What a spectacle! It is a sight to make angels weep. Now the cannons roar, the bullets hiss, the shells scream, riderless horses, mutilated and bleeding, gallop madly over the field; the yells and curses and groans of men rend the air. Here in one place, where a shell has exploded, are hundreds of boys. Many are headless; some have had their limbs torn off. Many are seen with internal organs protruding from mutilated bodies; blood and brains are bespattered on trees and rocks and ground. Everywhere are crawling, wriggling youths, crying, moaning, dying; with limbs shattered or shot away. Some have had their eyes shot out, while the faces of others were torn away. All are blood-bespattered and some have suddenly gone insane. Over there is a poor boy, one leg gone, part of his face shot away, totally blind. See; he is clutching the earth with his bloody stiffening fingers and he is crying, "Mother! mother! moth—" There, he is dead.

Now, why is all this fiendishness?

Who is responsible for this greatest of all curses that makes a literal hell in this world?

Is there any good reason why these kind-hearted farmer boys and college students should suddenly become such inhuman murderers—such veritable fiends?

No; there is no reason. They are deluded by kings and czars and greedy plutocrats who lust for more territory or larger markets or bigger profits, or who want to steal something from a neighboring nation. They are the stock-watering brand of Christian statesmen. They are the coal barons, the enslavers of children and other exploiters of working people who want boys trained as soldiers so that, when ordered, they will shoot to death other workers who strike for an increase of wages or to better their conditions.

There are also the professional warriors who love war for war's sake—men who enjoy the hell of carnage and death and whose highest ambition is to become Colonels and Generals. What do such men care for the simple-minded youths butchered on the bloody battlefield? What do they care for the tears of anguish of the mothers of those boys? Nothing. What care they for the awful waste of war? Every time a modern dreadnaught discharges a broadside it costs the people $20,000.

A poet truly says—

"Whether your shell hits the target or not,
Your cost is six hundred dollars a shot;
You thing of noise and flame and power,
We feed you a hundred barrels of flour
Each time you roar. Your flame is fed
With twenty thousand loaves of bread.
Silence! A million hungry men
Seek bread to fill their mouths again."

A magazine writer says that the official reports show that the cost of militarism in the United States for the fifteen months ending June 30, 1909, was greater than the total value of all the books, libraries, lands, grounds, buildings, furniture, scientific apparatus, machinery and all the endowments, all the investments and all productive funds of all kinds belonging to all our universities and higher institutions of learning. About seventy per cent. of the nation's aggregate income is being spent for past wars and the preparations for war.

Now, let me say to the man who proposes to go to my boy in college, to poison his mind by inoculating him with the war virus, that I look upon him as my implacable enemy. Rather would I that he lets loose upon me a mad dog or a venomous viper or makes a murderous assault upon my person. I would prefer that he stabs me in the heart or crushes my skull till the brains ooze out and I am dead, than to have him by deceptive sophistry, persuade my boy that it is a gallant, a glorious thing to be a professional soldier, and, at the command of some officer, go forth to assault, shoot, stab and kill other human beings and fill the earth with the lamentations of mothers, the cries of orphans and the hospitals and homes with cripples—fellow-mortals, too, against whom he has no grievance.

There is no necessity for the leading nations of the earth to expend seventy-two per cent. of the national income for war materials. The time has come for disarmament. The world has had the teachings of Jesus 2,000 years. This filling the air with war talk by the jingoes should be shut off. The politicians and heartless grafters who are trying to keep alive the war spirit should be sent into oblivion. The military men who are forming an "Army League of the United States" with a view to building up a great federal army, the college presidents and professors who are encouraging militarism among the students, the Y. M. C. A. officers and deluded if not hypocritical pastors of churches who are promoting the Baden-Powell Boy Scout movement—these must be met by peace-loving people and defeated in their adroitly-concocted schemes to plant the seeds of war and murder in the tender minds of the boys of America.

There are many problems of great interest before the statesmen and philanthropists of the world today pressing for solution. The most important of them all is: Shall we have peace or shall war with all its unspeakable, hellish, atrociousness, continue to curse the world?

Reader, what do you say? Are you for universal peace and a universal brotherhood, or do you want war, and carnage, and bloodshed, and to make this otherwise happy world a veritable hell?

Getting a Reputation

COLONEL ROOSEVELT has won his libel suit without the jury leaving the box. Legally he was pronounced one of the soberest men America ever produced. But it will not do him much good.

People may admit that he is of a gentle, shrinking nature; that he squeaks softly—nay, is as mild as a sucking dove; that he is as self-effacing as a policeman and as generous as a wolverine, but they will be firmly convinced that never was there a man, since old Silenus put Bacchus into business—much as a brewer now backs a saloon—and thus started mankind on the broad and twisting road—who could punish as much red liquor as he. It does not matter what was proved. It does not matter what was shown. Theodore has had added to the list of accomplishments in which he is supreme that of drinking too much.

He has mathematically demonstrated that he drinks surprisingly little, and has consumed in the course of his whole life as much as a member of the Old Guard puts away on the evening of the famous annual ball. So the evil reputation he has had thrust upon him in this respect really has a basis of actual accomplishment no greater than the reputation he has in some other matters. It is manifest that he has done for the distilling interests, in consuming potables, about as much as he has done for the working class in advocating legislation—and that is almost nothing. Yet in both ways he has a reputation of having done tremendous things. But such is fame.

His attempt to blot out this reputation has resulted in spreading the blot all over the page. Almost every paper has ridiculed and jeered at him. It was too good a chance to lose, and they have plastered the story all over. Probably there has never been an instance of a man who was more zestfully held up to popular scorn than he has been. If the whole incident had been taken at its worth Roosevelt's trip west to sue the editor who insinuated he is a souse would have received scant mention. But the papers gave him all the space he needed for denials and the more he has denied the more the general mind decides that not only is he the greatest of topers but the best at covering up. Some will excuse him on the ground that, like Alexander, he is a great soldier, only he has not had a chance to do much fighting, and so can live up to the Alexander level only in the other things. Others will excuse him on the ground that he is a literary man, and the list of devotees, from Anacreon to O. Henry, is a long one, with Fritz Reuter and Bobbie Burns well in the front ranks. Then he was assistant secretary of the navy and he is a great faunal naturalist. That eminent navigator, Father Noah, was, if the Bible says true, something of a faunal naturalist, and we further know what happened to Noah when he looked upon the wine.

There is something of the Greek in him, not of the swaggering German roysterer—for Roosevelt hates beer. There is as much myth surrounding him as there is any of the earlier heroes.

"Would a stronger life pulse o'er us
If a panther chariot bore us—
If we saw, enthroned before us,
Ride the leopard-footed god,
With a fir-cone tip the rod,
Whirl the Thyrsus round, and nod
To a drunken Maenad chorus?"

Not in the least. The strenuous life is as good as the stronger life, and the strenuous life is his invention. He has been a hero and a wanderer, and from his searchings far and wide he probably brought back greater good than Jason it was not the golden fleece, but the pelts of jungle beasts and the sale of the publishing rights of the story of his wanderings.

But the trial in Marquette shows the manner in which reputations are made. It is the old method, and Richard Brinsley Sheridan proved it in the year of grace 1777 in the following beautiful scene from "The School for Scandal":

> Mrs. Candour—Why, to be sure, a tale of scandal is as fatal to the credit of a prudent lady of her stamp as a fever generally to those of the strongest constitutions. But there is a sort of puny, sickly reputation that is always ailing, yet will outlive the robuster characters of a hundred prudes.
> Sir Benjamin Backbite—True, Madam, there are valetudinarians in reputation as well as constitution, who, being conscious of their weak part, avoid the least breath of air, and supply their want of stamina by care and circumspection.
>
> Mrs. Candour—Well, but this may be all a mistake. You know, Sir Benjamin, very trifling circumstances often give rise to the most injurious tales.
>
> Crab—That they do, I'll be sworn, ma'am. Did you ever hear how Miss Piper came to lose her lover and her character last summer at Tunbridge? Sir Benjamin, you remember it.
>
> Lady Sneerwell—How was it, pray?
> Crab—Why, one evening at Mrs. Ponto's assembly, the conversation happened to turn on the breeding of Nova Scotia sheep in this country. Says a young lady in company: "I have known instances of it, for Miss Letitia Piper, a first cousin of mine, had a Nova Scotia sheep that produced her twins." "What?" cries the Lady Dowager Dundizzy (who, as you know, is as deaf as a post) "has Miss Piper twins?" This mistake, as you may imagine, threw the whole company into a fit of laughter. However, 'twas the next morning everywhere reported, and in a few days believed by the whole town that Miss Letitia Piper had been brought to bed of a fine boy and girl, and in less than a week there were some people who could name the father and the farmhouse where the babies were put to nurse!

Sheridan understood scandal, and he was a statesman as well as a dramatist. But he was of that school of statesmen in which Fox figured so copiously, and sometimes the gutter knew him. And Roosevelt is a statesman, so even if he does not drink, he can be excused for having the reputation for drinking on the ground that he is of the Sheridan school.

Twelve little cocktails, all in a row, broke the reputation of Buttermilk Charlie Fairbanks, and most people believe today we are well rid of a dangerous man.

So it is in Roosevelt's case at the end of the libel suit.—N. Y. Call.

The Power of the Labor Movement

THE GOVERNMENT of West Virginia is not now so autocratic as a few months ago. The publicity given to the brutal conditions that prevailed in the coal fields awakened the toiling millions of this country to the fact that legal rights were dead in a mining district that was dominated by the coal barons.

The capitalist press smothered the real conditions as they existed and painted the strikers as anarchists and outlaws who thirsted for human blood.

The capitalist press, as usual, pictured an insurrection on the part of the strikers and justified the use of armed force to put down a rebellion.

But this falsehood heralded through the columns of the organs of privilege was soon dismissed as a fabrication to defend the lawlessness of hired thugs and the calling out of the state militia.

The labor and Socialist movement of the country was strong enough to send their representatives into the strike zone and uncover the false accusations and unsupported charges of mortgaged public officials who seemed to be owned and controlled by the corporate interests of West Virginia.

The labor and Socialist press of America pictured the brutal tragedies that were being enacted under the forms of "law and order" and so strong were the demands for an investigation that Congress could no longer ignore those demands that were backed by the united power of organized labor and the Socialist party.

The government of West Virginia that was prostituted to serve the interests of mine owners, pulled down its black flag of war upon strikers, and listened to the protests that were heard in the halls of national legislation against anarchy in broad-cloth, trampling under foot the most sacred rights of citizenship to make more formidable the reign of industrial despots.

The men and women of the working class who are standing outside the poles of the labor movement, should learn some lessons from the investigation that was forced upon congress through the United action of men and women, who are struggling for economic liberty. Without a labor movement in America, Congress would not have known of the outrages committed against the slaves of the coal mines, their wives and children. The man and woman who belongs to the working class should join hands with the movement that is slowly but surely forcing the national government to take notice of the wrongs perpetrated by the official chattels of a master class, for the sooner the laboring millions of this continent stand together as a solid body to resist the wrongs of soulless plutocracy, the sooner will economic slavery go down to its death and the sooner will there be ushered in a civilization, where man, woman and child shall be free.

Report of Debs, Germer and Berger on West Virginia

(National Office Press Service.)

June 6, 1913.

"Charleston, W. Va., May 26th, 1913.

"To the National Committee of the Socialist Party:

Comrades:

Pursuant to your instructions the undersigned committee, appointed by your body, proceeded to West Virginia to investigate the situation growing out of the strike in the mining regions of that state. Germer and Debs arrived at Charleston, the capital of the state, the local headquarters of the United Mine Workers, and in close proximity to the strike zone, on the evening of May 17th, and Berger on the evening of the 20th. The committee lost no time in getting in touch with the local comrades, including those in prison, and the striking miners. Every available source of reliable information was sought out and diligently examined. Scores of persons were interviewed and the stories of scores of strikers were heard.

"From the hour of our arrival we were 'spotted' by the henchmen of the mine owners. We could not leave our hotel without being shadowed. Friendly persons identified the detectives and warned us against them. At the same time rumors of all kinds were in circulation, the most persistent one being that we would soon be arrested and sent to prison.

"However, nothing came of this, and we continued our investigation for several days, deciding finally to seek an interview with Governor Hatfield. The second day after this request was made through the governor's private secretary word came that the governor was willing to meet Debs but not the rest of the committee. Debs at once refused to meet the governor unless he was willing to receive the entire committee. Berger and Germer, however, expressed themselves in favor of Debs calling on the governor as a possible means of opening the way for general hearing, it being understood that any action to be binding must first have the approval of the committee.

"Accompanied by Thomas Haggerty, leading official in charge of the United Mine Workers in West Virginia, Debs proceeded to the office of Governor Hatfield on the morning of the 22nd, and a detailed interview followed, the governor passing in review over his official acts relating to the trouble in the coal fields, beginning with his inauguration March 4th, 1913, and Debs pointing out wherein he believed him to be wrong, especially in having suppressed the Socialist papers and imprisoned their editors and employés.

"It should be noted that in the very beginning of the interview Debs frankly stated to the governor that he was there under protest; that inasmuch as the governor had declined to meet the entire committee Debs had declined to meet him and that it was only upon the express wish of his colleagues that he had consented to the interview.

"The governor disclaimed responsibility for certain acts with which he had been unjustly charged. He had not only not declared martial law but asserted that he was as much opposed to it as any one could possibly be. He had inherited martial law from Governor Glasscock, his predecessor, and the reason he permitted it to remain effective was because he was requested to do so by the union miners themselves to prevent them and their organizers from being assaulted and beaten up by the Baldwin-Feltz thugs in the employ of the mine owners. This statement of the governor was subsequently verified by all the officials and organizers of the United Mine Workers.

"To show that he was endeavoring to give the miners a square deal the governor pointed out that he had a mine superintendent and two mine guards in jail at that very hour and that he had refused to release them on bail offered by the operators. He also pointed out that when two organizers were beaten up a few days previously by the thugs of the mine owners he promptly offered a reward of $100 for their arrest and he emphatically declared that if apprehended they would be given the full limit of the law.

"The day previous to this interview the governor had unconditionally released all our comrades from prison, including John W. Brown, Fred Merrick, C. H. Boswell, W. H. Thompson, George S. Parsons and a number of others. Mother Jones had been set free some time previously. Shortly afterward Dan Shane, who had been sentenced to the penitentiary by the military commission, was given his liberty by the governor, so that not one of our comrades remained in custody.

"In this connection the governor referred to the fact that not in a single instance had he affirmed a conviction of the military commission and that while his affirmation would have sent a number of our comrades to the penitentiary he had, on the contrary, granted them their unconditional release. He further claimed that he had abundant evidence with which to convict some of the leading strikers in the civil courts, but that he had not felt disposed to press the cases against them.

"Interrogated upon the several points at issue in the coal strike Governor Hatfield pointed to the volume of statutes on his desk and said: 'There is my guide that is the law and I shall endeavor to impartially execute it.' The governor unhesitatingly declared that workingmen had the right to organize and that he would protect them in that right to the extent of his power, that Socialists had the same right that Republicans and Democrats have that they were entitled to the right of free speech and free assemblage and to the full protection of the law.

"As to the Socialist papers that had been suppressed the governor seemed to realize the gravity of his injustice when he said these papers could resume publication any time they wished to do so.

"This is brief was the substance of the first interview, in the course of which Debs asked the governer to meet the entire committee which he readily agreed to do.

"On the same afternoon the entire committee met the governor in his office by appointment. The ground was again covered in detail and the same statements by the governor were repeated to the committee. The governor informed us that we were at liberty to go anywhere we pleased in the pursuit of our mission, and assured us that he was not opposed to the impending senatorial investigation.

"We have no desire to exculpate Governor Hatfield for any act he is justly responsible for but it is undoubtedly true that he has been accused of wrongs which were committed under the administration of Governor Glasscock, his predecessor, to whose official spinelessness and subserviency to the mine owners are mainly due the outrages which so long disgraced West Virginia in the eyes of the nation.

It was under the administration of Glasscock and not Hatfield that martial law was declared; that the military commission was created; that Mother Jones, John Brown, C. H. Boswell and numerous others were court martialed and convicted; and it was also under the Glasscock administration that an armored train, in the name of law and order, shot up the cabins and tents of the miners, dealing out death and destruction under cover of darkness, an outrage so infamous that it will remain forever as a foul and indelible blot upon the state in which it was perpetrated.

"Governor Hatfield's administration is not free from censure, but the terrible conditions which prevailed when he came into office should be taken into account when his acts are considered. Beset upon every side with hostile elements and in the center of fiercely contending factions, it would have been a miracle if he had escaped without bitter condemnation. The one act of his administration which stands out as utterly without warrant and subject to the severest censure is the suppression of the two Socialist papers, the Star and the Argus, both outside the martial law zone, and the imprisonment of their editors and attaches. For this arbitrary and despotic act there is no warrant in justice or under the law, and it becomes especially odious and reprehensible when it is considered that the office of the Star was demolished, its forms, ready to go to press, battered up, and its property destroyed and scattered in all directions, and, as if this had not been sufficiently outrageous, the home of the editor, Thompson, after he had been seized and removed, entered, searched and burglarized, to which an ill and terrified wife was compelled to bear witness, after the hour of midnight and under the protest of the sheriff and local authorities. This dastardly crime cannot be too severely condemned and complete financial reimbursement would be the very least reparation that could possibly be made.

"In this connection it is but just to say that the governor and his friends disavow knowledge of these outrages beyond the suppression of the papers and the arrest of the editors, declaring that the other wanton acts above referred to were wholly unauthorized.

"It should also be said that the governor and his friends positively disavow the threat alleged to have been made by Governor Hatfield, and for which he has been so bitterly denounced, that he would deport from the state all miners who refused to accept the terms of settlement with the operators and resume work in the coal fields. It is emphatically denied that any such threat was ever made.

"Beginning with the 24th inst. we visited the Cabin Creek, Paint Creek and New River districts, in the order mentioned, attended in the first two by Mr. Moore, the governor's assistant private secretary, whose services he tendered and which the committee accepted. The governor on behalf of the state also tendered the use of a special train to the committee which was respectfully declined.

"At the Cabin Creek and Paint Creek districts, accompanied over the entire route by numerous miners familiar with the situation, the committee made a house to house and tent to tent canvass, hearing the stories of men, women and children and witnessing scenes of horror and desolation which beggar description.

"The reports of the outrages perpetrated upon the defenseless miners and their families during the Glasscock administration have not in the least been exaggerated. Houses and tents were shot up indiscriminately from an armored train in the darkness of night; men were assaulted and women insulted by the dastardly mine thugs and even little children were not spared.

"As all these atrocious crimes against the striking miners and their families will be brought out fully in the senatorial investigation now under way and placed before the country for its edification as to the despotic misrule of the criminal mine barons, we refrain from the attempt to chronicle them in this report. Indeed we could scarcely begin to do justice to the subject without making this report far too voluminous for the limited space in our press and for general circulation.

"A distinct victory has been achieved in forcing this investigation upon the mine barons of West Virginia in spite of their combined efforts to defeat it. Henceforward there will be a decided change in the situation. The investigation will bring the facts to light and every effort should be made on the part of the miners and their friends to have the whole of these facts in all their grewsome details brought out and placed upon record.

By act of the Legislature recently adjourned the mine guard system, which was one of the prime causes of the trouble and a source of unceasing brutality and terror to the miners, was practically abolished, and for the first time in the history of industrial West Virginia the miners and other workers can now organize unions and hold labor meetings free from the interference of the private thugs and sluggers of the mine owners, whom Governor Hatfield is pledged to do all in his official power to entirely suppress.

"The great trouble with West Virginia, as Governor Hatfield explained, is that hundreds of thousands of acres of coal lands are owned by great corporations, aliens for the most part, such as Guggenheim for instance, who care nothing about the miners, and nothing about West Virginia, beyond their own heartless exploitation. Vast areas, including entire mountains and valleys, are their own private preserves, patrolled by their own private guards, and it is in these privately-owned sections where the power of the corporations is absolute and where in fact the feudalism of the middle-ages still prevails, where the most cruel conditions have existed and the most outrageous crimes have been committed.

"It is with both pride and pleasure that we bear testimony to the uniformly brave spirit and high character of the comrades who have been on the firing line in the West Virginia struggle. They have fought one of the bravest and bloodiest fights in the industrial history of this country. Against overwhelming odds and with spies and sluggers dogging their footsteps they held their own to the very end.

"At the close of our labors we rejoiced to see the better understanding that existed between the United Mine Workers and the Socialist party which we sought in every way to encourage and promote, and, barring a very few who are bent upon arraying them against each other to their mutual undoing, we left the comrades in the best of spirits and with the assurance upon every hand, freely given, especially among the striking miners, that our visit had resulted in immeasurable good and that they would now take hold with renewed vigor and enthusiasm and push the work of organization, economic and political, in all the coal fields and throughout the state.

The New River district, which has heretofore been impregnably fortified against unionism, is now open, and Comrade Rogers, who was the intrepid leader there during the most critical period, came down to inform us before leaving that the movement was now spreading rapidly and that in the near future that entire region would be solidly organized.

Of course a few were disappointed because our mission was not a failure and because everything we demanded was conceded. These few, backed by the papers of the mine owners, did everything possible to discredit us, but without avail. Deliberate falsehood was resorted to when all else failed and the report was sent out that we had endorsed Governor Hatfield that we had exonerated his administration; that we had approved his attitude and his acts; that we had been led into a trap by him, etc., etc ., etc., the wish in each instance being father to the thought.

"The truth is that we did our duty and acted openly and honestly with everyone, Governor Hatfield not excepted. We freely admit having given the governor the credit he is justly entitled to for what he has done to protect the miners and punish their assailants, and while holding him responsible for every act of his administration, we insist that he shall not be held accountable for the crimes committed under the administration of his servile predecessor.

"Insidious influences have been and still are at work to create open rupture between the Miners' Union and the Socialist party and to prevent such a calamity, especially at such a critical hour, we bent our united energies, and to this fact is due the false and misleading charges that have been put in circulation by the papers controlled by the mine owners and their allies in the labor movement. Great would have been the rejoicing among the coal barons and their henchmen if instead of seeking to heal the breach and creating harmony we had encouraged dissnesion and factional disruption instead of co-operation and good-will had followed.

"There are still difficulties to be met but for the first time the way is now open for organization and we repeat the hope so earnestly expressed before leaving the scene of investigation, that the mine workers and the Socialists now cease all bickering as betwen themselves and enter upon a state-wide campaign of education and organization to the end that in the near future the workers of West Virginia might take front rank among the most thoroughly organized states in the union.

"In closing it should be said that we did not incur the unnecessary expense of going to Washington, seeing that every point we contended for had been conceded and every duty for which we had been commissioned fulfilled.

"The committee was a unit in all its actions and all its conclusions and now respectfully submits this report with the recommendation that measures be taken to have the party represented by competent counsel at the forthcoming investigation. Fraternally,

"VICTOR L. BERGER,
"ADOLPH GERMER,

The Price of Copper

THE CONTINUED unsettlement of the financial market has affected sentiment to such an extent that small holders of copper have been forcing their metal on the market regardless of price, and it is reasonable to assume that if there had been more disposition to buy on part of either speculators or consumers, concessions in prices would have been even greater than those which were made up to now. However, the trade at large is thoroughly scared off both here and in Europe and buying is entirely confined to a hand-to-mouth basis. While current consumption leaves nothing to be desired, there is a well defined apprehension that the decline in the prices of securities is foreshadowing a general trade reaction. The close is weak at 15⅜@15⅝c. for Lake copper, and 15@15.10c. for electrolytic copper in cakes, wirebars and ingots. Casting copper is quoted at 14.90@15c. as an average for the week.

The standard market has been under pressure throughout the week, and quotations are still considerably below the parity of refined sorts. The market closes practically at the lowest, the quotations being cabled at £66 15s. for spot, and £66 12s. 6d. for three months.

Base price of copper sheets is now 21@22c. per lb. Full extras are charged and higher prices for small quantities. Copper wire is 16¼@16¾c. per lb., carload lots at mill.

Copper exports from New York for the week were 4,732 long tons. Our special correspondent gives the exports from Baltimore at 1,797 tons for the week.

Visible stocks of copper in Europe on May 31, are reported as follows: Great Britain, 20,520; France, 3380; Rotterdam, 4,800; Hamburg, 3,820; Bremen, 1,960; total 34,480 long tons, or 77,235,200 lb. This is a decrease of 3,180 tons from the May 15 report. In addition to the stocks given 1,700 tons are reported afloat from Chile and 4,000 from Australia, making a total of 40,180 tons.—Engineering and Mining Journal, June 7th.

No Longer Immune from Censure

JUDGE R. WANNAMAKER of the Supreme Court of Ohio delivered an address recently before the Literary Society of Sandusky, and his address gave spasms to that element in society that is continually demanding that our courts shall be respected.

Judge Wannamaker, in speaking of our courts, wore no padded gloves, but struck from the shoulder with bare knuckles.

The following are some of the statements that he made relative to the short-comings of the judiciary:

"It is high time that we shall have a dissolution that will dissolve and a penalty that will punish, both suited to the situation and the public welfare.

"Too much delay. A case should be conducted through all the courts within one year.

"Too much expense. The costs eat up the larger part of the judgment.

"Too long trials.

"Too many cases tried that ought to be settled. A judge's primary duty is not to try cases, but to administer justice.

"Too long vacations. No active business man or workingman takes half the vacation of the judges, and not one of the judges, when he was in the active practice of the law, thought of taking, at his own expense, one-half of the vacation he now takes.

"Too many trials and appeals, to the disadvantage of the poor and the advantage of the rich.

"Too much medieval-day law and too little modern-day justice.

"Too much judge-made law and judge-made constitutions, defying and defeating the public will.

"Too little eagerness and efficiency in dealing with crimes and crookedness in high places.

"There is just one way to get rid of the muck-rakers, and that is to get rid of the muck-makers; for, so long as the muck is made, the first principles of sanitation require that the muck shall be properly raked and put in its proper place in the garbage field.

"The fullest publicity as to courts will do for them what a like publicity has done for corporations. Both need purging, and a fair and impartial publicity will be a useful tool."

Judge Wannamaker in his address shows that he entertains none of that hoary reverence for the courts that is demanded by a class of privilege that has made the judiciary a fortress behind which "predatory wealth" has sought protection.

The average lawyer, when resolved into a judge, usually becomes a czar, and as a general rule, places property rights above human rights.

The majority of judges mingle with the exploiting class and see things through the same glasses as that upper strata of society, whose sustenance is wrested from the sweat and slavery of ill paid toil.

The decisions of courts for the past several years have awakened the observing and thinking men and women of labor to a realization of the fact, that judges in point of honor, are as frail as the average citizen, and that these men, clothed in the ermine of the judiciary, sometimes stray away from the straight and narrow path to render a service in recognition of the debt of gratitude which they feel that they owe to the influences that made it possible for them to reach the goal of their ambition.

The courts are no longer immune from censure and criticism, and the time has passed when a judge on the bench can command respect, unless his acts and conduct will bear the closest scrutiny of honest investigation.

The Wreck of a State

"THE UNITED STATES shall guarantee to every State in this union a Republican form of government," says Article IV. of the National Constitution. Yet in Kanawha county, W. Va., where a strike of coal miners has been in progress for more than a year, there is a military zone established by order of the Governor where constitutions and laws have been suspended, where a satrap's will is supreme and where American citizens are as completely stripped of civil rights as the most God-forsaken of Siberian exiles.

Under this despotism, men women and children have been arrested without warrant, denied trial by jury, condemned to imprisonment by military commission and in some cases sent to the penitentiary. The civil courts and civil officers have been ignored. The writ of habeas corpus has been suspended. Free speech has been denied. Arbitrary arrests have been made outside of the zone and summary punishments inflicted upon those thus tyrannically abducted.

Two Governors, Glasscock and Hatfield, are chargeable with Executive responsibility for these conditions, but more profoundly involved in the wrong and shame is the State Supreme Court. In two judgments (Nance and Mays, and Paulson, Batley, Boswell and Mary Jones) which in tone and temper recall the Bloody Assizes, this tribunal has falsified facts and falsified law openly, defiantly, arbitrarily. The names of the judges who subscribed to these decrees, which will be better know some time than they are today, are L. Judson Williams, George Poffenbarger, Charles W. Lynch and Henry Miller. To his everlasting honor, Judge Ira E. Robinson vigirously dissented in both cases. All are Republicans.

The falsehood upon which the West Virginia judicial usurpation rests is that war exists in Kanawha county that Kanawha county is "enemy country;" that it resembles conquered territory; that it is belligerent territory; that the Governor alone is empowered to determine the necessity for martial law, and not by implication and assumption, if not by divine right, in spite of constitutional mandates to the contrary, he is justified in asserting sovereign and practically unlimited authority.

To support this falsehood the court laboriously argues away the Bill of Rights, waives aside trial by jury, sneers at the great writ of habeas corpus, and by various frivolous citations, such as to proceedings for contempt and police-court practice, undertakes to show that constitutional guarantees, after all are not to be regarded too seriously.

In a state of war it is held by the court that the powers of the Governor must be at least as great as those of the private citizen, who, if threatened, shoots, and shoots to kill. In a state of war, slaughter is justifiable if the peril is imminent or the objects sought to be attained are important. In a state of war there is what may be called an unwritten law. In a state of war the Supreme Court of West Virginia in effect commends us to lynch law.

The truth is, however, that there has been no war in Kanawha county. There has been no foreign invasion. There has been no organized resistance to the sovereignty and dignity of West Virginia. Such disorder as has appeared has been personal and industrial. The war has been fighting between man and man. The carnage at worst has been murder, and in most cases it has been assault and battery or disorderly conduct. The territory placed under this terrorism is not conquered, is not belligerent, is not menaced by a foreign foe and is not "enemy country." It is a part of what once was free America. It is inhabited by those who once were free Americans, most of them peaceable.

Every authority but one quoted in defense of this tyranny by the West Virginia court refers to actual war, to districts occupied by hostile armies, to regions battle-stricken in which the courts were no longer open, to territories invaded or conquered by armed hosts. The one exception is that of the State of Colorado against the Western Federation of Miners, and the record even here has been distorted in its presentation. What Colorado did in that emergency was to sustain the civil authorities by force of arms. What West Virginia has done is to suppress and supplant the civil authorities by force of arms.

In the labored opinions by which this court assumes to set aside human rights and restore absolutism there is an amazing array of quotations from the tyranny and bigotry of the ages. We have citations from many Tories, from the days of Elizabeth down. We have a criticism of the United States Supreme Court for its "fallacies." We have long extracts from the deliverances of Judge-Advocate-General sitting in drumhead courts in time of actual war. We have attempts to stretch even the vicious authorities that are approvingly set forth. We have not a word to show one of the most impressive facts in the history of English-speaking peoples, which is that there is not now and never has been legally such a thing as martial law in regions where the courts were open and the civil powers active.

The Constitution of West Virginia says that it applies "in war and in peace," and that "any departure therefrom under the plea of necessity tends to anarchy and despotism;" that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended; that trial by a jury is inviolable; that the military must be subordinate to the civil power; that the courts of the State must be open to all, and that "justice shall be administered without sale, denial or delay." Falsifying the facts as to the situation in Kanawha county, the Supreme Court of West Virginia by its decrees has violated every one of the fundamentals of liberty and civilization. In comparison with such an offense the disorders and assaults of the striking miners, deplorable as they may be, sink into mere brawls and batteries.

Extensive powers have been conferred upon the committee of the United States Senate appointed to inquire whether West Virginia has a Republican form of government, but it should concentrate its energies upon the strange aggregation of reactionaries constituting the majority of that State's highest court. Where have they received their instruction? What absolutism is it that they serve? What wretched province in Russia or Persia or Asiatic Turkey have they in mind as a pattern? To what unconscionable rescripts of Alexander, Caesar or Bonaparte do they adhere?

The issue raised by this tribunal does not bear alone upon the people of Kanawha county or the people of West Virginia. It concerns every inhabitant of the United States. If a Republican form of government may be wrecked in one State it may be wrecked in forty-eight States. We do not hold our liberties subject to the caprice of a Governor or a court. The rights that we possess are not limited by considerations of "safety" which involve despotism or by pleas of "necessity" which are cloaks only for the dragonade. In moving to assert the sovereignty of the National Constitution against the menace of misguided men in a single commonwealth, the Senate is nobly defending the life of the Republic itself.—New York World.

The above editorial in the New York World is couched in vigorous language and shows that even a great capitalist daily journal with its hundreds of thousands of readers is reluctant to support the lawless administration of official authority in West Virginia.

The World, however, in its editorial, intimates that in Colorado, that force of arms was used to uphold civil authority. The World is in error, for the military power of Colorado was hired out to a Mine Owners' Association in order that civil authority might be defied. Civil authority was ignored in Colorado in the same manner as in West Virginia, for even the officers of the State Militia exclaimed: "To h——ll with the constitution."

The writ of habeas corpus was suspended in Colorado and human rights were trampled under foot to subserve the interests of mine operators, who sneered at law and laughed at constitutional rights.

Capitalism in Colorado was as brutal as in West Virginia, and no man in the mining districts at that time was safe from assault, who even expressed sympathy for the striking miners.

Men were bull-pennied and deported and miners demanding the protection of the law, were met with the blow of the armed thug and the bayonets of our boys in blue, whom a Governor turned over to the mine operators to establish a reign of terror. Colorado, Idaho and West Virginia are a trinity of states where capital ungloved its hand and ruled with the iron fist.

YOU'RE DOIN' WELL, CONSIDERIN' THE SHAPE YOU'RE IN.

By Henry M. Tichenor, the Rip-Saw Poet.

You must not change your ordained lot—a sinner from your birth—the Lord's anointed took the pot before you struck the earth. Be thankful for the dollar a day on which you drink and dine—you're really making ten, they say—the boss rakes in the nine. Or else be thankful that they let you rent a little patch, and that your wife and babies get a third of what you scratch. Of course, you look allfired forlorn—it's natural you must—that is the way that you were born, a worm, made out of dust. Your crawlin' in a vale of tears—that's what the parsons tell—you'll crawl here for a few short years, and then crawl on to hell. Beelzebub has got your soul, the plunderbund your skin—you're doin' well, upon the whole, considerin' the shape you're in.

MY DOG'S GONE.

By Berton Braley.

"What d'ye mean, you lost your dog?" That's what they ask in a flippant way—but it means that my heart is like a log, and I mope and worry the whole long day; it means that my eyes are sort of dim and my life, somehow, has jumped a cog. He was only a mutt—but I'm fond of him, that's what I mean, "I lost my dog."

He was always hanging about the place, ready to follow me where I went, with a look of love in his funny face, and his brown ears cocked in a way intent, it was second nature to have him near, to have him close at my heels to jog, and without him the world seems lone—and queer, that's what I mean I lost my dog.

So if you have seen my homely pet I wish you would tell me where he may be, for I pine and murmer and chafe and fret for my silent comrade to come to me; a dog just cuddles down in your heart, and you wander about in a dreary fog when he's lost or gone—and the tear drops start, that's what I mean I lost my dog!

THE MILITIA OF CHRIST.

By Carl D. Thompson.

In response to inquiries sent to the information department of the Socialist party we have applied to the national headquarters of the organization known as the Militia of Christ and secured the following information. The Rev. Peter E. Dietz, executive secretary of the organization, sends us a copy of the constitution and charter laws of the organization, from which we take the following:

"The Militia of Christ was formed by a band of ardent Catholic trade union leaders. A temporary organization was effected in the course of the American Federation of Labor convention at Toronto in 1909. The organization was perfected and made permanent at St. Louis on November 21, 1910. The purpose is personal service in the cause of Christ on earth in the face of non-Catholic endeavors toward the subversion of the Christian structure of society.

"The Militia of Christ is a religious, patriotic and unionist fraternity; it advocates a live policy of social reclamation and expension on the basis of religion, democracy and unionism; it champions, co-ordinates and unifies the legitimate interests of all classes of society as against the teachings of class hatred and the attempts to degrade religion to the insignificant proportions of a mere private matter. It regards the Christian family as the basis of the Christian state, and the Catholic church as the mistress and arbiter of civilization."

Membership: Executive membership is limited to practical Catholics.

Associate and honorary membership is open to Catholics as well as non-Catholics.

National Headquarters: The legal domicile of the Militia of Christ is 503 Murray avenue, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Executive secretary, Father Peter E. Dietz.

Officers for 1912: President, J. McArdle, Pittsburg, Pa., president Amalgamated Association of Ironworkers; vice president, John S Whalen, Rochester, New York. Among the directors are John Mitchell, New York; James O'Connell, Washington, D. C.; Dennis A. Hayes, Philadelphia, Pa.; John R. Alpine, Chicago; David A. Carey, Toronto; Roady Kenehan, Denver, Colo.

Official lecturer and organizer, Peter W. Collins. Subjects of lectures as officially announced: "Social Problems and Social Reform"; "Why Socialism is Opposed to Religion"; "Why Socialism is Opposed to the Labor Movement"; "Why Socialism is Opposed to Marriage and the Family"; "The Ideals and Philosophy of Labor"; "The Workers in Industry and Their Protection."

FRAGMENTS—THE COMMONPLACE.

By W. E. G.

After all the greatest thing in the world is just to be a man among men.

As atom jostles atom and cell clings to cell, so everything in this universe finds its birth, growth and development through the small and commonplace.

'Tis a far fling from the mite of dust that troubles your eye to the suns of Orion that course their paths of immeasurable distances, yet there is an intimate relation.

Without the speck of dust, there could be no worlds to complete and balance suns.

To take measure of the coming man, go to the commonplace of his home and work, the people he lives with, his neighbors, the children, the conductor with whom he rides to his daily tasks, his baker, his grocer and those he serves and who serve him in the mutual service for bread; they know him for what he really is.

The greatest thing in the world is to be a man among men.

The heroic and sublime lie bidden in all men, and stress of circumstances may bring them forth into expression.

But to meet without malice or thought of gain and with pleasant, helpful mien our fellows in the daily commonplace requires courage.

Without the exaltation of the commonplace there can be no real democracy.

In the mesh of this commonplace of life we will find men and women. real heroes who measure of the coming brotherhood, and the progress of its coming will be measured by the conduct of this daily commonplace.

To be a man among men is to be a master, a master of the little things of the commonplace.

Be careful lest ye be weighed in the commonplace and found wanting!

REPORT OF GUY E. MILLER.

Calumet, Mich., June 10, 1913.

Editor Miners' Magazine:

Last Sunday was a red letter day in the history of Calumet Miners' Union. More than 3,000 men were in the line of march starting at the Palestra in Laurium, traversing the principal streets of Laurium and Calumet, ending at the City hall in Red Jacket. It is not stretching the truth to say that the population of the place was either in the parade or witnessing it. No such throng has ever before invaded the city—to lift the banner of hope for the toiler and to sound a note of warning for the spoiler.

Two banners in the line of march caused much comment, upon one were the words: "The Calumet and Hecla has paid $121,050,000, the Quincy Mining Company $20,000,000, in dividends. Why should we starve?" The other was decorated with a picture of a machine. Above it were the words, "The one man machine." Beneath it, "our agitator." It was not a misnomer, for there is but little question that the attempt to introduce the one man machine did more to arouse the miners of this district to their helplessness standing alone and the necessity of organization than any other single factor.

Nearly if not quite 2,000 paid twenty-five cents admission to the theater where addresses on unionism were delivered in English, Italian, Finnish, Crotian and Hungarian. The enthusiasm monifested by the audience showed that the demonstration of numbers had sunk home, patient workers saw the results of their efforts and those who want to be on the big side saw that it was time for them to switch.

The success is the more remarkable when the obstacles in the way are considered. When it was decided to hold the demonstration the committee sought to secure Tamarack park, the management were glad to grant it, a day or too later they sorrowfully announced that they would be compelled to refuse the park. The committee then turned to the Laurium driving park. There, too, the management was glad to show their friendliness to the men who put the copper country on the map, but their joy was short-lived. The czar of the northern peninsula sent forth his edict. To disobey it would have meant ruin. The driving park was closed to us. Arrangements were made with the Mineral Range railroad to furnish a special train—we were given one day's notice that they could not secure cars. The street car company promised that they would supply plenty of cars, but they stopped for two hours when men would have been on their way. Hundreds walked from the locations four or five miles away to take their place in the line of march; some arrived too late, and some faces that looked on the marchers showed that they would have been glad to prove their manhood—if they had known so many others would. It is not yourself alone that is freed when you stand erect. It is your weaker brother as well. In addition to these difficulties the foremen made their usual efforts to get Sunday workers, but without success. The street car company opened the park a week ahead of schedule and charged no fare. Ordinarily the fare is 10 cents. Baseball games were free; also two picnics.

The moral of this story is that no one con hold you down if you are determined to get up. All are encouraged and are determined to continue until the copper country is organized, a living wage and decent conditions obtained.

Fraternally yours, GUY E. MILLER.

INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION.

A so-called industrial organization of workers, known as the I. W. W., led by discarded trade unionists, is now busily engaged attacking legitimate trade unions throughout the country in a dastardly attempt to disrupt the trade-union movement.

The Chicago I. W. W. and the Detroit I. W. W. both claim the right to operate under this title and mislead the wage workers of the country. Both bands are tarred with the same stick and should be exposed in order that they be shown up in their true light.

Wherever this body bas had an opportunity to operate they left a very bad stench after them, for their system would hardly bear a close examination. At Lawrence, Paterson and Akron they had a golden opportunity to display their true value, with the result that their leaders fell in bad repute, and the innocent strikers forced to break their ranks.

It is of the Akron rubber workers' strike which I desire to comment upon, being on the ground and in a position to observe the disgraceful methods used by the gang who run the I. W. W.

About 15,000 men and women put up a great fight, only to be outwitted and sold out by such leaders as Bill Haywood & Co.

The local leader, H. E. Pollack, turned traitor at the critical moment, and accepted a position with one of the struck concerns, leaving the strikers in a deplorable condition. It was proven that he was in the employ of a detective agency before he came on to Akron.

Since the settlement of the strike he is following the work of spying on his former associates and keeping in close touch with the I. W. W. headquarters in Akron. Pollack was indicted by the Federal Grand Jury and brought to Cleveland from Canton April 23, 1913, charged with fraudulent use of the mails in operating a detective agency.

According to Assistant United States Attorney Cary Alburn, Pollack formed the Sproud Detective Agency in Akron, Ohio. It is charged that he and others advertised for agents in Ohio and adjacent states.

After persons had signified their intention of affiliating themselves with the detective agency, it is alleged Pollack wrote telling them to pay $5 to join —a great record for the head of the Akron I. W. W.

The I. W. W. group sent out circular letters to trade unions all over the country asking for financial aid to assist the workers in their strike and from this source they collected a large amount of money, for the unions were misled, thinking that they were contributing to a legitimate organization.

The treasurer selected by the I. W. W. was an unknown to the local men, but known to the group of leaders, and the outcome was that he suddenly left town and the funds went with him.

Many others who were on the local executive committee were known to be reporting to a half dozen other detective agencies.

These are true facts and it can readily be seen that the innocent strikers who bad no conception of what their so-called leaders were doing, were in reality being handled indirectly by their employers.

The strikers were very enthusiastic for a few weeks, marching daily and shouting "One Big Union!" "I. W. W. Forever!" etc. Now the cry is "Never Again," for the "One Big Union" was so big that they did not know the men who were supposed to be leading the fight in their interests.

This I. W. W. crowd had a free rein with no interference from the other trade organizations of the city of Akron. This was done purposely to give them every opportunity to demonstrate whether or not they could make good their threats to put the rubber companies out of business if they did not materially increase the wage rate of the men and women who were forced to strike.

The American Federation of Labor rounded up only such men and women who absolutely refused to join this radical bunch of leeches known as the I. W. W.

There is now a legitimate organization of rubber workers formed in Akron, connected with the American Federation of Labor.

In conclusion I hope that the trade unions of the country will refrain from giving any moral or financial aid to this band of traitors who, upon the least pretense, flood the country with appeals for aid. With best wishes.

Fraternally yours, WILLIAM A. CUNLIFFE.

A PAPER FOR SOCIALISTS.

The Appeal is primarily an agitation paper. Its mission is to carry the message of Socialism to the American people. But how to educate and inform the avowed Socialists, the members of the Socialist party and the Appeal army, has always been a problem.

The Appeal having the facilities as well as considerable experience, has decided to issue a monthly paper devoted to the Socialist party and the Appeal Army. This paper will only cost 25 cents a year and no subscriptions for a less period will be accepted. No reduction for clubs or combinations will be allowed. This new paper will be edited by the rank and file. The paper will contain no editorial expressions. All kinds of views and ideas on party matters and propaganda work by the readers will be printed. There will be only one rule: The shortest communications will have the right of way.

This paper will also publish the latest news in the Socialist and labor movement, here and abroad. It will, in a word, be the organ of the avowed Socialists to serve their interests as they themselves determine.

It will be called the National Socialist. The paper of that name which was published in Washington has suspended publication. However, all the subscribers of that paper will have their subscriptions filled by the new paper.

The first issue of the new National Socialist will be dated July, but will reach all subscribers not later than June 28th. Send your subscription at once to the National Socialist, Girard, Kan.

FRAGMENTS—A CITY'S STREET.

I hear the shuffle of a thousand feet that hurry along the nightless way of a city's street.

I hear the common cry for that which satisfies.

I hear the mighty roar of the chaos of trade, where profit steals from profit. where rent is drunk on rent.

I see in the upturned faces of the crowd, the blotched and leathery; the seamed and lined.

I see revenge and hate, in a losing struggle with self and men, eyes that peer and leer and gleam, from cavernous depths, as of some monster seeking prey.

I see those who have given many wounds and those who have received them.

I see the truth in every effort of the individual man; here hammering out his destiny; there building with thoughts or with his hands; there working through a fine ideal; yonder wearing a crown of thorns; many losing themselves for a time in search of pelf and place; others finding themselves in service; many weary of the struggle with self.

I see all heights, all depths, all joy, all pain and love and hate and heaven and hell.

I see in this commonplace crowd the universal man emerging; in him all creeds, all races, blending.

I see every man traveling towards the same goal of harmony; struggling through the commonplace of life, unconsciously working toward brotherhood.

THE WORK OF THE INTERCOLLEGIATE SOCIALIST SOCIETY.

That even conservative Yale is awakening to the tremendous import of the Socialist movement is evidenced by the closing meeting at that university in May, at which Dean Brown of the Yale Divinity school debated against George Willis Cooke, a well known publicist and Socialist, on "Resolved, That Socialism provides for moral values in life."

"A mass of humanity was closed in the large hall," ran the report, "sitting on the floor in the three halls, occupying all the space on the windows, standing far out in the hall at the center door and beyond in the campus, anxiously trying to catch a word through the open side doors. There were twice as many as the hall could hold and hundreds were turned away. Professors and students, doctors and lawyers were occupying the floor, for every inch of space was valuable. The debates were listened to throughout with rapt attention and afforded an intellectual treat to those present."

Socialism is now one of the most discussed subjects on the campus. This meeting followed one at which Victor L. Berger, the first Socialist congressman, spoke before a record-breaking crowd. "We remember the time, not so very long ago," appears in an editorial in the New Haven Union, "when the doctrine of Socialism was looked upon in New Haven, and even at Yale, as something akin to anarchy, as the propaganda of a lot of crazy fanatics who had a desire to take all the money in the world and divide it up equally, or something like that. Fortunately this day of unenlightenment with regard to exactly what Socialism is is passed, not only in this community, but pretty generally the country over."

"We believe," continues the editorial, "that the Yale Society for the Study of Socialism (Chapter of the I. S. S.) is one of the biggest thought-stimulating influences which has made itself felt in Yale for years. May it live long and prosper."

Alexander L. Trachtenberg, a graduate student, and formerly a student at the universities in Russia, has been largely responsible for the success of the Yale chapter.

The Intercollegiate Socialist Society is continuing to increase its number of chapters and has just issued charters to groups of students at Denison University and the University of Cincinnati in Ohio. The second issue of the Intercollegiate Socialist has just appeared (10c a copy, 25c a year), and contains a number of valuable articles from the pens of Victor L. Berger, Algernon Lee, Florence Kelley, William English Walling, Carl D. Thompson, H. D. Sedgwick, Frederick F. Rockwell and others. The symposium on methods of socializing industry is one most worth while.

Harry W. Laidler, organizing secretary, has recently completed a tour among the New York colleges, including Cornell, Hobart, Syracuse, Rochester, Colgate, Hamilton and Union, and has noted a splendid interest in the Socialist movement in these institutions.

The name of Prof. Chas. P. Steinmetz, one of the most eminent engineers and inventors of the country, has recently appeared on the society's letterhead as an endorser of the society.

The Intercollegiate Socialist Society, whose headquarters is at 105 West Fortieth street, New York city, will be glad to receive the names of any who may be interested in its work.

SPIRITUALISTIC SOCIALIST REPLIES TO MATERIALISTIC CAPITALIST.

By R. A. Dague.

Mr. Editor: Will you allow me space in your paper in which to answer the enquiry of a friend? He writes me a letter from which make the following extracts:

> "Friend Dague: I am glad that in your physical affliction and advancing years that you are so happy and have such a lively belief that you shall live after death. I was raised in that belief myself but now I have come to believe that death ends all. I have no faith in the Church nor in Spiritualism and Nature offers no evidence that there is any conscious life after death. Yes, I believe we are worms of the dust, and that, like worms, when we die, we are dead, and that is the end of us. I would like to believe as you do but cannot,"

My Reply.

I am truly sorry for you, Friend R————. If you are right and "if everything is to wind up in a coffin, what's the use of beginning anything in the cradle?" But you are wrong in saying that Nature furnishes no evidence that there is life after death. Now, let me shock you a bit by saying that Nature offers not a scrap of proof that there is any real death (annihilation). You cannot extinguish a single atom or electron. Nature proves that what we call death is a change only—is birth to another zone or sphere. There can be no birth without death (so-called). Without the two, birth and death, there would be universal stagnation. We can kill nothing. If we smash the body the life or spirit goes on working in a higher realm of vibration and the body distintegrates into its component parts, but each live atom gets busy again and goes to forming new associations. We can wreck the body, which is composed of matter, but we can destroy neither spirit nor matter. We can only compel the inhabitant of the body to move out and our jostling only causes the atoms of matter to seek other associations. All the universe is alive from grain of sand to the blazing sun. All nature is throbbing with ceaseless energy. You may think a thing is dead, but nothing stays dead. You may knock things down, but they will get up again. Nature resents all idea of death, or stagnation. Even the solidest granite and steel are vibrating with life. Nature resurrects every apparent failure into success. If she destroys one plant or sun she makes others to take their place. The day always follows the night. If things ripen and die in the autumn, they appear again in the springtime. If we sleep with death for a night, we are more alive than ever the next morning. If we wound a tree with an axe, the tree sends an extra amount of sap to the injured gum and heals the wound.

If you cast a bowl of wet sand on a smooth surface it quickly adjusts itself into a shape of flowers and assumes symmetrical and beautiful forms. The frost on the window-glass gives proof of the existence of a natural law of art. The foulest ponds of stagnant water produce most beautiful flowers. The caterpillar has an offensive looking body with many feet, but out of him comes a butterfly with most gorgeous colorings. The eggs of birds are a shapeles protoplasm, but three weeks of warmth will transform that slimy substance into a glorious creature of beauty and song. The ant-lion has numerous legs, strong jaws, sharp teeth and eats smaller insects. Under the microscope he looks like a ferocious monster. After a time he wraps himself in a blanket which he weaves of silk and sand, and curls up and sleeps. Later he opens the door of his house and walks out. He now has four beautiful gauzy wings and is a mild-mannered insect and thereafter is a strict vegetarian and nice fellow. Whereas when an ant-lion he lived in a cave he now functions in the glorious air and sunshine.

My friend, let me theorize a little:

To me it seems that here we are living in caterpillar and lion-ant bodies. We are not yet fully hatched. May it not be that when we break out of this old worn body that we will live in a finer zone, now invisible, yet real? Electricity, air and all powerful things are invisible. Our real selves are not visible now; only our bodies can be seen.

I cannot think that Nature is pushing and pulling everything upward except man. No, no. Man has a glorious destiny. Nature, properly understood, tells us that God is infinite intelligence—is life—all life. The poet well says:

> "All are parts of one stupendous whole,
> Whose body Nature is and God the soul."

The rosebud has all the possibilities of the fully-developed rose. It will in due time unfold. Men are "God-buds" on the tree of infinite intelligence. They are gods in embryo. Sometime they will unfold. What a glorious destiny! How inspiring the thought! We could not exist without God; He, or it, could not be infinite without us. We are a part of God. We can no more die than can be. Now we are prattling infants in Nature's school. We are in the kindergarten department playing with blocks and baby things. Later we shall be promoted. Oh, my brother, you who think you are only a worm of the dust and shall never be anything greater—you who are struggling with poverty and sorrow—look up! Take courage! You were not created for extinction. You are here in a "worm body" for an infinitely wise purpose. There is nestling within that shell in which you live, an angel in embryo, possessing godlike powers and beauties not yet unfolded. You are a bud. Some time in the future you will fly through space with the velocity of light, step from star to star, associate with the wise sages of other worlds and of past ages and bask forever in the glory of celestial spheres. There is no death. All—all is life.

No, my brother, this world is not a vale of tears except as man has made it so. "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless millions mourn." Shall it always be so? No. Ignorant man invented defective systems of religion and economics, but they, like all other things, are subject to the law of evolution—of unfoldment. All error and injustice must be rung out and truth and justice be ushered in. The doctrine that "might makes right" and "to the victor belongs the spoils" is the law of the jungle, but will not govern in higher levels of humanity on which the law of equity, reciprocity and the golden rule prevails. Capitalism, slavery, the exploiting of the worker, must go.

Socialism, the ripened fruit, the fully unfolded flower of all human government and the perfected system of industriallism, must and will come.

And now, in conclusion, friend R————, let me repeat that the infinite universe is pulsating with life and there are no dead.

As the poet sings—

> There is no death—the stars go down
> To rise upon some fairer shore
> And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
> They shine for evermore.
> There is no death—the dust we tread
> Shall change beneath the summer showers
> To golden grain or mellow fruit,
> Or rainbow-tinted flowers.
>
> There is no death—an angel form
> Walks o'er the earth with silent tread
> He bears our best loved ones away
> And then we call them "dead."
> Born into that undying life,
> They leave us but to come again
> With joy we welcome them—the same
> Except in sin and pain.
> And ever near us the unseen
> Their dear, immortal spirits tread.
> For all this boundless Universe
> Is Life—there are no dead.

ORIGIN OF THE BOY SCOUT MOVEMENT.

John G. Wanhope, State Organizer of Washington.

There is no blacker page in English history than that which deals with the rise and development of machine production. The frightful degradation of child life in England during that period has left its impress on the present generation. Physically deformed and stunted in growth, many of the British working people bear mute witness to the unbridled greed of the pioneer plunderers of early British capitalism.

When the markets of the world were at her feet England was the workshop in capitalistic production; the primary reason for manufacturing was for profit, but the sphere of exploitation is narrowing and new markets for the disposal of the surplus must be found.

The Boers of South Africa, a peaceful, agricultural people, had the misfortune to locate over immense treasures of gold and diamonds, and the British capitalists made war on them to possess themselves of this wealth. The Boers, having great faith in God and a Mauser rifle, fertilized the South African veldt with the blood of Britain's best troops. Three times the British government was compelled to lower the physical standard to get enough soldiers to offer up their lives on the altar of the country whose ruling class had fed on their misery.

While the bombs were bursting over Mafeking, in the mint of the murderous mind of a trained man-killer called Colonel Baden-Powell, an idea was forming. The greasy, fetid atmosphere of an English factory town was not the best place to grow men whose bodies must be as near perfect as possible, to offer up as a sacrifice to the capitalists' God of profit. Why not take the boys while they are young and tender and train them in the manly art of murder; while their minds are pliable and plastic, easily moulded and formed, and the tide of young life beats high? It was a noble and inspiring idea, and was seized upon by every crowned head and cracked brain in Europe. The King of England gave it his sacred sanction, the Kaiser declared it a divine inspiration and Bloody Nick of Russia, the tenderest soul who ever murdered a patriot fighting for liberty, immediately ordered every boy in his vast domain to become a Scout.

On this side Teddy was dee-lighted, and the smug-faced hypocrites of Christian churchianity anointed it with the holy oil of John D. Rockefeller.

In the dim consciousness of millions of workers in America is the growing feeling that the militia are simply the hired tools and assassins of the masters. This truth has the tendency of cooling the divine fervor of patriotism which formerly prompted the young men to sweat red white and blue blood and die gloriously for the flag.

Enlistments fall off and every capitalist agency is used to have the parents of boys twelve years of age and over to join the Boy Scout movement. The Church, true to its historic rôle, always on the side of the tyrant and oppressor, is lending its aid. Preachers and other pliant tools of capitalism are busy debauching the minds of these youths under the guise of physical exercise, by taking them into the forest and field and teaching them woodcraft. But out of evil springs good sometimes; scouting and prowling around in the woods develops their sense of smell to a wonderful degree. After a few months' training it is asserted they can smell a jackrabbit a mile away, a possum ten miles away and a skunk a hundred miles, and the preacher of war is the skunk they smell in the distance.

So, this is the latest effort of murderous plutocrats to bring out and develop the wild beast in man nature, teach him to redden his hands in the blood of his own relatives and class for the masters' profit, and then have them washed clean in the blood of the Lamb.

It is the stern duty of every member of the working class to head off this foul conspiracy against the youth of this nation. The Socialist propagandists are reaching hundreds of thousands of people daily. Let us without fear or favor take our stand on the side of these children and prevent the wholesale debauching of their minds in the interest of the plutocratic parasites who have made of the world a shambles. Organize to put an end to wage-slavery and capitalism and establish industrial democracy so that the creators of wealth shall retain possession thereof and classes and class rule disappear and the brute truggle between man and man for bread is over.

A POLITICAL BOSS.

A young lady reporter on a country paper was sent out to interview leading citizens as to their politics.

"May I see the gentleman of the house?" she asked of a large woman who opened the door at one residence.

"No, you can't!" answered the woman, decisively.

"But I want to know what party he belongs to," pleaded the girl.

"Well, take a good look at me," she said, sternly. "I'm the party he belongs to."—Exchange.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS LETTER.

A Synopsis of Facts Relating to the World's Trade Union Movement—Issued by the International Secretariat of National Trade Union Centers.

A law has come into operation in the state of Texas which provides for an eight-hour day for all state and municipally employed workers, as well as those engaged either directly or indirectly on work being carried out by the state or municipality. The "Locomotive Drivers' and Stokers' Journal" is strongly advocating a closer co-operation between the different railway workers' organizations, in order that the playing off one group of workers against another by the various companies may be rendered impossible in the future.—The membership of the affiliated trades unions now exceeds 2,000,000. The exact number at the end of March was 2,007,650, according to the American Federation of Labor news letter.—In Memphis, Tennessee, half of the working population are negroes. They have not the right to enter any of the numerous public parks. The Building Workers Trades Council decided to urge the town authorities to provide a public park for the exclusive use of the negroes.—Seventy-five thousand seven hundred and fifty-one persons were engaged in the automobile trade in the year 1912.—The labor council of the city of Portland, Oregon, has decided to call a conference of delegates from the neighboring cities and states to discuss the prevention of the flooding of the western territory with emigrants upon the occasion of the opening of the Panama canal. A joint campaign on the part of the American and European organizations is urged for, in which the latter shall explain to all those who are desirous of going out to this country what awaits them there.—According to the official figures, 118,000 boys and girls under 16 years of age are employed in factories. Of this number 11,111 are engaged in knitting factories, 11,035 in the canning industry, 10,000 in the wool industry, 8,134 in the silk factories, and over 78,000 in other industries. According to all accounts these figures are too low. The mayor of Boston intends to raise the minimum wage of all workers employed by the town to $15 per week, as he maintains it is impossible for them to live decently on a lesser sum.—A number of employers got an injunction against the Woodworkers' Union in New York, preventing them from calling strikes against the use of building material produced by non-union men or non-union labor.—The manufacturers in Manila have requested the government to have children taught cigarmaking in the national schools.

The bitter struggle between the butchers and the employers in New Zealand has resulted in the formation of a new yellow organization. After it had been once refused them, they have gained admittance to the wages board, so that the wages and conditions are laid down by a board consisting of employers and yellow workers.

The Danish Trade Union Congress.

The Congress of the Danish Trade Unions took place on the 23rd, 24th, 25th and 26th of April. Four hundred delegates were present, as well as representatives of the trade unions of Norway, Sweden and Germany. According to the report which was read by the chairman, Madsen, the three past years were characterized by great results scored by the Danish trade unions. The employers have, it is true, followed their old lockout tactics, which has had the effect of causing a certain amount of discord where a few members were concerned. As a result of this a cross current of syndicalism has sprung into existence. This question was not overlooked by the congress. The report of a committee appointed for the purpose of investigating the necessity of reorganizing the national center was heard next. The congress decided with a great majority not to change the basis, and to maintain the old and centralized strike funds. Only a few isolated votes were recorded in favor of the abolition of the compulsory subscription towards the support of strikers. The syndicalistic proposals were rejected by practically the whole congress. The congress concurred in a motion adopted by the social democratic party, according to which the syndicalists are debarred from associating themselves with the party. The congress furthermore decided to, as hitherto, stand for a collective bargaining, and to improve benefit features in the union. The congress gave the following matters their further consideration: Insurance against unemployment, penalties, education of workers, the co-operative movement, and certain other matters of business. The congress decided to grant a permanent allowance to the widow of the secretary of the National Center, who died during the congress.

The Norwegian Court of Arbitration Laws.

The proposals drafted by the Norwegian government concerning compulsory courts of arbitration, and about which we have already spoken, have now been published in full. According to these laws a conciliation board shall be appointed to settle differences between employers and men, apart from the court of arbitration, in the case of conflicts which threaten public safety. No strike may take place on account of differences until the contended questions have been dealt with by a public conciliation board. The country shall be divided into five districts, each of which shall have its own conciliation officer. The officials will endeavor to bring about a conciliation when occasion demands, but if it be so desired, the conciliation board may consist of two officials and two private individuals. The conciliation board shall be appointed by the government from a list of members proposed by the employers' national center, and the trade union national center. The tenure of office shall be three years. The proposal also deals with differences of a legal nature concerning the interpretation to be placed upon the tariff agreements, or awards given by the conciliation boards. The trade union organizations and the employers' organizations are forbidden to answer any differences encountered in the execution of these awards or tariff agreements, by a cessation of work. All differences shall be laid before a new labor court in Christiania, whose decision shall be final, unless the parties concerned agree to submit their case to a private arbitration body. The labor court, the chairman of which must be a member of the higher courts, shall consist of five members by the government, who may not, however, belong to the executive of either a trade union organization or employers' organization, or be in the service of such an organization. The employers' central and the trade union center have the right to propose names from which the members of the aforesaid boards shall be selected. A great movement has now begun to protest against the action of the government, which will so fetter the future movements of the workers. Meetings, full to overflowing, have been held in all parts, to the end that a petition has been signed by 60,000 persons, and presented to parliament. Answers have, up to the present been received from Denmark, Finland, Germany and Sweden, in reply to a query sent to all the national centers. None of these countries are in favor of proposals for a compulsory court of arbitration.

Trade Unions and the Churches in the United States.

For many years past clergymen have attended the American labor congresses as representatives of the various church bodies. Every year finds the Rev. Charles Stelzle, who is very well known in trade union circles, directing his energies with burning zeal totwards the co-operation of the trade unions and the church. Those churches which come under his control have gone so far as to draw up special labor programs containing the most important demands of the organizations. These demands often constitute the subject of his Sunday sermon, especially on "Labor Sunday," the custom of which is growing very rapidly, owing to the executive of the federated unions of labor having given their consent to same. On these days all churches in the land are expected to deal with questions which concern labor exclusively. In many cases the pulpit is occupied by some well known labor leader or other. Some time ago Stelzle, the writer of numerous articles for the labor press, advocated the admittance of delegates of church bodies to the central bodies of the trade unions, in order to bring about the co-operation of the two. This plan was immediately agreed to by the different ecclesiastical bodies and the federation of the trade unions recommended its adoption. A seat has been allotted to one member of the local ecclesiastical body on the various central bodies of the trade unions in almost 100 towns up to now. These representatives have full rights of speech, but are not, however, allowed to vote. Socialistic delegates, among others, are opposing this plan, and a number of disputes have already arisen out of this question among the various councils.

The Austrian State Employes.

There is no country in the world more overrun with officials than Austria. The population has increased by 66 per cent during the past eighty-five years, but the number of officials has increased by 660 per cent, not including the railway servants. There is now one official to every fifty population, making altogether a gigantic army of nearly 500,000 state employes. According to the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the year 1912, there were 66,700 state officials, teachers and judges, whose total income amounted to 263,974,000 kronen (25 kronen equal £1). The number of watchmen coming under the control of the military amounted to 43,246, with a salary of 49,652,000 kronen. The subordinate officials and servants numbered 28,668, and their total wages amounted to 49,830,000 kronen. There were 59,159 persons working by special agreement for the state, and whose salary amounted to 66,660,000 kronen, also 64,000 permanent workers with a total wage of 52,000,000 kronen. The railway servants number 175,591, and their total wage or salary is 277,993,000 kronen. According to these figures the grand total of Austrian state employes for the year 1911 was 427,564, whose total income amounted to 763,049,000 kronen (£30,521,960). During the last year several of the different grades have established very strong and influential organizations, which have, by means of sound trade union methods, effected an improvement in their conditions; much to the chagrin of the government. After many attempts the government has at last succeeded in squeezing through a bill in the form of a service regulation, whereby the right of combination among the state employes is as good as revoked, and passive resistance and the general strike methods are rendered impossible. The state employes are forbidden from combining in any such manner as is calculated to disturb or curtail the public service in general. It remains to be seen whether the tremendous discontent which prevails among the state employes will not prove the government's attack to be futile.

International Statistics.

According to the report of the British section of the International Association for Legislation (labor legislation), an international conference will take place next September for the purpose of bringing about a uniform system of statistics of factory inspectors. At present the provisions made in the various countries for the protection of the workers are so widely different that such satisfactory comparisons as are necessary to the general interest are impossible.

The Postoffice as a Fruit Merchant.

An interesting experiment is now being made by the New South Wales government for the purpose of inaugurating a cheaper and better fruit service, in the interests of the health of the populace as well as in the interests of the fruit growers. Those requiring fruit can buy a coupon at any post-office to the value of the fruit desired, inclusive of carriage. The fruit growers' addresses and prices are posted up in the postoffice. The railway charges are reckoned at 6d for every fifty pounds, irrespective of distance. The sea freight is reckoned at one-seventh of a penny per pound, with an extra charge of one-twenty-eighth of a penny per pound for trans-shipment. The middlemen have naturally raised a great outcry against this new arrangement, which has, however, met with the marked approval of the remainder of the populace during the few weeks of its existence.

The Position of the Waiters in Moscow.

The only waiters' organization in Russia is in Moscow, and takes the form of a mutual benefit society. The Moscow waiters formerly had a trade union organization, but same was closed by the authorities. As it is no longer possible to establish an organization of the nature of a trade union, the waiters were compelled to content themselves with a mutual benefit society. The permission to form this society was only obtained as a result of untiring efforts. The society now numbers 2,000 members, who are generally drawn from the tea-shops and the second and third-class restaurants. The aim of this society is to have the waiters brought under the shop laws, it being hoped that an improvement in their condition might thereupon ensue. A law is to be shortly introduced into the Russian parliament for the regulation of the working time of the shop assistants, and the waiters' union has appointed a delegation to wait upon the members of the upper house, urging them to pass the bill. The union is making praiseworthy efforts to improve the moral and physical standard of those engaged as waiters, etc. The conditions in this calling are most lamentable, as the workers have to put up with being addressed in the most familiar manner. The primitiveness of the form of speech used in addressing the waiters, i. e., "thee" and "thou," etc., is acutely felt by those workers in the large towns. Still it must be suffered in the smartest restaurants as well as in the most simple eating houses. In the best establishments the waiters must be clean shaven, and in some places must even shave their heads. Tips form the only source of income. A guarantee deposit of £2-15-0—£10-10 is demanded upon a waiter being engaged, and no receipt is given for same. This deposit is, in most cases, not given back when the waiter leaves, but the landlord or proprietor makes the man a present of 25s. to 35s. The waiter is answerable for broken china, etc., and unpaid bills. Bribery also exists. Head waiters and managers must also be bribed by the waiters or the latter find themselves told off to guests known to be "unprofitable," or to merely assist the head waiter serve, whilst he pockets the tip. Sweating is practiced here in all its forms, it being desired that the waiters shall order their clothes of a particular tailor. Money is collected in order to make the landlord or proprietor a present on Christmas day and all such holidays. Upon stock being taken of the china, etc., the waiters are sometimes called upon to pay 20s., 40s., or 60s. for damage, losses, etc. The waiters have numerous duties to perform, including cleaning, washing the staircases, and such work. They must board themselves at their own expense. No opportunities for rest exist. Child labor is very much in evidence. The higher the class of work to which the restaurant belongs, the lower the moral standard of the working conditions.

The Necessity of International Co-operation

The journal of the American granite cutters, the "get-up" of which is well worth studying, gives a startling proof of the absolute necessity of international combination and co-operation of the workers' organizations. An order was shortly placed with a firm in Toronto, which refuses, by the way, to have anything to do with trade unions, for the erection of a mausoleum. There were twenty-eight Corinthian pillars, with their respective bases to be cut. As no competent cutters could be found among the non-union men, the firm sent the granite to Scotland to be worked up there in a union shop. The granite was returned to Toronto in the shape of Corinthian pillars, where the remaining part of the work was done by non-union labor. In spite of the heavy freight charges, the Scotch firm was able to do the work cheaper than the American firms, employing union men. There should be some means of preventing this kind of thing. The close co-operation which exists between the trade unions of the Europeon countries renders such an occurrence almost impossible. It must, however, be said that the English and American trade unions up to within a few years ago did not put much faith in such co-operation or attach much importance to same, fearing at times that it would lead to an increase in the number of emigrants from other countries. Since the American labor federation became affiliated with the International Secretariat matters have certainly improved and it is to be hoped that the various trade unions in England and America will affiliate with their respective international secretariats. It would then be possible to put a very strong check upon the employers' repeated attempts to play off one country against another.

May Celebrations in South Africa.

The South African trade unions held a number of demonstrations on Good Friday in favor of the recognition of the first Monday in May as a legal labor holiday. Resolutions were passed in favor of the taxing of land property, the eight-hour day, women's suffrage, extension of state and municipal ownership, prohibition of the import of colored labor, and the encouragement of the employment of white workers.

Pension laws for mothers are already in force in nine of the American states, while fourteen other states are considering a similar law, under which mothers who have children depending upon them will be granted a monthly pension. The legislature for the state of Missouri, for instance, is discussing a bill which provides pensions for mothers whose husbands are either already dead, unable to work or inmates of a state institution, asylum, prison, etc., if such mothers have to support children out of their earnings. Divorced women shall also receive pensions if the children are legally given into their keeping. The bill proposes that mothers with children dependent upon them be granted $10 per month for the first child and $5 per month for every additional child. Similar laws are in force in Illinois, Wisconsin, Colorado, California, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Oklahoma, Michigan and Utah.

Labor Problems in Oregon.

The state of Oregon, which lies in the northwest of the United States, has recently been the scene of a referendum, taken in connection with a considerable number of questions, a certain portion of which might be of special interest elsewhere. One law, which was carried by 66,508 votes to 48,078, stipulated that all workers paid either directly or indirectly out of public funds, should have an eight-hour day. A law forbidding picketing, boycotting and the coercion of blacklegs, was defeated by 66,560 votes to 49,826. The law according to which meetings in the public streets, parks and such places should be made subject to the written permission of the mayor in all towns with a population of over 5,000, was likewise defeated by 62,532 votes to 48,978.

Municipalities.

The town of Charlottenburg stands out above all German towns as being the richest in public institutions of all descriptions, of which a very important one is the board of health. The monies spent by this department amounted to 4s. 1p. per head of population in the year 1900, 7s. 3p. in the year 1905, and 8s. 6p. in the year 1910. The total expenditure in 1900 was £40,000, in 1910 it was £130,000, which amount also included the sums necessary for the care of the sick, babies in arms, consumptives, the health of the school children, disinfection, street cleaning, draining, baths and public lavatories.

Labor Struggles in Russia.

On April 17th, the memorial day of the frightful massacres which took place in the gold washings on the River Lena in East Siberia, workers in St. Petersburg and part of those in Moscow came out on strike. Numerous one-day strikes also took place in the provinces. It will be remembered that a crowd of many thousands of peaceful citizens were fired upon in the previous year, on this day, when 250 workers were killed and 150 injured; thus the strike, which was proceeding quite peacefully, did not gain its object, because of the slaughter which took place. The workers were, one after another, sent back to Russia by the gold mining companies, and other workers put on in their places. The dismissed men have taken action for damages, but same have not yet been settled. The company is still negotiating with the workers. The social democratic party in the douma introduced a bill for the granting of state pensions to those families which were rendered fatherless by the massacre, as well as those workers who were rendered invalid through the same.

Disconcerting Results of the Independent Christian Organization.

On February 20th the "free," "Christian" and Hirsch-Dunckersche textile workers' unions decided unanimously upon a strike of the dyers at Krefeld, because the employers would not agree to a reduction in the working time and would only allow the smallest possible increase in wages in the new tariff agreement (it was a four-years' one). The working time is still sixty hours per week. The employers answered the workers with a lockout on March 15th, and 12,000 persons were involved in same. This number increased afterwards; 2,652 dyers took part in the strike, of which number 2,300 belong to the free textile workers' union. Contrary to the general wish, the "Christian" organizations negotiated with the employers and the strike ended on April 3rd. The free textile workers' union decided, by 1,755 votes to 7, in favor of a continuation of the strike. After the Christian organization had effected a part settlement the lockout terminated.

The Textile Workers' Journal in its last number stated that the assertion of the "Christian" organization that "they had obtained far-reaching concessions" is false. The struggle among the textile workers proves, as did the miners' conflict at the beginning of the preceding year in the Saar district, that the Christian organization had not the intention of acting in the interests of the workers, but had other objects in view. The miners in Upper Silesia came out on strike on April 15th. War was proclaimed by the Polish affiliated unions, after petitions for better conditions had been made in vain. The Miners' Union (free union) decided that its members should leave work with the others, although they had not been invited to take part in the preparations; 4,000 miners were involved in the strike. The Catholic organizations, which exercise a certain amount of influence in these parts, did everything in their power to supply the employers with strike-breakers. The strike has since been declared off by the Polish union, for want of funds.

An Australian Strike.

The gas workers in Sydney, New South Wales, have been struggling for an increase of wages from 8s. to 9s. per day for more than one year. This has been absolutely necessary on account of the continually rising rents and cost of food. The chairman of the wages board rejected all the propositions of the workers, so that they were absolutely defenseless. The labor government at length offered them a revision of the wages board regulations, but the workers refused to accept same. Upon the strike beginning, on February 28th, the government publicly called upon the people to render personal assistance at the gas works in order to keep same going. After the lapse of one week an agreement was entered into which provided for an increase in wages for the workers. Victimization is now prohibited. The prime minister of the labor government has sealed his own fate in his party through his attitude towards the gas workers. This man has only been partially trusted by his party for some time past.

(IS). A law has come into operation in the state of New York, giving the towns self administration on a much broader scale. According to this law the town may decide upon all matters which are not of a purely national character, whereas they have hitherto been obliged to obtain the consent of the governors. The police, dock department, health department, etc., will now be under the control of the municipal administration, which will also be empowered to issue bonds for public buildings, etc., and to generally manage its own property. The town of Boston is the first in the United States to inaugurate a system for the relief of the aged workers employed by the town. According to this system a worker who is sixty years of age and who has been in the service of the city twenty-five years, shall, at his request and with the approval of the retirement board, be retired from service and shall receive an annual pension equal to one-half of his average wages during his last year of service. All men to retire at the age of seventy.

Trade Union Agitation in the Russian Mercantile Marine.

(IS). The French system of "registered seamen," under which system no men are taken on unless they have a special certificate, does not exist in Russia, says the "Tribuna Russe" in an interesting article under the above title. The employment offices are entirely in the hands of the master shippers or private agents. The seamen have repeatedly tried to fight this system, but without success. In the years 1905 and 1906, when the burden of autocracy was somewhat lighter than is usually the case, the men created their first trade union, on the Black Sea. The organization conducted a strike lasting six weeks, with great results. After that time men were taken on and dismissed only at the instigation, or with the approval of, the union. The seamen's papers were issued at the union offices, and the union generally attained such influence that it was invited to send delegates to a royal commission which was appointed to consider a bill concerning "marine boards." In connection with their organized fellow workers on the Baltic, the Caspian and the White Seas, the representatives of the men of the Black Sea submitted a proposal according to which the organization and control of the "marine boards" should be based upon the principles of the trade union. A period of persecution on the part of the government set in, however, towards the end of the year. The leaders of the organization were incarcerated in prison and the organization itself put down in the most brutal manner. Soon, however, secret organizations sprung up in the place of the old organization, the first being among the seamen of the Caspian Sea in 1910. Of the 8,000 seamen only 200 belonged to these organizations, contributing altogether about 300 francs per month. Following the defeat of the seamen of the Black Sea in August, 1911, a secret organization was established. The greater part of the work of this organization was done abroad, and in January, 1912, their first paper was published, which was eagerly read on all ships. The agitation spread to the other seas so that over 100 crews soon belonged to this secret and illegal union. The seamen did not join the organization one by one, but whole crews at a time. The subscriptions which were paid into the funds of the trade journal amounted to two per cent. of the wages. In the year 1912, ninety-eight crews contributed altogether 10,000 francs. Of this sum thirty-six per cent. was required to defray management expenses, twenty per cent. for the labor paper and the remainder for removals, support, etc. The deputies to the Duma were allowed 260 francs for their expenses. There are, abroad, in Antwerp, for instance, so-called neutral organizations of Russian, Lithouanian and Esthonian Seamen. These unions have decided that the before-mentioned paper shall be their official trade journal. This journal is now 24 pages thick and is published under the subtitle "The official organ of the Russian Watermen and Seamen."

Sweden. (IS). According to the report concerning the trade union movement of 1912, the organizations are slowly recovering from the effects of the strike of 1909. An increase in membership is reported in most organizations which, in the case of those organizations affiliated to the national center amounts to, in the aggregate, 5,550. In the present year the determined efforts on the part of many organizations is producing satisfactory results.

Brief Labor Notes From All Countries.

Great Britain. (IS). The Miners' Congress in South Wales has instructed its executive to communicate with all great organizations with a view to bringing about a more united action and mutual support where important matters are concerned. The 1,262 affiliated co-operative societies have been circularized respecting the minimum wages clause and it transpires that the minimum wage is being paid by 272 societies, i. e. 24/- for male workers and 17/- for female workers. Sixty-nine societies pay the minimum wage of 24/- to their men only but recognize no minimum for the women workers. Two hundred and eighty-one societies refuse to recognize this minimum, whilst from 640 societies no reply has been received. The International Transport Workers Congress which was to have taken place in London in June next, has been postponed till August 26-30. The strike in the factories belonging to the Co-operative Wholesale Society has ended in a victory for the workers. The last one of the dismissed workgirls, whose reinstatement the management had opposed, was taken on again, with the result that work was resumed by the strikers. The Scotch Trade Union Congress, which lately took place in Dumfries, was attended by 150 delegates representing 300,000 members of Scottish trade unions. The congress dealt with all matters of moment, including questions of social legislation and also the special wants of the Scottish workers. About 50,000 miners in South Wales refused to resume work after the first of May, in order to compel the non-union miners to join the union. Very good results were obtained. In nearly all cases the non-union men joined the union and the strike thereupon ended. Upon the invitation of the London Trades Council the executive of the Berlin Trades Union spent several days in London and stopped at Brussels on their way back. The object of the journey was to bring about a closer relationship and a better understanding between the workers of these larger cities. It is reported that the London Trade Council will return the visit.

Norway. (IS). The national center of the Norwegian trade unions and the employers' union have decided to appoint a joint committee for the purpose of drafting a bill outlining the course of arbitration proceedings for industrial disputes. Such a measure has already been carried through in Denmark. A petition has been sent to the Norwegian Parliament asking that the discussion over the government bill on the same subject be postponed till the work of the committee of the employers and workers is ready.

Sweden. (IS). The social democratic propositions for an investigation in respect to the legal minimum wage has been rejected by the Swedish Parliament. The same fate also overtook the proposition for an eight-hour working day.

Turkey. (IS). The secretary of the trade unions in Constantinouple reports that the recently-inaugurated labor movement has suffered tremendously through the war and its consequences. The work of the few organizations which still exist is very much handicapped in consequence of the exceptional state of affairs. Quite a number of factories for women's ready-made clothing have been closed because all means of communication between Constantinople and Rumelia (the country where the products of these mills are disposed of) have been cut off. Five hundred workers are thrown out of work in consequence of this. Three hundred and fifty workers in cigarette paper factories were locked out because they would not agree to a reduction in wages. Many private employés have suffered likewise. Two hundred and thirty brewery workers have been locked out for the last three months. Bookbinders, carpenters and men of other trades are almost all without work. The prices of all necessities of life have risen rapidly and the rent has almost doubled itself. Bread has reached an exorbitant price and meat has become almost a luxury. Under such circumstances it is certainly not easy to push on with the labor movement, but the organization which has had to endure the war and all its accompanying terrors will soon emerge into new life and be in a position to report new progress.

Germany. (IS). The Coppersmiths' Union now numbers 5,256 members in 100 branches, against 4,445 in the year 1910. This union is the only one to decline to amalgamate with the Metal Workers' Union. The Hotel Workers' Union raised its number of members from 13,918 to 16,542, including female workers, last year. Included in the latter number were 7,762 hotel and restaurant waiters, 2,112 café waiters, 267 cooks and 3,101 hotel and restaurant porters, etc. The union conducted 268 wages movements last year in which 6,410 persons were involved. A total increase in wages of 17,625 marks (£880) per week was obtained for 4,914 persons. Collective agreements were entered into in which 4,477 workers were concerned; a downright surprising result for a calling which has worked along trade union lines for years without seeming to reap any benefits. The funds of the union amount to £10,300. The Factory Workers' Union has a membership of 207,597 at the beginning of the present year, of which number 26,324 were women workers. Last year showed an increase in membership of 18,154. The total income of the central fund was £217,800 and financial assistance was rendered to the amount of £104,600. The total funds stand at £200,600. Altogether 601 wages movements have to be recorded for the year 1912 (this number includes strikes, lockouts, etc.). Four hundred and forty-three disputes were settled without a discontinuance of work being resorted to; ninety-four aggressive strikes. forty defensive strikes and twenty-four lockouts took place. The results obtained were, a reduction in the hours of labor for 15,661 persons, aggregating 44,681 hours per week, an increase in wages for 45,605 persons amounting to £3,979 per week. The union successfully opposed the employers' efforts to reduce the wages of employes in the case of 1,067 workers. The amount per week being involved was £117. The cost of all wages movements was £39,799. The regulation of wages and conditions of labor by means of tariff agreements made appreciable progress in the year 1912. The number of tariff agreements entered into for the year 1912 rose to 369 as compared with 301 in the previous year, the number of factories affected to 611 as compared with 489, the number of persons working under such agreements rose from 29,850 to 35,425. According to these agreements a maximum working week of fifty-four hours has been agreed upon for 3,019 workers, 53 hours for 6,207 workers, 54 for 2,441 workers, 54 to 57 hours for 649 workers, and over 57 hours for 42 workers. The Potters' (earthenware) Union nnmbered 11,291 members at the beginning of this year, that is 442 fewer than in the previous year. This falling off is attributable to a crisis in the trade itself. The years' income amounted to £19,800, and the expenditure to £20,800, of which sum £3,900 was used for the financial assistance of the unemployed. The total funds stand at £18,800. The union is now very busy discussing a plan for the amalgamation of their organization with that of the glass blowers and the china potters. Such an amalgamation would result in an organization 45,000 members strong. According to the statistics published by the Factory Workers' Union it seems that the profits of the employers have risen by 97.6 per cent. during the last thirty years whilst the workers' wages have risen by 51.9 per cent. only. From the year 1900 to 1911 the cost of living rose by twenty-seven per cent., the wages by nineteen per cent. and the employers' profits by thirty-nine per cent.

Russia. (IS). The first of May was appropriately celebrated as a labor day in the provinces of Russia adjacent to the Baltic Sea and also in Russian Poland and the neighboring provinces. Notwithstanding the fact that the police took the "necessary precautions" they were unable to prevent an almost general stoppage of work in Riga, Warsaw and other places where handbills were distributed and demonstrations attempted. A large squad of police and police spies entered the editorial and printing offices of the Social Democratic newspaper, the "Prawda," in St. Petersburg, on the night of the 30th of April under the leadership of a police officer. A search of the premises ensued which lasted several hours. Without troubling to wait for the editor or the publisher, the police forced open all cupboards, drawers and boxes, taking away the whole of the books, newspapers, correspondence and other editorial matter.

Austria. (IS). The Tailors' Union now numbers 8,211 members as compared with 7,088 in the year 1908 although about 1,000 members were lost on account of a split caused by the separatist movement. There are altogether 9,430 male and 8,236 female workers under sixteen years of age, and 40,449 male and 27,843 female workers over sixteen years of age in the Austrian clothing industry. This makes a total of 85,958 workers of which number 44,005 may be considered eligible for the trade union. The number of home workers in this industry is 18,869. The Workers' Temperance Union, which has opened a lively campaign against alcohol, now numbers 1,168 as compared with 899 in the previous year. The society receives the financial support of a number of trade unions. The average yearly wage of the employés in the Austrian state tobacco factories (state monopoly) is less than £30 per year. The locksmiths in Vienna have entered into a new tariff agreement, in which 120 factories and workshops are involved; this means 2,100 workers. The agreement provides for a reduction of the weekly working time from 54 to 53½ hours, an advance in the minimum wage from 3½d to 4d per hour for journeymen during their first year after completion of apprenticeship, and from 4½d to 5d for all other workers. No industrial concern employing more than ten workers is allowed to work women or girls between the hours of 8 in the evening and 5 in the morning. The Saddler and Bag Makers' Union has increased its membership from 1,721 to 1,948 in the last year, although 163 members in Prague fell away as a result of the separatist movement. The total funds amount to over £1,040.

Hungary. (IS). The Metal Workers' Union has raised its membership from 17,481 to 26,723. Of this number 20,000 are in Buda Pesth. The year's income amounted to £20,083, and the expenditure to £17,791. The average numbers of the Tailors' Union for the year 1911 was 4,282, for the year 1912, 4,875. According to the yearly report of the Trade Union Central the number of affiliated members stood at 111,966 at the end of the year 1912, as compared with 95,180 at the end of the year 1911 and 86,478 at the end of the year 1910.

Roumania. (IS). The tariff agreement entered into between the master bookbinders and the employers in 1910 is now about to be revised, and the employers want to make this an opportunity for reducing the wages of the workers by no inconsiderable amount. They are supposed to be contemplating the importation of foreign blacklegs if occasion demands.

Bulgaria. (IS). Through a telegram received from St. Sophia we learn that the trade unions held a very impressive peace demonstration on the occasion of the first of May.

Switzerland. (IS). The "Flügelrad," the Swiss railway workers' journal states that upon the occasion of the Kaiser's visit to the Swiss maneuvers the stretch of railway over which the royal train traveled was most carefully guarded. Same was thickly lined with men who were in some cases drawn from places a great distance away for this purpose. These men have not only been absolutely refused any kind of remuneration for their night work but the wages for the day required for the journey to and from their special duty have been deducted. The Swedish Temperance Union now numbers 93,146; that is, one member for every forty inhabitants. Fifty-three delegates as well as a representative of the French sister union were present at the municipal workers' conference in Olten. A proposition to abolish the secretariat was defeated by thirty-six votes to sixteen. The federation has at the present time thirty-two branches and 3,000 members.

France. (IS). The twenty-fourth congress of the railway men was attended by 129 delegates still engaged in the service, and who represented 161 local bodies. The number of members has fallen from 57,627 to 22,965 since the unsuccessful strike of 1910. The membership has, however, recently commenced to increase. Agitation is somewhat handicapped because of a rapidly growing Catholic organization, a Republican railway workers' union and also a new trade union which broke away from the old organization. This new union is now seeking reaffiliation. The congress has, however, refused to take back the members of this organization as a body, possibly because some of the members are not acceptable, but has left it to the discretion of these workers to apply separately for readmittance.

The disastrous dispute seems likely to continue. One of the most interesting points discussed afterwards was the question of the reinstatement of the men who were victimized after the strike had terminated. In spite of the Socialist party in parliament, and all the attempts at reconciliation on the part of the government representatives, the railway companies in general maintain their unyielding attitude. The bakers' strike has begun. It is said that almost 3,000 men laid down their tools on the first day. The Co-operative Society bakers are among the number, apparently because the ultimatum which was sent to all bakeries did not reach the managers of the co-operative societies in time. The mistake was explained at the first meeting of the strikers, and the different leaders, that the work be resumed in the co-operative bakeries, because these were prepared to grant the demands put forward by the union. This proposition was rejected by the meeting, so that the customers of the co-operative societies were obliged to get their bread from scab bakeries. In certain suburbs, as in St. Denis, where the town council is a Socialistic one, the mayors tried to ensure a supply of bread for the municipal institutions from the bakeries controlled by the organizations. With this end in view they addressed themselves to the strike committee, asking them if such an arrangement were possible under the circumstances. The strike committee could give no answer so these mayors will be obliged to make use of the offer of the government to install soldiers as strikebreakers, or draw their supplies of bread for the aged, the sick and the children under their care from non-union shops, if they will not let them hunger. The Trade Union National Center and the Parisian Trade Council has raised a most angry protest against the visit of the King of Spain; at the same time assuring their fellow workers in Spain of their support against the existing régime.

Belgium. (IS). One of the most deplorable features of the recent strike was the position which the Christian unions took up. They had not only decided not to take part in the strike, but sent a circular letter to the employers asking them not to close their works during the strike. The employers were at once given to understand that the Christian union labor bureaus could place blacklegs at their disposal. In reply to a question one of the ministers recently stated that boys under sixteen years of age can still be employed in brickyards up to twelve hours daily. The Belgian Trade Union Congress will take place in Brussels on the 15th and 16th of July. The loosely organized federation was, on the 1st of January, reorganized into a national central union again. The new organizing methods have conduced very largely to the growth of the organization. At the end of 1910 same numbered 14,999 members, at the end of 1911 as many as 22,616, and at the end of 1912, 29,656. The number of members who were involved in strikes was 2,009 in 1911, and 1,555 last year; whilst the average period during which the workers were on strike amounted to eleven days in 1909, 15.5 days in 1910, 12.5 days in 1911, and 32.2 days in 1912. The strike expenditure consequently increased from £1,866 to £5,556 in the last two years. In spite of that the wages movements were most favorably influenced by the good state of trade during the year under notice. There were only 0.8 per cent. of the workers out of work in 1912, as compared with 1.02 per cent. in the year 1911, and 2 per cent. in 1910; whilst the average number of work days lost through unemployment, viz., 6.7, compares favorably with 10.7 in 1911 and 16 in 1910. The expenditure for other benefits has increased very considerably. In spite of this the general funds of the union have increased from £6,791 to £12,083. The agitation is conducted with the assistance of the Trade Union Journal, which at present has a circulation of 35,000 copies.

United States. (IS). The membership subscription in the American Typographical Union is graduated according to the amount earned. It is, therefore, impossible to arrive at the exact earnings of all members. Taken from the last year's report, the average yearly earnings for all union workers were as follows: In the year 1909, $897; in 1910, $953; in 1911 $974, and in 1912 $992. The eight-hour day is the general rule, but in certain sections the introduction of the five-day week has been effected.

KNOCKING AND BOOSTING.

"When a union elects a member to an official position it does so not to make him a target for censure and abuse, but that he may be a center around which members shall gather to make effective the work of the organization. This is a lesson that has not taken hard enough hold on the minds of union members. There is a peculiar perversity possessing many union people that makes them knock the men they had elected to office. They seem to have an idea that because they have elected a brother to office they have a right to dog him to their hearts' content. They treat him very much the same way that Indians used to treat their squaws, only worse. The Indian made the squaw do all the work, but she did not have much to say, while the union man has a good deal to say and piles all the work of the organization on the shoulders of the officers and heaps abuse on his head. If the union members who are guilty of this folly would have as much to say in the way of boosting as they have in the way of knocking, how easy would be the work of officers and how successful the organization."—Exchange.

LIFE IN DEATH.

Tho world has put its impudent institutions in your way. Its states dead in the law. Its churches dead in the creed. And they have thrown clouds across your path. They don't want you to be too happy about life. For if you are too happy about life you are likely to be miserable enough about death. So they keep reminding you that while life's all very well, death cuts it off. For if you felt easy about dying, hearing them say that in the midst of life we are in death, would have no terrors for you. You would be saying something else to yourself. You'd be saying that in the midst of death we are in life. For you'd see your data for that everywhere you turned. You'd see how determined everything is to live. How nothing stays dead. How things gone wrong right themselves. How things thrown down get on their feet again. You don't need an argument for that. You only need eyes. The one thing you can't do is to kill anything. The universe resents being dead. It resurects even the failures into successes. You begin to understand that the trump card of space and time is not death but life. That no matter what death plays life covers it. That no matter what death stakes life goes it better. What is there in seas and stars and love to make you think of death? It's all action. It's all exultant energy. It's all triumphing creation. Death is nothing; only more life added to life. Death is only a place we pass through, not a finale where we stop. We may put up with death over night. But we're ready for more life in the morning. When we see things living in order that they may die we wonder how any man or any object could be a paying investment. But when we see things dying in order that they may live we know that we profit share and share alike all of us and all things together in immortal returns. So I say: In the midst of death we are in life.

In the midst of life we are in death. Nothing can be kept hold of. Everything slips away. Fathers and mothers lose children. Children lose fathers and mothers. Earthquakes destroy cities. Suns go out. Seas run dry. People suffer. The world is full of disease. The best laid plans lead to the worst laid results. There are no real victories. The momentary triumphs are swallowed in the general defeat. The process may be dazzling. But the end is an eclipse. The word of the world is death. The word of the earth. The word of the apples and wheat. The word of music. Of the arts. Of love. Of all that we live for. The word of the world is death. When you take your baby on your knee repeat that word to it. Let it know the word of words first, last, always. Let it lisp despair from the start. Don't fool the baby. Open its eyes as soon as you can. Make it understand that nothing is worth while. This is a world of fight all with all. Not a world of brothers but a world of brutes. Things may come to a little on the way. But nothing comes to much in the long run. We lose all the joy of sunrises in the sorrows of sunsets. You are not a man but a worm. You are not to be proud. You are to apologize for being alive. Some fool may show up and ask you how you know you are alive if you are so sure you are to die. But you'll treat the fool according to his folly. You'll make him feel cheap in a dear world. You'll send him to wars. You'll rob him of what he works for. You'll reduce the flame of his desire to the ashes of depletion. Then maybe he'll believe you. Then maybe he'll admit that the progress of the race is an illusion. That being good or bad makes no difference. That beauty and ugliness come to the same inglorious end. Don't you see it is all about you? If everything's to wind up in a coffin, what's the use of beginning anything in the cradle? Life's a flash in the pan. There's a minute's daylight. All the rest is black. In the midst of life we are in death. In the midst of laughter we are in tears. Make hay while the sun shines. It breaks through the clouds so rarely and is so brief. Let no minute escape you. Don't you see that the hours are not yours? Reach out round you for the few comforts that may ease your way. East, west, north, south; it's all one however you sail. Do you know the place you are bound for? Oblivion. In the midst of life we are in death. Just about when you think you are born you die. And no one dares to say to you that just about when you think you die you are born. No one but me. But I don't count. My word is crazy. For my word is yes. The only sane word is no. No meets you at every turn. In the institution. In the market. In what is called the substance of life. They do talk of heaven and a future now and then. But they spoil what they say of the beyond bywhat they they say of the here. If it's true that in the midst of life we're in death, then it's not true that in the midst of death we're in life. And if we're not in life in the midst of death, then we're nowhere. Then we were never born at all. Then we are fooled if we think we are alive. Then we are nowhere. Then we are nobody. Then the earth is a mirage. Then all there is is nothing. In the midst of life we are in death.—Horace Traubel in the May Conservator.

To the Officers and Members of Butte Stationary Engineers' Union, No. 83, Western Federation of Miners:

Brothers:—We, your committee on resolutions of condolence on the death of Brother W. A. Ormsby, beg to submit the following:

RESOLUTIONS.

The uncertainty of life has been most forcibly called to our attention when, in the early bloom of manhood, without a moment's warning, upon the 25th day of May, 1913, our brother, William A. Whereas, In the death of this brother the union and society has lost one of its most promising members, his relatives an obedient and dutiful son and kind brother; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we tender to his relatives our most sincere sympathy in this great loss; and further,

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, a copy sent to the relatives and a copy sent to the Miners' Magazine for publication.

THE EDITOR having aeeepted an invitation to deliver an address at Haneoek, Miehigan, and having beeu away from his usual duties for almost a week, is the reason this issue of the Magazine is very limited as to original matter.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT of Vaneouver, B. C., has gathered statistics relative to industrial eonditions in that eity and has discovered that there are over 3,000 idle men, the majority of whom are meehanics. Men out of employment should keep away from Vaneouver, British Columbia.

WOOD of the Woolen trust was the leading magnate of a eorporation that boasts of $60,000,000 eapital. HENRY T. OXNARD, identified with the beet sugar industry, stated before the investigating eommittee of the United States senate that almost a million dollars had been expended fighting anti-free sugar bills.

The tariff on sugar has put eountless millions of dollars into the coffers of the prineely gentlemen who have become millionaires through a tariff.

It is no wonder that these benefieiaries of the tariff spend nearly a million dollars to keep sugar from the free list. It would be interesting to know all the names of the honorable gentlemen who were bribed by the sugar kings.

SAID MIKE to Ike: "You dirty Jew, I'll whale the stuffin's out of you! You blatherin', unbaptized galoot, I'm danged good moind to smash your snoot!" Said Ike to Mike: "You Christian dog, you r-rotten beast vot lifs on hog, ven dot chureh r-rings dot ol' ehureh bell, I dells der pope to go to hell!" And then the blood and whiskers flew between the Christian and the Jew.

Now, both these lobsters worked all day for the self-same boss at blamed small pay; and devil a bit did this boss eare for the bleeding mugs and gobs of hair. "If I," said he, "ean keep these two—Mike, the Christian, and Ike, the Jew—serappin' about their ereeds and such, I can skin 'em both to beat the Dutch; but if they lose their myths and ereeds, their goblins, ghosts and strings of beads, and find their interests are one, the two would have me on the run!"

And the boss lay back and smole a smile, and dreamed of next year's goodly pile that he would swipe from wealth that grew from sweat of Christian and of Jew. And he blessed the ghosts with all his heart that kept poor Mike and Ike apart.—Melting Pot.

IT IS REPORTED through the press that the Ameriean Railroad and Employés and Investors Assoeiation will be tenderly laid away in its grave during the month of July, and that P. H. Morrisey will preside at the funeral services.

This organization was launehed about five years ago, and the promoters were the magnates of railway companies.

P. H. Morrisey was then president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, but severed his eonneetion with the Trainmen to give his attention to an organization whose sole aim and object was to blind the railway employés to their own interests and use them as allies of railway eorporations. Morrisey, it is said, received $15,000 per annum for his services, but after five years the railroads discovered that Morrisey could searcely "deliver the goods," and now the ultimatum has gone forth that the organization shall be consigned to the junk-pile.

Morrisey, for his manifested loyalty to serve the railroad companies and to hypnotize the workers, is slated for a luerative position with the Chieago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company.

THE MINERS of Haneoek, Miehigan held a eelebration on June 15th, and the miners were addressed by English, Italian, Finnish and Croatian speakers. The miners and their families who assembled in a park about a mile from the eommereial heart of Haneock showed by their enthusiasm that the spirit of unionism is alive in the great copper distriet.

The miners of Haneoek are made up of different nationalities and ereeds, but race lines and ereed prejudiees have been wiped out through the brotherhood that is being established through the building up of a powerful local union of the Western Federation of Miners.

The miners have realized, through lessons learned in the school of experienee, that as individuals they are absolutely helpless in eommanding any favorable eonsideration from exploiters, and that only through a eollective body ean they hope to advanee their material interests. The organizers of the Western Federation of Miners have been doing splendid work in Haneoek, Calumet and Laurium, and it is only a question of a short time, eomparatively, when almost every man working in and around the mines will be found standing beneath the banner of the labor movement.

THERE IS NO OCCASION for surprise that the jury in the trial of William M. Wood, head of the American Woolen Company, acquitted him of the charge of conspiring to "plant" dynamite in the homes of Lawrence strikers to bring opprobrium upon the strikers and justify the brutality of the national guard.

It is true that one of the men who was hired to "plant" the dynamite confessed, and that one of the "leading citizens" of Lawrence was convicted on the charge of having placed the dynamite in the homes of the strikers, but there was no direct evidence to show precisely what mill owner instigated the crime, though circumstantial evidence pointed quite conclusively to the fact that the "planting" of the dynamite was inspired by one or more of the mill owners.

It is very diffieult to prove conspiracy, especially when millionaires are involved. It is one thing to convict the head of a $60,000,000 corporation and quite another thing to obtain evidence against labor union officials whose associates have been involved in dynamite plots. Labor unions do not hire millionaires to spy on one another. There are no Burns men masquerading as trust magnates.

The bitter protests of workingmen that in time of strikes much of the violence, mueh of the destruction of property, much of the reversion to the law of the jungle, is timed and designed, as was the Lawrenee dynamite plot, to discredit them and give excuse for resort to force, have been justified. The facts could be no clearer if all of the mill owners at Lawrence were now in jail.—Labor World, Duluth.

THE INVESTIGATION of the senate committee into the brutal outrages that were perpetrated in West Virginia has disclosed conditions which baffle the power of the pen for a description. It is evident from the testimony gathered that might made right and that the will of the coal barons, backed by armed thugs and the military, was the law to which miners were presumed to render implicit obedience. At the present writing the facts reveal that many of the strikers have been discriminated against, and those discriminated against are the men who stood upon their feet with their heads erect, refusing to bow to the dictum of corporate combinations.

These men discriminated against were the dauntless soldiers who stood upon the firing line and put their lives in jeopardy to keep alive the spirit of unionism in West Virginia.

The coal corporations do not want these men in the mines, as aetive, energetic men engaged in the missionary work of bringing their fellowmen under the flag of organized labor are looked upon as enemies to the interests of a master class. In fact, the mine operators have decreed that unionism must be stamped out and crushed in the coal fields of America's Siberia. No organization must be permitted to live that conflicts in any manner with the demands of organized gluttons. Dividends must be corpulent, even though human beings are robbed of constitutional liberty and doomed to live in the squalor of abject poverty.

The fight, from present indications, has only commenced in West Virginia.

ARRANGEMENTS are now being made to celebrate the Fourth of July in nearly all of the prominent towns and cities of America. The orators are busy preparing their speeches and the vendors of fireworks are gloating over the anticipated profits that will flow into their coffers through the enthusiasm and patriotism felt by deluded citizens who hug the delusion to their breasts that here on the soil of Young Columbia man is free. The orators will point to empires and kingdoms where liberty groans in the shackles of slavery and where millions of human beings are continually forced to wear the rags of poverty and endure the pangs of want. The orator will dwell upon the equal rights of citizenship beneath the fluttering folds of "Old Glory," and will endeavor to make it appear that the boy born in a hovel may reach the highest gift within the gift of 90,000,000 of people. Unfortunately the great mass of the people who have never gone below the surface of the economic wrongs that hold labor in bondage applaud the gush that streams from the lips of the spell-binder, and being swept off their feet by the gaudy tinselry of a word painter, become blind to the infamies that grow out of a system that is loaded with sighs and sobs, and wet with tears and blood.

The great mass of the people do not seem to realize that capital is the same all over the world, and that capital is as brutal within the domain of a republie as within the realm of a monarchy. Capital rules with the mailed fist in every nation of the world, and America, with its boasted "Declaration of Independence," is a land where capital sits on the throne of power and authority.

As men who bear the burdens and the scars of our hellish system discern the outrages that are bred from exploitation, they will eease to eheer the orator in his flights of eloquence, but will come together to end the struggle that makes brutes of human beings.

The Day of Independence can never be celebrated until masters and slaves are swept from our civilization.

ELBERT H. GARY, chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation, admits in the suit now on to dissolve the corporation that he has undergone a change of heart. His once elastic conscience is so no more. He will not do things now that he cheerfully did in the earlier days. Probably he cannot, or dare not. The senile sinner has all his verdant impulse to crime. He lacks performance. All his knowledge, all the varieties of long wrongdoing in which he is expert, do not help him. Had he known what he knows too late, what a magnifieent sinner he would have been! "If youth but knew; If age but could!"

It is the same with the ordinary criminal. The greater the expertness he gains in his calling, usually the greater is danger to him when he employs it. He is known as a criminal, or a habitual criminal, and the punishment he receives is heavier than what comes to the novice.

When the corporation was new, Gary testifies, "I do not think I was as careful in those days as I am now. I think we have all been stirred up to being more careful at the present time."

As a repentance, it is worth about as much as the expression "I'm sorry for being found out."

The regret for sin is usually based upon becoming known to your neighbors, or being so supervised that you cannot continue in the ways of sin. There is not a note of regret in Gary's words for those actions which brought so much suffering, so many failures, so great an agony to his "competitors." If he happened to be further advanced in crime, he might even cry out, with Louis XI., as in the play, for strength from God to commit one crime more. At his death, Mr. Morgan is credited with the desire for one more financial coup—that of "rearranging the Papal finances." All Louis XI. and Ivan the Terrible and the others did, never had the reach and inclusiveness of our modern financial operations.

But Louis repented and Ivan was sorry, and every old sinner avows that he will not now do what he did in his youth. .And he will not, because he cannot. Not he, but society, has changed. He has no longer the power. Gary's inelastic conscience would, if it could permit him to do what he formerly did—and more. He has not improved. We have. He has not the power to commit a crime, and he thinks he has repented. "Conscience" is not a private thing, as at one time supposed, but a social affair. The truth is, he cannot do what he once did. His power, economically speaking, has failed, and he is, furthermore, so closely watched that he dare not.

If he really repented, he would restore. Yet, the idea of restoration is the farthest removed thing that can be expected from him.—New York Call.

THE SECRETARY of Bingham Miners' Union has sent us an issue of the Press Bulletin of June 13th, which contains the following:

"C. S. Dawson is home again from San Francisco, where he has been attending the eleventh biennial convention of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. Mr. Dawson went as a delegate of the local organization, and as such had the following resolution passed by the convention:

Whereas, The Western Federation of Miners called a strike against the Utah Copper Company, a mining corporation of Bingham, Utah, on September 18, 1912, on account of the said Utah Copper Company refusing to grant the Western Federation of Miners a raise of wages amounting to 50 cents per day for each man; and

Whereas, The Western Federation of Miners asked Bingham lodge No. 631, B. of R. .T., to affiliate with them; and

Whereas, Lodge 631 refused to do so, the members of lodge 631 have been called a bunch of organized scabs, by a certain element belonging to the Western Federation of Labor.

Be It Resolved, That this convention go on record as sustaining the action taken by Bingham lodge No. 631, in living up to the constitution.

"C. S. DAWSON, 631.
"F. ALDRICH, 434.
"T. L. CARMODY, 388.
"JAS. EDWARDS, 408.
"IRA DAVIS, 349."

The above resolution, adopted by the eleventh biennial convention of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, in no way can vindicate the conduct of the railway men who became allies of the Utah Copper Company.

The general organization, through its delegates, giving their indorsement to the position taken by the local unions of railway trainmen, is deplorable and demonstrates that the delegates in convention assembled were blind to the principles of real unionism.

Were the Railway Trainmen involved in a strike directly with the Utah Copper Company and the members of the Western Federation of Miners continued at work, producing ore that furnished employment to scabs and strike-breakers who usurped the places of railway men who were waging a battle for an increase of wages, there is no doubt but that the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen would have condemned the Western Federation of Miners and looked upon the men who mined ore for corporations that were using every means to defeat a strike and destroy a labor organization, as a "bunch of organized scabs."

The resolution adopted at the convention at San Franciseo does not acquit the local unions, but the passage of such a resolution heralds to the world that the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, as a national body, gives its sanction and approbation to its membership remaining at work and aiding in the defeat of another labor organization whose members were struggling for a living wage.

More War Talk—Is Manly to Hate

By R. A. Dague.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCHES of June 7th, from Berlin, as quoted by the Chicago Record-Herald, say:

"Even the pending 'billion mark bill,' appropriating $250,000,000 for German armaments, is not enough to satisfy German militarists. A campaign for further increases in the German army, to begin as soon as the present legislation is out of the way, already is signalized, and the direction in which non-official pressure on the government, so successful in the case of the pending measure, will be applied, is already indicated.

"General Keim, president of the National Defense Society, opened the sessions with a warlike speech, in which he attacked the recent Berne peace confrence, and said:

"'Furthermore, the peace movement is dangerous for Germany. One hundred and forty Protestant pastors have made public a peace manifesto, and we find similar views among the teachers. We must work energetically against these manifestations. To be manly is to have the capacity to hate. Bismarck hated day and night. I hate every man who threatens the life of the German people.'

"Referring to certain meetings to promote peace, the general said: 'Such things must fill the German folk with wrath, and this wrath must grip also our young men.'"

In the United States every possible effort is being made to foster the military spirit. An Army League is being quietly organized; the Boy Scout movement is being pushed, and now an effort is being made to arouse the war spirit in college boys.

On June 8th the Associated Press said:

"About twenty schools and universities already have signified their intention of sending students to attend the military instruction camps to be held under the auspices of the War Department at Gettysburg National Park, Pennsylvania, from July 7 to August 15, and at the Presidio, Monterey, Cal., from July 1 to August 8, inclusive. A hundred colleges were invited to participate.

"Among the larger institutions which have assured the department they will be represented are Yale, Harvard, Princeton and Cornell, the George Washington and Georgetown universities."

Well may David Starr Jordan say that there is a world-wide conspiracy among military men "to fill the air with war talk." It is as General Keim says, a gospel of hate which these promoters of war are preaching. Hate is the opposite of love and brotherhood. It is the gospel of devils and of hell. It is the lowest, blackest, wickedest emotion of the human heart. It is the cause of murder and all crime. It is the deadly foe of all civilization, and yet this war craze—this gospel of hate and war—is being taught millions of American boys today.

General Keim is logical. Brotherhood, kindness, good fellowship practiced by people, destroy wars. The general says we must work energetically against these things. Peace meetings, he says, fills him with wrath, and ought also to grip young people with wrath. He says to be manly one must be a good hater. He holds up Bismarck as a pattern and he hated day and night. Of course the general knows that if he can induce boys to foster thoughts of hate and malice and murder, that then they will be ferocious devils when he puts guns and sabers in their hands, and, excited by martial music, he orders them out to burn, destroy and kill. It is cause for profound sorrow to peacefully inclined persons who are trying to abolish wars to see presidents of universities and colleges, teachers, clergymen, superintendents of Sunday schools and officers of the Y. M. C. A. and other profound disciples of Christ, with so-called statesmen, are moving heaven, earth and hell to put the war virus into the innocent minds of millions of American boys. General Sherman said: "War is hell." General Keim says he demands a larger army and to be manly you must hate.

Jesus said: "Behold! a new command I give unto you, that ye love one another." Thomas Paine said: "The world is my country; to do good is my religion."

Socialism says: "An injury to one is the concern of all."

Creston, Iowa.

Paterson Conditions

THE PATERSON STRIKE has developed nothing new in trade union warfare. In previous strikes the workers showed courage, endurance, willingness to suffer great privation, loyalty and patience under great wrongs. The syndicalist theory of a series of short, quick strikes was not put into effect. All the talk that has accompanied the strike and all the claims that something novel was being done do not offset the fact that this is a contest of endurance between the employers and the workers.

When the strike began many of the strikers possessed a little money or a little property that could be turned into money. Up to the present it has not been a hunger strike, as was the case in Lawrence. Paterson workers were somewhat better paid than the Lawrence workers, and many could, by scrimping, gather together a little money. With grim determination they have been using this, sacrificing for their cause what they brought together with such pain and what was intended for the workless period of old age or for times of sickness.

All theories and generalizations as to new or old methods in labor warfare, all cunningly devised plans to expedite working class victories, count for very little. The factor in this battle, as in previous ones, is the power of resistance the strikers can offer to the force that is exerted against them by the master class.

There has not been an I. W. W. strike that did not possess the same essential features as A. F. of L. strikes. The A. F. of L. strikes, in turn, have the same essential features as those great clashes in which the Knights of Labor, the Western Federation of Miners previous to affiliation with the A. F. of L., and the American Railway Union figured. The claims of superiority in method fall before the facts of actual warfare. The theoretician steps aside, and his place is taken by the people in the field, the strikers themselves. Whatever their theories may be, the deciding point is to win some concessions before the hunger line is reached by most of the strikers. When this hunger line is reached the strike is lost.

Every victory won by strikers is a compromise or a "reform." There is some concession won, and you may call your union conservative or revolutionary as you choose; the victory of either is of the same nature. Better working conditions, shorter working hours or more pay may be gained, but the industry is not revolutionized.

The Long Campaign.

The I. W. W. has scorned the "war chest" of the A. F. of L. The A. F. of L. unions slowly accumulate funds, and when a strike occurs the union can pay strike benefits for a shorter or longer time. For instance, the United Mine Workers have been paying strike benefits in the West Virginia field for about three months. They have assessed themselves to pay these benefits and have not asked outside aid. This method is the same as is used in warfare of building up a commissariat department. In military warfare there is another method, that of foraging, or "living off the country." Sometimes it is brilliantly successful, for the army is not thereby hampered with baggage and posseses great mobility. It can strike a blow and move rapidly away to strike another one. It can dash from place to place, inflicting great injury on the enemy and devastating the country. But such a body can operate only in a fat land. Where the fields are lean, the granaries empty and the stables depleted, it starves. The I. W. W. method is that of living off the country. It does not believe in the war chest—or supply train—for it does not want to be burdened with anything the enemy may capture. So when it enters a strike it goes to forage to feed the army of strikers, as in Lawrence, and it therefore sends far and wide its appeals for funds. Or, as in Paterson, the strikers consume their own goods. Which is the better method can be determined only by results. The claims of leaders before a battle, or during a cessation of industrial hostilities, can be thrown aside. Comparison of claims or boasts is foolish. Comparison of results settles the point.

The Paterson strikers have been out sixteen weeks, waging one of the fiercest contests this country has seen. There have been hundreds of other places in which police brutality was greater than it has been there. But never have we had an equal amount of judicial terrorism applied in a strike. The mill owners, the police, the newspapers and the court officials combined solidly to crush the strike. The police have filled the jails and the prosecutors and recorder and judges have piled up fines and jail sentences. The enormous cost of this to the strikers has been added to their heavy burdens, and so systematically has the work been carried on that there can be no doubt that is a deliberate conspiracy to break the strike.

The strike, therefore, has not only been one of long duration, but one one that is enormously costly. Like Lawrence, Little Falls and Akron, it disproves the contention that the I. W. W. has discovered a new mothed of labor warfare. It only shows that the strikers must finance their strike by consuming their own resources or by raising money while the strike is in progress.

Could a Settlement Have Been Made?

During the early days of the strike there were offers from some of the mills of a settlement. These offers were refused, as the leaders said, "It must be all or none." Solidarity had to be maintained, and as a result solidarity was forced upon the manufacturers likewise. The big ones, probably, would have stuck together in every circumstance. They had the resources—their war chest—with which to continue almost indefinitely. The little ones had only what the big ones allowed them. Several small concerns have gone into the hands of receivers. It is not probable that when the strike is over these small concerns will be able to start up again. But there will continue the demand for silk that existed previous to the strike, and the trade the small shops had will go to the big ones.

This is a feature of every strike where a number of concerns, great and small, are involved. The concentration of the industry is furthered by the strike. The strike of the garment workers in New York eliminated a number of the smaller establishments. Others have since started, but that strike, like the Paterson strike, helped concentration onward.

Where settlements are quickly made and the smaller bosses give in at once, some of them may be saved. The longer the strike is maintained unbroken the more certain it becomes that, no matter how favorable the settlement is to the strikers, the active or financial control of the industry itself centers in ever fewer hands. In Paterson some of the firms not yet bankrupt are actually mortgaged to the bigger concerns. Thus, though actual ownership does not rest with the bigger concerns, actual control does.

If the Mills Are Moved.

Miss Flynn's announcement that an international silk strike would be called cannot very well be taken seriously. It is like the threat of a general strike of all workers in Paterson, and is made without taking into consideration all the elements involved. It is a great pity that Miss Flynn has not some rudimentary knowledge of Socialist economics and of general industrial conditions. Too absorbed a devotion to the fight that is on and too deep a concentration on this one fight led her to forget until four months passed the international feature of industry.

When the strike dragged along week after week and when the big mill owners stubbornly refused all offers of negotiation, it must have been obvious that they felt confident of their position. They knew all conditions in the silk world. They know the state of the market, and they knew on how much money they could depend. They are part of that combination which controls silk from its raw to its finished state. They can prevent new men from coming into the field and starting on any considerable scale. They are international, while the labor unions, though they should be, are not. In spite of the name Industrial Workers of the World, this organization is a small dissenting labor body that specializes through its leaders in conducting strikes, not in organizing workers.

Therefore, the more intensely this battle was fought and the longer it continued the more the reserve productivity of capital in the silk industry was swung to other manufacturing centers. Paterson could be ruined as a silk city, and many mill owners ruined likewise. But the business itself cannot be ruined, and the control of it cannot through a local strike be wrested from the capitalist class. Every mill may move elsewhere, and in new places great concessions may be granted the workers. Still control rests with the capitalists, and the profits of the industry go to the capitalists. When put to the test every kind of unionism has for its immediate object some little increased share of the fruits of the industry. Workers live from day to day, not in futures, and what the workers must have is some increase for the day, not some promise of everything hereafter.

The Cohesive Force.

Naturally the business men of Paterson, and particularly the mill owners, are bitterly opposed to a congressional investigation of Paterson conditions. They do not want any outside interference from the government any more than they want "interference by outside agitators." Quinlan, Scott, Miss Flynn, Haywood and others would be cordially welcomed compared with the greeting an investigation would receive. And why? Because they can be dealt with "in accordance with the law" as enforced by John Bimson and interpreted by Recorder Carroll and Judge Klenert. The fight can be kept pretty well within the limits of Paterson, and they can conduct this fight according to their own rules and with the tremendous power they possess. But when the fight gets beyond them, when their actions become matters of national legislative inquiry and when the truth of what they did and are doing becomes a matter of general knowledge, then they know they will be stopped from acting as they have.

The local authorities, backed up by local opinion—and that is the opinion that wields economic power—are usually cruel. The local judge can be a petty tyrant and he does pretty much what his moneyed supporters wish. There can be no doubt that "public opinion" in Paterson strongly supports all that Bimson and Carroll have done. It was done for the benefit of those who profit by the work of the mill hands, and therefore was wise and good. But when the decision of whether or not it is wise and good moved from Paterson to the whole nation, then there comes another sort of public opinion, that of the great mass of the American people.

A congressional investigation started by Victor Berger made Lawrence a national, not a local affair. The senatorial investigation of West Virginia has made the miners' strike a national, not a local affair. An investigation of Paterson would make this strike a national, not a local affair. It would do more to rally to the support of the strikers all the forces of the working class than anything else could.

Why, then, do some of the leaders oppose it? Because it smacks of "political action," and they are against political action, even if it means disaster to the workers. Their theory is of more concern to them than the welfare of the workers.

But political action is the greatest cohesive force, for political action is born of economic necessity and without it a class is helpless.

The Others Believe.

How did Bimson, Carroll and Klenert get their power? Through political action on the part of the business men of Paterson and those workers who were misled into supporting them. They want control of office in order to safeguard what they have stolen from the workers. How wonderfully effective that control is is demonstrated by the smashed heads of the strikers, by the mass of fines and the crowds that have been arrested. It is demonstrated by the power Bimson had to seize the Passaic Issue and destroy it, by the power Klenert had to sentence Alexander Scott to jail, and to make a criticism of a bone-headed public official a "crime against government."

The workers who have the courage to strike and the intelligence to run their industrial affairs have likewise the intelligence to run their political affairs. Control of political power is of as much importance as industrial organization. You must use both.

Those who are for organization and against working class politics are in the position of saying: "I'll hop on my right foot until I get to the industrial republic. My right leg is stronger than my left, therefore it is the one that should be used. The left leg may have some slight utility even now. But when I get the industrial republic I'll use both legs, for much hopping will have made the right one so strong that it will be easy to begin using the left one, and then all will be well."—New York Call.

War and National Degeneracy

IT IS TAKEN for granted, not only by the military class, but by influential writers, that war, by appealing to the heroic side of the national life, prevents social stagnation, which is thought of as being fatal to healthy progress. Tennyson, in "Maud," pandered to the jingo spirit, and Ruskin, of all writers, has done much to throw a halo round war. According to Ruskin, "all the pure and noble arts of peace are founded on war." Like Tennyson, Ruskin seems to think that compared with the soldier the merchant is a sordid, prosaic creature. Had Tennyson and Ruskin been imbued with the spirit of science, they would have been secure against shallow nonsense of this sort. Viewed from the side of biology, war is a potent factor in national degeneracy. Apart from biology, common sense should have kept Tennyson and Ruskin from going wrong on this subject. Franklin goes to the root of the matter when he says: "There is one effect of a standing army, which must in time be felt so as to bring about the abolition of the system. A standing army not only diminishes the population of a country, but even the size and breed of the human species. For an army is the flower of the nation. All the most vigorous, stout and well-made men in a kingdom are to be found in the army, and these men, in general, cannot marry." Franklin adds the significant remark: "Wars are not paid in war time; the bills come later." The men who are left determine the future, and from the standpoint of biology it is easy to see that the continuance of the race from the least physically fit tend to national degeneracy.

We see the process illustrated in the case of ancient Rome. In consequence of the numerous wars, the ranks of the small farmers who were the backbone of the nation were decimated, and the number of slaves who did not serve in the army multiplied. With the killing out of the physically fit, and the rapid multiplication of the physically unfit, there came a change in the breed of the race—a change which proved fatal to Rome. As a German historian puts it: "Out of every hundred thousand strong men, eighty thousand are slain. Out of every hundred thousand weaklings, ninety to ninety-five thousand were left to survive." As Professor Seeley puts it, immediate cause of the fall of Rome was physical, rather than moral, decay. "The empire perished for want of men." But we have ample evidence of the effect of war in producing race degeneracy in the case of France under Napoleon. Among those destroyed by Napoleon were the flower of the nation. His soldiers, the pick of the population, came from the plow, the workshop and the academy, the ages being from 18 to 35. In a series of years, soldiers of high stature were mowed down, and their places were filled by raw recruits of smaller stature. As one French writer says: "It will take long periods of peace and plenty before France can recover the tall statures mowed down in the wars of the republic and the first empire." In his "History of Napoleon," J. H. Rose paints a lurid picture of the awful effects of war:

"The mighty swirl of the Moscow campaign sucked 150,000 lads of under 20 years of age into the devouring vortex. The peasantry gave up their sons as food for cannon." Mr. Rose goes on to say that "In less than half a year after the loss of 500,000 men a new army as numerous was marshalled under the imperial eagles. But the majority were young, untrained troops, and it was remarked that the conscripts both in the year of terror had not the stamia of the early levies."

The army was filled with raw youths. By and by the French began to feel their weakness. The drafting of raw conscripts smaller in stature than the soldiers of the earlier campaigns weakened the self-confidence of the army. The human harvest was deteriorating, and to this fact—physical deterioration—the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo was no doubt largely due. We are continually told that it is only by war that the manhood of a nation can be kept to the highest pitch. The opposite is the truth. In times of peace there is no killing out of the courageous. In times of peace the heroic virtues get time to mature. It is taken for granted that success is most likely to come to the nation which is long accustomed to war. What of the Japanese, who had a long spell of peace? An American professor puts this point well when he says: "If after 200 years of incessant battle the Japanese still remained virile and warlike, that would indeed, be the marvel. But that marvel no nation has ever seen. It is doubtless true that warlike traditions are more persistent with nations most frequently engaged in war. But the traditions of war and the physical strength to gain victories are very different thing. Other things being equal the nation which has shown least of war is the one most likely to develop the strong battalions with whom victory must rest.'' Of course, this line of thought is distasteful to those who are clamoring for war and whose ideal is a nation in arms. Owing to the glamor which surrounds war, the military patriots are a danger to the nation. While the time spirit is making for peace, while the whole tendencies of our industrial civilization are opposed to war, the military patriots, both here and elsewhere, are constituting themselves a menace to the peace of the world.—Hector Macpherson, in Machinists, Monthly Journal.

To the Rescue

QUITE UNDAUNTED by the senate investigation of their regime in West Virginia, the mine-owning interests have moved through the federal grand jury to indict the officials of the United Mine Workers on the charge of conspiring with the mining interests of other states to restrain trade by seeking to organize the miners of West Virginia, and by raising wages and increasing the cost of production to make it more difficult for the West Virginia operators to compete at tidewater with coal mined by union miners, says the Leader.

The charge of conspiracy is brought against both the mine workers and the mine owners, but, curiously enough, only the mine workers have been indicted.

Why not carry the supreme court's interpretation of the anti-trust law to its logical conclusion? If it is a violation of the anti-trust law and a restraint of trade to ''conspire'' for higher wages, why not send the men who pay such wages to jail for encouraging restraints of trade?

Chief Justice Marshall, that fine old gentleman who was the author of the Dartmouth college decision, and whose name is reverenced by every lawyer in the land, as well as by every man who holds a franchise or a land grant, and is conscious of the great service rendered by the judiciary to give sanctity to vested rights, early decided that, ''while it is true that every man has a natural right to the fruits of his own labor,'' ''from the earliest times war has existed, and was confers rights in which all acquiesced.'' Thus in ''making war'' on the African, the enterprising citizens who owned plantations in Virginia deprived him of his natural right. So we get back to West Virginia, where the ''war'' upon the mine workers has been progressing famously.

The great judicial authority, John Marshall, speaking for the supreme court of the United States, reached the conclusion that the importation of Africans to be employed by planters was wholly legal, because ''Africa has not yet adopted the principle that war no longer gives the right to the victor to enslave the vanquished.''

John Marshall is dead. But his decisions live after him. Why should the supreme court rest content with such a lame device as its reconstruction of the anti-trust law to include labor organizations as conspiracies in restraint of trade? Why not revert to the doctrine set up by Marshall in the case of the Antelope and its human cargo? That would simplify the labor question and put an end to the outcry against government by injunction.

The United Mine Workers' officials have been indicted, but they will not go to prison. John Marshall, as we have remarked, is dead. There is the same judicial mind interpreting statutes and constitutions and laying burdens upon the backs of those whose unrequitted toil provides the magnificence which surrounds the seat of the mighty, but the burden-bearer is in revolt. He denies that serfdom, to quote Marshall, ''is a legitimate result of force.''

Africa has ceased to acquiesce!—Parkersburg Socialist.

Labor the Life of the Race

THE EMANCIPATION OF LABOR is essential to the freedom of humanity. The struggle for freedom is the history of the race; the fruit of the struggle, the development of man. The civilization of Egypt, Persia, Babylon, Rome, Greece, Assyria and other ancient nations, and the royal robbers and privileged parasites that ruled over them, had their day and passed away with the wretched slaves who built the pyramids and obelisks along the tracks of the early centuries of the race. The feudal nations of medieval Europe, whose lords and nobles inherited all the vicious and heartless characteristics of the ancient ruling class, especially their parasitic desdain and brutal contempt for their outraged slaves, have followed in the wake of their predecessors, and nothing remains but the memory of their bloody reign—the midnight horror of history. The working class may be robbed, tramped on, crushed, broken, sabered, imprisoned, shot full of jagged wounds, ''poor dumb mouths'' to bear witness to the crimes it has suffered, but its majestic march continues towards the sunrise. The master and slave, the lord and serf of past ages, are gone, and the capitalists and wageworkers of our day must soon follow them. It is the historic mission of labor to free the human race. To free itself is to free mankind. Labor is life. Society would perish without the working class. The degree of labor's servitude is the degree of society's tribulation, defeat and shame. There can be no morals in any society based upon the exploitation and consequent misery of the class whose labor supports that society. There can be no freedom while workers are in fetters. Wage servitude is fatal even to the true freedom of its most favored capitalistic beneficiaries. They may be surfeited with gold and power, but they are not free. They cannot sever the ties that bind them to their slaves and soar alone into the realms of freedom. It is written in the moral law with ''iron pen in the lead and rock forever'' that whosoever enslaves his fellow-man forges fetters for himself. When labor is emancipated, humanity will draw its first full and vitalizing breath of freedom. We are now in the transition period between individualism and collectivism; between brutality and brotherhood. Wealth will be for all; so easily obtained honestly that there will be no incentive to steal; and so abundantly that poverty will disappear; and ignorance, disease and crime will follow in their order. Profits and wages produce palaces for parasites and workhouses for workers. An awakening proletariat is pulsing with solidarity and turning its eyes towards the sunrise. Scarred and seamed are its rough and hardened features, and grim its determination, but no just man on earth need fear it. It has suffered a million crimes, but is animated by no spirit of revenge. Its mission of emancipation is darkened by no shadow of contemplated injury or injustice to its conquered enemy. It conquers that enemy but to free that enemy; and a victorious proletariat will celebrate the peace of the world.—Eugene Debs.

Socialism or Starvation

A NEW SERIES of figures by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the cost of living shows, as usual, the robbery underlying the wage system generally, and the utter absurdity of any hopes for the permanent improvement of working class conditions of life while it remains as the foundation of production and distribution.

The figures show that, while in 1896 the cost of the year's supply of food for the average working class family was $300 in the North Atlantic division of the country, it has been risen to $466 in 1912, or well over 50 per cent. That there has been no general increase of wages to that extent is only too evident. It is to be remembred that such places as Lawrence, Little Falls, Paterson and Passaic are in this division, and the figures bring out clearly the fact that the strikes in these places were fundamentally caused by liberal hunger. Wages of $6, $7 and $8 weekly, which thousands have been receiving, it is readily seen, fall far below the possibility of securing the physical minimum of food which these figures declare necessary, to say nothing whatever of rent, clothing and other necessary miscellaneous expenditures.

During the same period in the South Atlantic division the figures show an increase from $265 to $417; the North Central from $275 to $463; the South Central from $225 to $441, and the Western from $227 to $409; on the whole a general rate of increase in cost of living of far over 50 per cent. And, as stated, it is only too evident that wages have lagged painfully behind the rising cost of living in every portion of the country.

During this period, however, what is called the national wealth of the country has increased from approximately $75,000,000,000 to $130,000,000,000, or an increase of some 75 per cent, every dollar of which is the result of the labor of people, millions of whom have been starving while piling it up for others. Such is the result of the wage system, and never was its fraudulent character brought out more clearly and distinctly. That it means hunger in the midst of plenty is too palpable to be denied.

And during all these wretched years the official answer of capitalist authority to the demands of the hunger-stricken workers has taken the form of clubbing, shooting, smashing and jailing, and the infliction of every possible physical outrage. Capitalism cannot feed its slaves in the midst of their slavery, even when they are most productive. The more they produce, the less they get, for in these years between 1896 and 1912 the increase in the production of wealth has proceeded at a rate of rapidity never before approached in the history of the country. And let it be noted, too, that in this calculation no account is taken of unemployment, the assumption being that all are employed. The millions of idle workers during these years—leaving out of consideration those idle on account of strikes—if taken into account, would still further demonstrate the contention that capitalism and the hunger of the workers are inseparable.

Nothing has been done about the situation, and nothing will be done, or, in fact, can be done about it, while the wage system remains. The contemplated tinkering with the tariff, promised by the present administration, avails nothing, even if it went the entire length of free trade. England, a free trade country, has even more starving workers, proportionately, than the United States.

The wage system must go. It cannot distribute the wealth that is created by the workers. Cannot assure them enough for the barest physical maintenance, and the more they produce under it, the more their portion decreases, and nothing on earth or that can be devised by the mind of man can avail anything while the wage system remains.

The Socialists are the only people and the only political party that makes this demand, and every day the issue becomes clearer. It is Socialism or starvation. If the workers are to live, the wage system must die. There is no room for it and them. They must either get off the earth themselves or sweep the wage system from it. There is no other alternative possible.—Quarry Workers' Journal.

The Belgium Strike

THERE HAS BEEN CONSIDERABLE COMMENT in the press relative to the victory achieved by the strikers of Belgium. The comments have invariably been favorable to the strikers, and that is probably due to the fact, that the efforts of the strikers have been crowned with success. Had the strikers failed in their purpose and gone down to defeat, many journals would have been severe in their criticism and censure, but the success of the strike snatched from such journals the weapons of condemnation.

The strike in Belgium was a battle for manhood suffrage, and the solidarity of the workers forced the government to capitulate. Capitalism and the church constituted the government in Belgium, or in other words; the employers and the clerical fraternity were the power behind the throne.

The concessions wrested from the government has established the fact, that the working class, when united and guided by intelligence, can score victories that will ultimately lead to the complete emancipation of labor.

The strike in Belgium has been pointed to as the general strike or mass strike, and that craft and trade lines were obliterated by the hundreds of thousands of workers, who had decreed that their voice should have equal power with those elements in society that were arrayed against labor. It is true that the workers of Belguim knew no craft lines in their battle for manhood suffrage.

Under the supervision and teaching of the socialist party, they realized their class interests and moved by what they conceived to be their class interest, they stood together under one flag, until economic masters and clerical bosses retreated from the fortress of privilege and recognized the rights of common humanity.

The strike in Belgium was not the impulse of a moment, but for weeks and months, the laboring hosts had made preparations for the struggle.

The strikers were equipped with those sinews of war that made capitalism nervous, and the opponents of manhood suffrage, knowing that the strikers of Belgium had a treasury behind them that would feed men, women and children, reached the conclusion that "discretion was the better part of valor" and hoisted the white flag.

The workers of the world can learn lessons from the strikers of Belgium.

The Curse of Capitalism

THAT THE DOWNFALL of feudalism and the uprise of the capitalist to the command of industry and economic power, marked a gigantic stride in the evolution of human society no one will care to deny. Freed from all feudal restraints the productive forces of human society developed by leaps and bounds. The hand tool grew into a machine. Machines gathered together into huge factories, where, driven by huge engines, the productive power of labor was increased perhaps a hundred or a thousand fold. The puny stream of wealth that came forth as a result of the slow and primitive methods of the days of hand tools, became rapidly swollen into a raging torrent under the regime of capital with its power-driven machinery and its army of wage-slaves; a torrent that has poured its flood upon every shore until the markets of the world are chronically deluged with it.

Should proof be required to substantiate the assertions that the power of wealth production is now so great that it can at most be but partially utilized, it is but necessary to call attention to a few facts. Fully six million workmen are at present out of employment on this continent, and this number is continually being increased by still further curtailment of production. It is safe to say that fully one-fourth of the total working force is idle. It cannot be employed because the power of production is so great that those still in employment can keep the market fully supplied with all the goods that can be disposed of. One-fourth of the freight equipment of the railroads of the country is idle. Sixty per cent of the carrying power of the Great Lakes is tied up at the wharves. This means that a corresponding stagnation exists throughout the field of industry. It is well within the limit of safety to assert that at least one-fourth of the productive power of this continent is now out of commission. Though thousands perish from starvation in consequence, this power cannot be utilized under the present property regime until our capitalist masters may be assured of getting a profit out of its utilization.

The entire business world is now looking with hungry eyes to the coming harvest. From all reports the wheat crop will be a good one, and every capitalist pirate from the mammoth to the cockroach is licking his chops in sweet anticipation. Just what this presages for the farmer is not difficult to imagine. It is rather humorous to note the unanimity of opinion among the skinning fraternity that the good crop expected this year will bring relief from the present industrial depression, in spite of the fact that this depression came on after crops have been good each year "since the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary." What wise geezers these mortals be. The forthcoming crop will be swallowed up in the maelstrom of the market and scarcely afford as much as a flea-bite for the hungry capitalist horde that is lying in wait to pounce down upon it. After the scrimmage is over "Farmer Hayseed" will find himself picked as clean as a chicken made ready for market.

If this bitter experience is to be brought to an end and steps taken to prevent its repetition, the working class must rise to its mission of breaking the rule of capital and turning the productive forces of society to the satisfaction of human needs instead of allowing them to remain fettered to the purpose of production of profit.—Western Clarion.

The Dream of Socialism

By O. R. Washburn.

PEOPLE OFTEN REFER to Socialists as dreamers. They say our improved plan of managing industry cannot be made real. Well a good many dreams come true. Just go back a few generations. "Practical men" put the man who first planned a steam engine into an asylum; he went crazy after a while and died there. He was not crazy enough to say that a ship a thousand feet long could be flung through water a mile in three minutes, but he was a dreamer, and so was the man who wanted to use chain lightning to run street cars, and the man who said he could talk and be heard ten miles and the man who wanted to send messages under the Atlantic ocean and the man who wanted to send them through the air without wires and the man who thought he might look at his own bones through an oak blank, or fly in a machine heavier than air or prevent yellow fever and malaria, or drill an oil well a mile deep.

In art we have had our advance from the drawings on bone to the building of the Aeropolis. In literature we have had the advance from the fireside stories of peasants to the "Hertha" of Swinburne. In material science we have passed from the age of stone to the age of Edison, in world theories from the teachings of witch doctors to the teachings of Wallace. Men and women have dreamed and after them have come those who made the dream seem pale before the reality. Why shall not this be so in the ordering of human industry, in the giving of opportunity to the producers? On the Island of Patmos, John saw a heavenly city let down from Heaven by the hand of God. In the hope of that city to come, men were uplifted for almost two thousand years; holding the faith that it was to come but not knowing, after Paulism had swallowed the sociology Jesus taught, how it should come. Karl Marx, another prophet of God, alone, poor, despised and rejected of men, saw again that city celestial, that kingdom divine and human, the commonwealth of the just, the dwelling together of humanity in peace and truth, and with a loftier inspiration he worked out the way of its inevitable appearing. John the Revelator and Marx the Discerner of the Ways of Nations, did but voice and bring nearer a city which has been seen in some form by every true man and woman born into the world. So divine is man, so much of the Creator is in him, that he is not satisfied with any state not divine, not just, not fair to all the children of men. Socialism is the organized, living, acting, growing flesh of that divine idea; the militant and unconquerable body of the collective soul of humanity. As bones and muscles to the spirit of the man, so is the organization of Socialism to the united goodness of the world. That city celestial which John saw was but the type of all cities, of all rule and life for man which Jesus called the Kingdom and which Marx showed us how to attain. The message of Socialism is not of creeds but of justice, not of ceremonies but of freedom, not of the binding and hedging in of mankind but of the breaking of chains and the loosing of bonds and the making of a liberty which shall mean equality of opportunity for all born of woman. The priest who loves not man more than his church fears Socialism and he does well; for Socialism is militant humanity. The exploiter who thrives by withholding the portion of the producers fears Socialism and he does well, for when Socialism has come, exploitation shall be done away. The crafty who love to rule by cunning, making the people as cattle, fear Socialism and they do well, for Socialism is the organized movement of the common people to themselves rule the nations. Whatever is of vice, whatever is profiting by drunkenness, whatever thrives by theft, by murder, by conspiracies, by superstitions and by slaveries hates Socialism, for Socialism comes, not with a fan in its hands, but with naked hands to cleanse the earth of vermin and give it to man. Its banners are the banners of womanhood and childhood and manhood triumphant, of education made free, of homelife made pure, of love cleansed and vindicated, peace established forever and thorns made into kindling wood for hearth-fires where evening lamps show faces unfurrowed by the woes of poverty.

We come, not with compromises but with a message of a new order, of the city of Brotherhood in the Kingdom of United Mankind. Wherever an altar is raised in all sincerity it belongs to us.

Wherever art is true, industry free, homes dominated by love, Socialism has already triumphed in spirit. We offer no mere adjustment of finances, no mere six-hour day and an endless job with good pay; we offer this old world, with all its wounds and lies and kings and human foxes and worn mothers and anxious fathers and despairing girls and overworked boys, with all its sorrows and pains and tears, that Kingdom which Jesus foreknew, which the Hebrew prophets foresaw. We offer an era of unending years, with wealth for all and justice for all and for each that liberty which includes power to gain by toil the ability to go to and fro in the earth and see its wonders and delights, the power to dwell in beautiful homes, with art surroundings and art expression and science as an aid in daily tasks and disease mostly banished and crime made uncommon and the soul of man given the chance to find the best in itself. We offer to the people of earth cities that shall be clean and full of happiness, farm houses set amid fruits and flowers where drudgery shall not be common, villages with happy village life. We offer an age when there shall be enough for all, not only of beautiful homes and clothing and wholesome food, but of literature and painting and statuary and science, and for those who desire it, such worship, such music, such pure aspiration as the earth has not yet known.

Are these things too wonderful for you? Was not the steam engine too wonderful for the men who had not seen it, and the X-ray and the wireless telegraph and the electric light and the aeroplanes plunging through clouds a mile above the earth, alighting in the water like birds or fleeing before the winds of the dawn? Was the existence of radium possible until known? We have but to bring this thing! This city seen by John, this Kingdom seen by Jesus, this commonwealth seen by Marx is sure to arrive when we set ourselves to fulfill the demands of sociological science, as the steam engine was sure when men devoted themselves to its production. It is idle to say that we can organize mankind and have Socialism to a degree necessary to dig a Panama canal and can not have it to a degree sufficient to take care of all humanity. It is folly to say that we can create republics, armies, navies, universities, and can not organize humanity beyond these and establish a rule for the interests of all, as a rule in the interests of a few is now established.

We are the only people on earth, the Kingdom of God. All other organizations either support the existing kingdoms or are neutral in the great conflict. Each man may pray as he will and may hope as he will, and find God as he will, but all men are united in making the Kingdom of God real here on earth when they unite in the fellowship of comrades and work for Socialism. No loftier vision ever broke upon the mind of man, no plan of great minds was ever more practical or more sure to come when rightly struggled for. Nothing in human life is more possible than the coming of human development under which there shall be no more poverty nor exploitation nor starvation for toilers nor repression of pure aspiration, nor cruelty nor legal wrong. Out of the caves we came. Already we have builded the basis of a loftier civilization. It remains for us to unite, sacrifice, toil in one great disciplined, faithful army of comrades, and at the last, whether while we are sharing earth's struggles or not, the city celestial shall be builded and Socialism will have overcome the world.—Public Ownership.

The Good Green Earth

I sometimes sit and ponder o'er the stories I've been told, of mansions in the heavens and the shining streets of gold, and of the pearly gates they say are way up in the sky, where the chosen people enter when their time has come to die. And I often think that if the Lord will let me have my way, the hills of old Missouri are where I'd want to stay—I would rather wander in the vales of this green land of mine than walk the gilded boulevards where dazzling jewels shine. I do not hanker for the shores along the Jasper Sea—the Meramec and Gasconade look mighty good to me. For the earth is my sweet mother and I love her every scene—I would not trade for streets of gold her scented lawns of green. And even through the winter days, when snow lies o'er the glen, my soul would wait in patience till the springtime came again. I do not care for heav'nly harps and all the tinseled things—I'd rather listen while the thrush his simple carol sings. I would not feel at ease at all away beyond the sky—I'd feel far more at home, I know, to stay here when I die.—Melting Pot.

The quotations herein given are our appraisal of the market for copper, lead, spelter and tin based on wholesale contracts with consumers without distinction as to deliveries, and represent, to the best of our judgment, the bulk of the transactions, reduced to basis of New York, cash, except where St. Louis is specified as the basing point. The quotations for electrolytic copper are for cakes, ingots and wirebars. The price of electrolytic cathodes is usually 0.05 to 0.10c below that of electrolytic. We quote casting copper at 0.15c below the price for electrolytic. The quotations for lead represent wholesale transactions in open market for good ordinary brands, both desilverized and non-desilverized; the specially refined corroding lead commands a premium. The quotations on spelter are for ordinary western brands; special brands command a premium. Silver quotations are in cents per troy ounce of fine silver.—Engineering and Mining Journal of June 14.

LINES WRITTEN TO A PORTRAIT OF PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON, EXHIBITED IN THE PHOENIX LABOR TEMPLE.

By A Wage Worker.

Well, has the painter done his task? The intellectual brow, the countenance of nervous force, the scholar's air of searching challenge are faithfully depicted.

You have been given power to stand in high place and represent the millions of a land which is the melting pot of all the world The multitude awaits from you some token that will give them hope. The weary toilers who, for long, have paid tribute to the greed of a wasting, cruel system are hanging breathless on your every move.

I say you represent not us. Not for you is the rough road of democratic aspirations. Skilled hands of plutocracy shall hold for you the reins of power and guide the ponderous machinery of government.

The toilers' hopes are vain. To them your masters bid you cast the sop to fill their empty bellies for the nouce. To them you shall concede the triffle to becloud their minds and to distract them from the cunning use of usurped power. And these are good. From the pangs of disappointment there shall spring the growth of knowledge for the future.

You are the last of all your type that have held the land in trust for its despoilers. From behind your chair we strip the curtain that conceals the robbers from their victims. You are but the tool of forces that are doomed soon to be overthrown—stricken by the mighty power of conscious truth that is to pluck you from your place and cast you forth upon the nation's rubbish heap.

FIGHTING AGAINST HIGHER WAGES.

By Agnes Thecla Fair.

The United Laborers' Union, No. 711347, of San Francisco are holding protest meetings against a five dollar a day wage. They argue, and rightly so, that coming under the jurisdiction of the Western Federation would mean they would lose their long shovels and get shorter ones.

Some of the members also say that an increase from two seventy-five to four seventy-five would give most of the members heart disease and they might have to pay out all their funds in death benefits. San Francisco has been cursed with jurisdictional disputes. Some members of organizations going so far as to debate the question of the laundry girls painting their faces without getting permission from the Painters' union.

Shall we, who use a powder rag, get permission from the White Washers' union or does that come under the jurisdiction of the Rag Pickers' union.

Well, Brother Rough Necks, no doubt all would be well if your wages were raised from $2.75 a day to $2.78½ a day but four seventy-five a day is beyond the prosperity limit. Besides like the czar's boys who have a hundred and fifty holidays, you might not always be satisfied with only the Fourth of July. You might get wise enough to want from the whole month of July. Besides what would a working man do without work and you can't change human nature and a woman's place is in her home. You know you can't get everything at once—of course not. The fellow who wants work will not let you raise his wages in a hurry. All he wants is the picture on a Jack of some bull moose and he loves to look in the window of some A 1 restaurant to see his "Brother" King Capital daily carving the workers' goose. Let us turn to page 67 of Tillie Sunday's song book and sing, "There Shall Be Rejoicing as Long as There Are Sheep."

THE RALIROAD SLAUGHTER.

The figures given out by the safety appliance division of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to railroad accidents show a condition of affairs that is hideous. In twenty-four years, 188,037 persons were killed and 1,395,018 persons were injured. It is as if every inhabitant of a city the size of Columbus, Ohio, was slaughtered. The killed is greater than the total population of New Haven. It is twice as many people as live in Yonkers. An army of people twice the size of the population of the Bronx have been maimed during this period.

Some of the accidents, undoubtedly, were unavoidable. Most of them were. Through the reckless disregard of life at grade crossings, the railroads have slaughtered thousands. Through the demands for speed, railroad employés have been forced to take chances, and this often leads to disaster. Through refusal to add all possible safety appliances, trainmen by the thousand have been killed or mutilated. Through "economy" in keeping roadbeds in proper repair and equipment up to the best possible mark, accidents without number have occurred.

All these things are the fault of the railroad management. It would cost money to make the needed changes, and, as money is also needed for dividends, it is inevitable that as much money as possible will be devoted to dividends.

The inquiry into the Stamford wreck has brought out a curious attitude of mind on the part of some of the officials. They seem to believe they are hoodooed, that there is some malign spirit pursuing them.

This superstition is quite natural, for the New Haven road has had a series of great "misfortunes," not the least of which in the minds of its directors is the decline of its stock from over 200 to less than 100. Damage suits without number have been pressed against it. Rolling stock has been smashed and apparently replaced with equipment quite as bad as that which was destroyed, for the New Haven has an unlimited supply of worthless junk. It has been held up to scorn and has been berated as no other road has been. No wonder, then they think God is angry with them.

Yet, the figures of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that other roads are equally guilty. The New Haven is only one of many murder roads. All of them have as their object the creation of dividends, and all of them alike push the quest for dividends far beyond the limits of safety.

Every seven minutes a person is either killed or injured on the railroads. They are almost as fatal as tuberculosis itself. When it is considered that the injuries received often consist of the loss of limbs or cause total disability, the full cost of humanity of allowing the roads to remain in private hands will be understood.

State ownership of the roads would not elimniate all accidents. Tremendous weights are moved over the roads at enormous speed, and millions of people travel on them. But state ownership will bring the roads up to the greatest possible perfection. The railroad managers claim that if the laws were always complied with, and if the equipment of steel cars, the most scientific form of signaling and the abolition of grade crossings were brought into effect, the roads would be financially ruined. They have made this claim over and over again, and have resisted every attempt to compel them to bring equipment into shape.

The outcome of such a policy is seen in the figures of deaths and accidents that are given by the commission. These appalling totals are due in a measure to the race for dividends. The dead and the wounded help to earn the dividends of which the railroads have been so proud.

After the accident it is usually the custom to blame the engineer. Railroad men are like all others in their desire to live. Their occupation prevents them from being unusually reckless. They are highly skilled. If conditions weer right, there would be far fewer accidents. But conditions are not right, and will not be right until the roads are taken out of the hands of the stock gamblers and ownership is vested in the whole people. Then the roads will not be run to produce dividends. It would not matter if they lost money. It is better to lose money than lose lives. At present the roads make money at the sacrifice of thousands of lives and the mutilation of tens of thousands of human beings.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS LETTER.

A SYNOPSIS OF FACTS RELATING TO THE WORLD'S TRADE UNION MOVEMENT.

Issued by the International Secretariat of National Trade Union Centers. (Affiliated Membership Over 7,000,000.)

Berlin S.O. 16, Engelufer 15 (Germany) May 30th 1913.

The French Miners.

The question of the state pension fund has brought about a lamentable split in the French miners' organization. During the discussion in Parliament, of the pension fund for miners, Basly, the leader of the north country miners proposed an amendment which would have given the mining companies the right to add special features to the compulsory insurance. Albert Thomas and the miners' congress itself, which, by the way, is under the influence of the revolutionary wing, raised a strong opposition to this proposition, fearing that if same became law it would prove itself a great danger to the miners, curtailing their liberty, and threatening their right to strike. As the so-called moderates of the north adopted Basly's view the Miners' Federation proceeded to establish dual organizations and accepted them into the federation. The old organizations protested in vain, and were themselves excluded from the federation by the congress which took place recently, on account of their adherance to Basly. This meant a great loss to the federation, seeing that the strongest and best financed of their affiliated organizations were involved. The "old" trade unions held their congress recently which was attended by 122 delegates representing 105 branches. Basly was again elected one of the executives, without the difference with the federation having been discussed at any great length. The congress decided in favor of a general strike in case of the passing of the pension laws being further delayed in Parliament.

Co-operative Societies in England.

According to the report of the Federation of Co-operative Societies submitted to the congress held in Aberdeen at Whitsuntide, 1,520 co-operative societies existed at the end of the year 1912, of which number 1,512 societies report a total membership of 2,876,892. The year's turnover amounted to over £122,000,000 and the profit to over £13,000,000. The English Co-operative Wholesale Society, with its 1,162 branches had a turnover of about £3,000,000, with a profit of £700,000. The Scotch Co-operative Society made a profit of £325,000 on a turnover of over £8,000,000. The Co-operative Productive Society and the Co-operative Wholesale Society produced goods to the value of over £13,000,000, while the goods produced by the Co-operative Provision Stores amounted to £8,250,000 in value; 760 co-operative societies have children's penny banks with a total balance in hand of £1,600,000.

America. The president of the First National bank declared in a report that his bank had paid a total interest of 18,550% on the invested capital since 1873 when he first came into the presidency. The profits of this bank are so enormous that the existing capital was in 1901, raised from $500,000 to $10,000,000, the shareholders being granted shares to the value of nine and a half million dollars as extra dividend. Huge dividends are now being paid on this very much watered capital. A law has come into force in California restoring the franchise rights to women who have married foreigners. The old voting laws had deprived them of this right.

Martial Law in Bosnia.

The population of Austria was again recently threatened with war, and martial law was declared in Bosnia, which is a frontier country. According to the special orders issued upon this occasion the regulations concerning passports became very strict. Landlords and landladies, lodging houses, employers and private persons were requested to advise the military authorities immediately upon the arrival of any travelers. The movements of the people of certain districts, and of individual persons were restricted at the will of the authorities. All political clubs or clubs reputed to be of a political nature, including trade unions, workers gymnastic clubs and choral societies were dissolved, and the members strictly forbidden to participate in the affairs of the same. Many other societies were closed "till further orders," among which was the Railwaymen's union. No meetings or conferences were allowed to take place without the consent of the authorities. The press was forbidden the slightest mention of the position of Austria or of her allies. Newspapers could only be issued between the hours of 12 noon and 9 o'clock in the evening, and had to be submitted to the censor at least six hours before publication. It was further ordered that: "In the case of a certain number of a periodical being confiscated it is forbidden to conspicuously describe the re-issue as 'the second number of a confiscated number' or to leave the confiscated part blank in the new edition; such a space must not be filled up in a conspicuous manner." All printed matter coming from abroad was subjected to scrutiny as well as the whole of the correspondence of private persons. Telegrams could only be written in certain languages. Telephonic communication between the various towns was completely cut off. Any person possessing arms, ammunition or explosives, had to deliver same up to the military authorities within three days. All private individuals were placed under martial law. This will give some idea of what the working community of so-called civilized lands may expect when the country is under the shadow of a war. From the before mentioned facts it is almost natural to imagine that the labor temple, the beautiful trade union house, was taken possession of by the police, or rather the military authorities. Far from being directed against the "enemy," the repressive measures taken at the beginning of a war are directed against the people itself. This should be enough to turn the most obdurate against the cravings of "murder patriotism." Although the lesson is a dear one it is nevertheless a lesson.

Journalists' Strike in New York.

A unique strike occurred in New York recently which gave the people plenty to talk about. It was, as a matter of fact, the strike of the journalists in the Jewish quarter of the town. American newspapers generally have a much larger staff of journalists than the newspapers of the European countries. The journalistic staff of three of the four papers printed in the so-called jargon-Hebrew language went on strike. The fourth paper, belonging to the "Socialist Forwards," with its circulation of 170,000 copies, conceeded to all the demands of the strikers after the strike had lasted a short time. The strike was brought about on the one side, by the absolutely desperate straits of the editorial staff, which vividly contrasted with the affluence of the publishers; and on the other side by the domineering conduct of the latter. It is characteristic of these news writers to have combined in secret organizations for fear of being victimized, and then to have made the publishers aware of this after two years, when they thought they were strong enough to take up the fight. In conjunction with the Italian and certain English journalists in New York they form a separate "local" of the Typographers' union. The Italians first put forward their demands with the most telling results, inasmuch as all the Italian newspapers, with the exception of one, conceeded to these demands without a strike being resorted to. The Jewish publishers, flatly refused to negociate with the organization so that a fight was inevitable. The circumstances attending the strike were all the more astonishing as the journalists, generally so individual in their actions, displayed admirable solidarity and self-sacrifice. They could not, however, prevent the newspapers from appearing, as the editors-in-chief who did not strike simply published old numbers anew, or pirated foreign papers in a most barefaced manner. For reasons as yet unknown, the Typographers' union did not cause the compositors to take part in the strike as had been demanded by the strikers. The strike had unfortunately not a very satisfactory issue. All that has been obtained is that the publishers have negotiated indirectly with the organization, and that nobody shall be victimized on account of his having taken part in the strike. One step forward has certainly been made, and that is that the journalists have at last practically demonstrated their willingness and ability to use trade union weapons.

Anti-Strike Legislation in Peru.

On Jan. 27th a presidential decree came into force in Peru, dealing with the way in which strikes are to be conducted. The chief points are as follows: The workmen of all industrial establishments are to elect in January of each year, by secret ballot, three delegates who shall represent the workmen of the establishments in placing their demands before the employers. Should an employer refuse to discuss the written demands presented by the workmen's delegates, he may within 24 hours, appoint one or more arbitrators, who, in conjunction with a similar number to be appointed by the workmen, shall settle the controversy. If the arbitrators' decision is accepted by both sides, it must be communicated to the chief of police and remain in force not less than six months. The police authorities shall officially recognize strikes, when such strikes have been declared consequent upon the employer failing to appoint his arbitrators in time, or when more than four days have elapsed without the arbitrators having issued their decision. Strikes may only be declared with the assent of at least three-quarters of the number of workers employed as ascertained by means of secret ballot. A list of the names and addresses of the workers on strike must be deposited with the police by the workmen's delegates. When strikes have begun, they may only continue by a fresh vote being taken every four days and with the assent of an absolute majority. If a majority of workmen reject the proposal for a strike, those willing to work are to be protected by the authorities, who will treat as common delinquents all who either individually or collectively attempt to bar the free course of commerce or labor. Strikers are prohibited from forming headquarters and public demonstrations are also forbidden, except in the form prescribed by law. Should employers decide to close their establishments in consequence of differences with their work people they are required to notify their intention to the chief of police, stating reasons for, and probable duration of such closure, giving the list of the persons thrown out of employment. The same decree contains a clause to the effect that, from Feb. 1st, a department for teh compilation of labor statistics, under regulations to be issued shortly, will be instituted at the office of the chief of police at Lima. It seems to us that it would have been better to convert the whole of Peru into a prison; but the foreign capitalists in their craving after dividends would not be able to draw such profits from "chained labor" as from "free labor." And yet there are continually efforts being made to beguile emigrants from Europe to such a semi-barbarous land.

The German Printers.

Of the 74,000 workers employed in the German printing trade, 67,273 belong to the Printers' union. There is also a "Chirstian" organization, which in spite of all the efforts of its spiritual patrons numbers only 3,296 members. The national tariff agreement entered into with the employers of the whole of Germany is valid until the year 1916, and covers 70,000 workers. The employers have, during the last few years, formed a strike fund, into which they must pay a certain sum per week for every employé. The idea of the scheme is to fortify themselves against possible new demands on the part of the workers. But the men's federation is not idle, for its central funds increased from £445,000 to £488,500, with another £150,000 in the branch funds, during the last year. The subscription is now 1-2½ per week, exclusive of local subscriptions which often amount to -8½d per week. The union paid £140,000 for different financial assistance last year, of which amount £57,500 went in unemployment pay. The total yearly income amounted to £149,500.

Canadian Labor Legislation 1912.

The numerical influence of the various provincial parliaments of Canada is not very great, and one cannot help noticing to what a great extent the growing power of the workers' organizations is making itself felt in parliamentary circles.

In the province of Quebec boys of twelve years of age could formerly be employed in factories. The age was later raised to thirteen years, and afterwards to fourteen. For the safety of the miners it was ordered that no person of less than 20 years of age may be placed in charge of passenger hoists. Explosives may only be stored in special magazines at least 400 feet from the works, or any public highway. Special instructions have been drawn up relative to the use of explosives in mines. The ladder way used by workers, etc., must be quite separate from the shaft used for the hoisting of materials.

In the province of Sasketchewan the scope of the boilers' act has been increased and same now applies to all boilers generating more than 20 h. p. No person can be appointed boiler inspector unless he is a British subject, has had four years experience as a machinist, and holds the necessary certificates. In case of a boiler explosion a report must at once be sent by wire, to the minister of public works, who has to institute a thorough investigation. By an amendment to the workmen's compensation act, every accident must be reported in detail on a special form to the Bureau of Labor. By an amendment to the antiquated and monstrous employers' threashing act, employés are given 20 instead of 10 days in which to serve their claims on employers for work done. An act passed during the last session of the Legislature, prohibits the employment of white women by Japanese, Chinese, or other orientals. An amendment passed during the session under review confines this prohibition to the Chinese.

A law has come into force in British Columbia prohibiting any unauthorized person from conducting an employment agency, and also prescribing a maximum fee. A license holder must not take employés as lodgers, nor have any share or interest in the conducting of a lodging house for employés. A revision of the laws concerning labor conditions is pending, as a royal commission has been engaged for some time in looking into this matter, and making such suggestions as are deemed necessary. From a preliminary report published by the secretary of this commission we have gathered some details of general interest. In a great number of places the investigations on the part of the commission, which is composed of representatives of both employers and men, have been completed and it has been agreed on all sides, that a compulsory workmen's compensation act is absolutely necessary. The workers' organizations further demand a minimum wage of four dollars per eight-hour day for unskilled labor. The farmers contend that such a wage would ruin them. Farm laborers are now getting $25 to $40 per month with board, when engaged by the year. During a busy season $3 per day, with board, appears to be the ordinary rate, with no definite restrictions as to hours. The employment of Oriental labor is continually on the increase. In logging camps and saw mills, the hours amount to ten or more per day, and the pay for white men to $2.50 or $3 per day; the wages for Orientals is often considerably less. White men have almost entirely been driven out of the fishing industry, as same is in the possession of the Japanese and Indians. The cannories are manned by the Chinese, who are also employed in considerable numbers in the coal mines. Hindus are employed largely in timber piling. The domestic servants in all parts are almost exclusively Chinese. Six thousand Chinamen enter the country yearly, so the government has a direct interest in the employment of Asiatics, who must pay a tax of one dundred pounds per head when entering the country. This brings in an annual income of over £400,000, half of which goes into the provincial treasury. The Asiatics are, of course, without political rights. Fortunately there have been increasing indications that the Asiatic will not suffer themselves to be used as wage cutters. But for the present the preference shown them by the employers, and the great mistrust in which they are held by the white workers, is bound to give rise to much friction yet.

A Central Union of Transport Workers in Belgium.

A conference of the representatives of the dock workers, transport workers and seamen, took place in Brussels at Whitsuntide. Representatives of the trade union national centers were also present. The object of the conference was to make preparations for the amalgamation of the aforementioned unions to the Central Unions of Transport Workers. An amalgamation scheme has been agreed upon, and a list of general regulations drawn up, providing for three classes of contributions: –.6½d, –.5d, and –2½d per week. Of these amounts, –.4d, –.3d, and –.2d shall be credited to the central fund, which shall be responsible for the granting of sick pay, legal protection, death benefit, strike pay, unemployment pay, etc. It is hoped that the central union will be able to commence operations on the 1st of July with a membership of some 6,500, among which are to be found workers of the most widely different branches of the transport trades, by water and by land.

The Hungarian Trade Union in 1912.

According to the yearly report of the Hungarian National Center the number of members of all affiliated trade unions rose from 95,180 to 111,966 in the last year, although the year's average was not more than 103,807. The disturbing influences of the war have been felt very much by the trade union, whose development has been very much retarded on account of same. The increase in membership of 16,786 or 18% of the total number is therefore very gratifying. The women members number 6,508, or 5.8% of the total number. Fifty-four per cent of the Hungarian trade unionists live in Buda Pest. The total income of the organization amounted to 84,041 pounds in 1911, as compared with 97,208 in 1912, which amounts included £66,106 and £76,208 respectively representing membership subscriptions. The expenditure rose from £73,621 to £91,708 in the last two years which sum included £15,125 for unemployment pay, £10,292 for sick pay, £5,375 for widows and orphans, and invalids' assistance, and £5,917 for other financial assistance. Fifty-three organizations have given their reports upon their respective labor exchanges, which exchanges received applications for work from 58,590 unemployed as compared with 46,380 in the previous year, and which were able to find employment for 80% of the male workers, and 95% of the women applicants.

Whitsuntide Conferences of the Swiss Trade Unions.

One hundred delegates, representing 63 branches took part in the congress of the Swiss textile workers' union which was held at Zurich, Whitsuntide. Representatives of the International Federation were also present. The town and district of Zurich made a special grant to permit of suitable preparations being made for the congress. The delegates and general meeting of the Swiss Typographical union met in the new home of the union, in Berne. Nearly 2,000 members, from all parts of the land were assembled on that occasion.

Thirty delegates, representing 17 sections took part in the Bookbinder's congress, at which the representatives of the German and Austrian unions were present. An old age and invalid fund, with a weekly special subscription of 2d per member was decided upon; the amount of financial assistance to be 6/8 per week. The appointment of a salaried secretary was also agreed to. The Union of Swiss Messengers held a meeting of delegates in Montrou at which 38 members representatives from 25 telegraph offices were present. It was agreed to petition against the decision of the directors who had refused a reduction of the 10-hour day. Furthermore a number of demands are to be put forward concerning conditions of employment and rates of pay. Berne was selected as headquarters, while Basil was chosen as the next meeting place. The Union of Swiss Stokers and Machinists which numbers 2,050 members in 44 sections, held a meeting in Biel which was attended by 60 delegates. The death fund of the union showed a balance in hand of 1,000 pounds. A proposition to affiliate with the trade union federation was rejected. The 25th congress of the Swiss Railway and Steamship Employés Society took place in Lucerne. The society numbers 1,300, and has 110 local branches.

Women Workers and the International Report on the Trade Union Movement.

The annual reports of the various trade union centers, which are compiled by the International Secretariat, afford a valuable review of the developments and achievements of the women's organizations in all parts of the world. One of their shortcomings, however, appears to be the lack of sufficient data dealing with the organization of women workers.

Only the German, Austrian and Swiss National Centers have quoted the number of women workers organized in their respective unions, while the Hungarian and Dutch centers merely have added a few remarks showing that their unions do organize women workers. The remaining 13 trade union centers figuring in the volume covering the year 1911, have given no information as to whether women workers are organized, and to what degree they are participating in the general labor movement.

There can be no question as to the absolutely pressing necessity of the organizing of female, as well as male workers; it is, of course, well known that great efforts are being made in every country to arouse the women workers and make them take their part in the industrial battles of today.

It would, therefore, prove all the more interesting and valuable if we could see from the international reports what progress women workers are making in the trade union field of action. Such facts would be most useful for propaganda purposes and would probably enable us to profit by the lessons learned abroad. The importance of organizing women workers will be readily recognized if we follow the rapid growth of the number of workers in all branches of industry, as this increase in the number of female workers employed must necessarily make it more difficult for the men to improve their general conditions so long as their female competitors are not equally organized. Every active trade-unionist must therefore try to push the organization of women workers.

The number of females employed in useful occupations in the various countries is as follows:

	Year.	Total number of women.	Percentage of women to men.
Germany	1907	9,492,881	45.5
Austria	1900	5,684,984	51.5
Hungary	1900	2,885,235	45.1
Russia	1897	5,276,112	24.9
Italy	1901	5,284,064	50.1
Switzerland	1900	1,556,577	46.9
France	1906	4,693,412	53.3
Spain	1900	1,351,792	39.9
Belgium	1900	948,229	45.9
Holland	1900	433,546	37.8
Denmark	1901	352,947	44.9
Sweden	1900	551,021	38.41
Norway	1900	277,613	39.5
Great Britain	1901	5,309,900	44.9
United States	1900	5,329,802	38.4

These figures of course, do not give an adequate idea of the importance of female competition because the census upon which same are based is not taken for the same year in all countries, and besides this, conditions are changing very rapidly today. It is, unfortunately, impossible to compare these figures with the number of women workers organized in the trade unions, but they certainly prove that female competition has to be taken into account in every country, and that it is absolutely necessary to organize the women workers as well, thereby removing the employers' chance of making them undercut the wages established by the men. It would be a most useful addition to our international reports of the executive officers of our national centers, replying to the International Secretariat, were to lay particular stress upon the organization of women workers in their countries and give figures and details appertaining to their methods and achievements; thus enabling their sister organizations in other lands to profit by their experiences.

Brief Labor Notes from All Countries.

Great Britain. The Co-operative Society Congress in Aberdeen has declared against union with the labor party, as had been suggested by the central board some time ago, by 1,358 votes to 580. In 1901 the English postoffice had 137,807 male, and 35,372 female workers in its employ, against 166,073 males and 46,741 females in the year 1911. In consequence of the telephone system being taken over the postoffice the number of employés has considerably increased. The General Workers' Union decided at its recent congress to affiliate with the labor and the Trade Union Congress. The number of members has risen from 17,000 to 21,000. The Clerks 'union increased its membership from 4,000 to 12,000 in the past year. It was agreed at a recent congress to take a vote for the purpose of deciding whether they should identify themselves with the labor party, as prescribed in the trade union regulations. The Congress of the Grocers' Assistants' Union, which recently took place at Leeds, strongly opposed the system of affiliated business and co-operative provision societies, as being detrimental to the interests of the employés. In consequence of the recent succesful wages movement on the part of the hotel and restaurant employés, who in several hotels and restaurants forced the proprietors to make new regulations in regard to working time, etc., the employers have now established a strong "defense organization." They are publishing a black list of all employés who participated, either directly or indirectly in the strike, hoping to put an end to the union. The London Trade Union Federation and the Trades Council have afforded the hotel employés every possible support in their fight against the "black lists." The editor of the Russian Seamen's Trade Union Journal has been arrested in Egypt, and transported to Russia in spite of the great protest movement in England. The English government says that it was powerless to prevent this, as Egypt is not an "English possession." The labor party will call upon the government to answer for this scandalous breach of the rights of hospitality. All that can be urged against the extradited editor is, that he tried to organize his Russian brothers in distress.

Holland. According to a wages statistics of the Dutch Typographers' Union, which has a membership of 3,709, the weekly wages of 834 workers amounted to less than 9-10 florins, for 257; 10-11 fl. for 309; 11-12fl. for 291; 12-13 fl. for 457; 13-14 fl. for 305; 14-15 fl. for 456; 15-16 fl. for 462; 16-17 fl. for 151; 17-18 fl. for 81; 18-19 fl. for 53 members. and more than 19 florins for 53 members, (1 florin equals 1/8¼d.) In an interesting article about trade union tactics the Metals Union exposes the fiasco of the so-called Syndicalist methods, which are opposed to high subscriptions the principle of financial assistance, and centralization, etc. Up to the year 1906, i. e., for 19 years this union had itself been a devotee to the syndalistic methods and the highest membership reached was 700. Since 1906 this union has belonged to the modern centralized organizations and now numbers 4,500 members. During this time the membership of the Syndicalist Federation, the policy of which had remained as before, rose from 250 to 500. The influence of the two organizations upon wage and working conditions naturally corresponds to their respective number and methods. According to the latest reports the number of members in the trade unions affiliated to the National Center was 66,716 on the 1st April this year, which members are organized in 33 unions and 772 branches. The number for the 1st January was 61,504, and for the 1st of October, 56,383.

Russia. It is reported from Alexandria that the leader of the Russian seaman—Unions of the Black Sea, Sea of Azov mercantile fleet—the editor of the trade journal "Morjak" (seaman) has been arrested at the instigation of the Russian government. As each consulate is invested with a certain independent authority, where his own countrymen are concerned, it was feared that this editor ("Karl" is his pseudonym) would be extradited. The trade unions in Alexandria applied by telegraph to the English prime minister, and his appeal caused a great sensation in England.

Switzerland. The movement on the part of the tailors in the early part of this year ended successfully for the agitators. In seven towns strikes were resorted to. The strike in Winterthur lasted 37 days, in Interlaken 35, Zurich 33, Chur 16, Bern 10, Chaum de Fonds 9. and Davos 7 days. Strikes were averted in Zurich and Bern through the intervention of the town concilliation board. The workers (men's tailors and uniform tailors) obtained an increase of from 4% to 8%, and in some places a reduction in the working time, through the wages movement and sectional strikes. The Congress of the Stone Workers and Potters' Union, which was held in Biel, decided upon an increase in the contributions for the strengthening of the strike funds, as well as a yearly inquiry into the wages and labor conditions. A proposition for the amalgamation with the other building workers unions was referred to the general committee. Representatives from Germany and Italy attended the congress. The Swiss Engine Drivers and Stokers' Union held their congress at Hutwill recently. The union decided in favor of common action with all railway unions for the revision of the working regulations, the pension laws, and the financial assistance funds. The Parliament to be appealed to in respect to the ever increasing exploitation of the men, with the inevitable ruination of health which follows in the wake of such conditions. The Train Employés Union (guards, etc.) held their general meeting in Thun recently which was attended by 106 delegates. The congress was not satisfied with the revision of the regulations for additional pay which took place last year. A new revision should therefore be demanded. The delegates expressed a wish that no attention should be paid to the yellow societies which still exist among the railway workers. The mad economy of the Metropolitan railway was the subject of bitter complaint, as it is more than probable that the large number of accidents which take place on this railway is attributable to same. The union numbers 3,260 members and commands funds to the amount of £12,320. The dyers of Basil, Zurich, and Thalwill have entered into a tariff movement, as no tariff agreements have been concluded between them and the employers during the last six years. They demand that the apprentices be brought under definite working regulations, a minimum wage of 25.– for laborers, 30.– for artisans, 33.– for dyers, and 17.6 for women workers; in addition to this a nine-hour day. The strike is, in the meanwhile, broken out as the employers would vouchsafe no answer whatever to the petition presented by a portion of the workers, and, what is more, demanded the installation of strike breakers at Crefeld in the Rhine district, where a strike of the dyers is at present taking place.

Spain. The Federation of Printers held their second congress in May. The following extracts are from a report of the secretary. The union has at present 23 local branches, seven more than last year. Barcelona can show 268 organized printing workers, Valencia comes next with 154, Madrid, the capital, has only 69, and Vigo 96. Concerning the conditions of labor, the nine-hour day prevails. The eight-hour day obtains in two places only viz.: Jerez and Malaga. The wages very as much as from 10d to 5.10d per day, according to the place and the kind of work. A strike took place in Barcelona in 1912 in which 143 organized workers took part. The printing trade had not yet a central union of its own. The art printers in Barcelona have appealed to their employers for several concessions, the most important of which is the eight-hour day. The Catholic Trade Union Society has succeeded in opening its own trade union house in Barcelona.

Belgium. The congress of the Metal Workers took place in Brussels and was attended by 75 delegates representing 30,877 members. The printers held their congress in Ghent, at which 19 local branches were represented. Some of these organizations belong to the National Center of Trade Unions, but is was decided once more that the whole federation should not become affiliated to the National center. The sections of female workers were refused admission into the federational.

Holland. The Union of Commercial and Office Employés, which shortly held its general meeting, numbered on an average 1,350 members last year. The Union of Postoffice and Telephone Employés numbered 899 in 1912, as compared with 647 in the previous year. The Carpenters' Union held its congress in Utrecht. This union now numbers 4,900 members as compared with 3,730 at the beginning of the year 1912.

Norway. A national tariff agreement for bakers has just been concluded. Same applies to nine towns with 800 workers. The minimum wage is raised by amounts ranging between 2/3 and 5/7½ and the working time reduced from 63 to 57 hours per week; 9 hours per day on the first five days and 11 hours per day on Saturday. This important reduction in working time was obtained chiefly through the minister of commerce, who showed that he was prepared to advocate legislation to deal with the matter. The Norwegian Parliament accepted a proposition of the government to establish a special social department in the ministry. This decision corresponded with the conditions laid down by the present Minister of Commerce Casperg, when he entered the ministry; Casperg is the leader of the Labor Democratic party.

Sweden The Swedish paraliament has adopted a proposition for old age and invalidity insurance by a great majority, according to which everybody except the officials is to be insured. Insured persons will be divided into four classes, occording to their income. In the case of incomes of less than £ 28 the insurance contribution would be 3/4½d per year, for incomes of £28 to £45, 5/7½d; £45 to £67-10 9/–; for higher incomes 14-7½d; per year. The employers are exempted from paying contributions. The insurance scheme is a really bureaucratic one, as it is managed by government officials. The amount of pension to be allowed will be fixed in the first instance, by officials elected from that district in which the pensions are to be paid. The benefit paid for by the subscription is only granted in the case of total disablement, or upon reaching the age of 67. The yearly pension for men amounts to 30% of the amount paid in, for women 24%. The state adds a further sum of £9-9 for men and £7-17-6 for women. If a pensioner has a private income of over £2-16 per year, the latter amount is deducted from the amount of additional pension granted by the state; so that if a pensioner has a private income of £16-7-6 he is no longer entitled to the state contribution to his pension. The bill does not provide for any means of prevention of invalidity, so that one of the most important demands of modern insurance remains disregarded.

Germany. The Union of Coppersmiths now numbers 5,256 members in 100 branches, against 4,445 in the year 1910. It is the only union in the metal industry that has refused to amalgamate with the Metal Workers' Union. The union of Hotel Workers has raised its membership from 15,918 to 16,542 (including 1,144 women workers). Among the latter number are 7,762 hotel and restaurant waiters, 2,112 café waiters, 267 cooks, and 3,101 hotel porters and boots etc. The union conducted 268 wages movements affecting 6,401 workers during the last year. An advance in wages aggregating £870 was obtained for 4,914 persons; a very surprising result for a calling whose trade union work, extending over many years has previously been without any visible success. In addition to the increase in wages, collective agreements were concluded for 4,477 person. The funds of the union amount to £10,300. The tariff agreement is an institution of which the wood workers avail themselves to the utmost. The following table will give some idea of the development of the collective agreement idea in the German Wood Workers' Union!

Year.	Number of tariff agreements.	Works involved.	Number of workers coming under the agreements.
1907	454	11,039	93,643
1908	455	10,259	85,699
1909	493	11,251	92,260
1910	679	11,007	113,602
1911	948	13,699	132,025
1912	1,095	14,336	144,656

The number 144,656 includes 86,145 carpenters, 1,729 brush makers, 2,820 turners, walking stick and umbrella makers 464, button makers 710, comb makers 228, basket makers 1,032, piano makers and musical instrument makers 5,264, chair makers 1,999, polishers 5,406, pattern makers 820, ships carpenters 187, parquet workers 874, gilders 1,976, machine workers and sawyers, box makers 2,365, cork cutters 345, laborers and sundry 8,202, wheelwrights 2,148, Pattern makers 25, women workers 6,744.

Germany. The Workers' Gymnastic Federation, in reviewing its 20 years of existence, reports that it now numbers 200,000 members and possesses a newspaper which is published twice monthly. This journal, which is called the "Workers' Gymnastic News," and which includes special illustrated supplements for women gymnasts and physical culture printed on art paper, now has 118,000 regular subscribers. This federation will, in the near future, publish a special "Journal for the Young," which will also be a general sports paper. The federation has a fine house of its own in Leipzig, which cost £30,000. The development of the union is especially gratifying, taking into account that the anti-labor organizations in conjunction with the official authorities have at all times exerted every possible effort to break up the home of the Workers' Gymnastic Union. The result of the great movement in the building industry, which has now ended peacefully is reviewed in the Building Workers' Journal "The Foundation Stone" (Grundstein). The following are a few particulars taken from same: 35,698 workers receive an increase of 3 pfennigs per hour; 55,442 an increase of 4 pfgs.; 45,951, 6 pfgs.; 94,226 5 pfgs.; 24,684, 7 pfgs.; 10,983, 8 pfgs.; 1,360, 9 pfgs; 3,362, 10 pfgs.; and 1,340, 12 pfgs. per hour. The average increase for the 273,044 fellow workers throughout the country amounts to 5.11 pfennigs per hour (8 pfgs. equal 1d) while 51,000 workers will benefit by a shortening of the working hours. The building workers have to thank their solid organization, which last year numbered 335,561 members, with funds amounting to £780,000, i. e. 47/– per member, that a strike was avoided.

Austria. The first congress of the restaurant workers has taken place in Vienna. The union rose in membership from 1,134 to 1,984; the funds from £136 to £480. The fortnightly journal will shortly include a Polish supplement. It was decided to vigorously strive for the introduction of a law controlling the conditions of hotel and restaurant employés. The bad effects of the war are making themselves more and more felt. As a consequence twelve boot factories in which 3,000 workers were employed were closed down in Skutsch, with the result that the men have been thrown out of employment. The murderer of the social democrat, M. P. Schumeile, who is a member of the Christian Social party, has been condemned to death. It is now reported that the murdered man's family will interceed on his behalf. The murderer's name is Kunschak. The congress of the Chemical Workers was attended by 119 delegates. The chief question discussed were those dealing with organization, and the precautionary measures to be taken for the protection of the workers; there is still much to be desired in this direction at present. Ninety-one delegates attended the congress of the carpenters. This union has increased its membership from 6,969 to 8,113 in the last two years, and the total funds to £9,680. The congress decided in favor of an amalgamation with the Masons' Union, and will enter into negotiations to this end. A friendly settlement has been arrived at in respect to the tariff movement in the Austrian building industry, which has lasted six months, and in which 150,000 workers were involved. The new contracts cover a period of three years, and provide for substantial increases in wages. The nine-hour day was attained in Vienna, and in the other parts of the land a shortening of the working time and other improvements were affected. Martial law, as well as the prohibition placed on several organizations have now given way to normal conditions in Bosnia.

Hungary. The Hungarian Tailors' Union was involved in 44 wages movements in 24 towns during the last year, in which 7,397 male and 654 female workers were involved. Three lockouts, involving 1,130 workers must be included in the number of wages movements. Of those taking part, 7,646 received an aggregate daily increase in wages of £124.15, and a reduction of the working time aggregating 1,357 hours, daily.

Rumania. A law which has recently come into force in Rumania provides for compulsory state sickness, accident, old age, and invalid insurance. This insurance scheme is drawn up on the lines of the scheme already in force in Germany, but all costs of management will be defrayed by the state. All contributions for sick insurance to be paid the workers, those for accidents by the employer, whilst the costs of old age and invalid insurance are to be borne by the workers, the state, and the employers, in equal proportions.

Australasia. The postoffice and telegraph employés have demanded a six-hour day for those employed in the general postoffice, and 6½ hours for those employed elsewhere. A government commission declared that the coal owners' combinations had caused a rise in the price of coal of from, on an average, 14/– to 20/– per ton in a short time. It was decided at the conference of the Agricultural and Foresters' Unions, which together have a membership of 7,000, to amalgamate with each other; the conference was held at Sydney.

New South Wales. The wages and labor conditions of the cement workers have been fixed anew by the wages board for the next three years. The working time is 56 and 48 hours per week according to the group to which the member belongs. Laborers receive a minimum wage of 8.2, stone breakers, 9.–. Youths under 16 receive 4.6 per day; 16-17 years 5.6; 17-18 years, 6.6; 18-19 years, 7.6; pitmen working not more than 10 feet deep 10.–, from 10 to 20 feet deep 11.2 per day. For Australia these conditions are nothnig less than brilliant. The eight-hour day demonstration in Sydney last year, which, by the way, is always accompanied by a lottery, resulted in a balance in favor of the trade union house of £6,000. The Federation of Boot and Shoe Manufacturers decided to raise their retail prices by 5-10%, chiefly on account of the great leather export. In 1910 Australia exported cow and horse hides to the value of £456,000, in 1912 £1,007,000. The imported boots, on the other hand, rose in value from £382,000 to £586,000 in the years 1911 and 1912 respectively. The minimum wage for shoe operatives in England is 27/–, in New South Wales, however, 54/–.

New Zealand. The contemplated amalgamation of the both trade union centers in New Zealand has prompted the employers' organization to make an urgent appeal to all employers to join the organization and to contribute to the "Defense Fund."

Victoria. All workers in the provision trades, including bakers, butchers, confectioners, grocers, hotel and restaurant employés, have united into an industrial union.

Argentine. The Union of Tennant Farmers, with its membership of nearly 40,000 members, has been on strike since the beginning of April, because the land owners would not meet their demands. They demand leases of at least five years' duration, and to be freed from the obligation of purchasing only certain makes of threashing machines, or to sell their products to certain merchants. The government has tried to intervene, but up to the present has meet with no succees. In the meantime the work is at a standstill.

United States. The great struggle of the electric tram conductors and drivers in Chicago has been settled by arbitration, 11,000 of those taking part received an increase in wages of 1-2 cents per hour. The wage is 23 censt per hour, as formerly, during the first three months, in the second quarter 25 cents, in the second half year 26 cents rising to 32 cents in the sixth year. The remainder received an average increase of 8%. The laundry workers are much perturbed by the further introduction of new machines. With the help of 4 laundry maids one shirt ironing machine is capable of ironing 490 shirts per hour, while one laundry maid with the assistance of another machine can iron 10,000 collars of every style per hour, as well as the most experienced laundry maid. A new means of preventing all the evils to which man is heir is being advocated by certain philanthropists, viz: sex sterilization. In nine states the law giving the migistrates the authority to have all "good-for-nothings" sexually sterilized has already come into operation. Under this category are included habitual criminals, those mentally or bodily incapable, and the poor. In Indiana alone 800 persons have been deprived of their sex. We must congratulate Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison for the success which attended their appeal against the judgment of the District Supreme Court. The Court of Appeal has reversed the sentences of these three men, viz: 12, 9 and 6 months imprisonment, to 30 days in jail for Gompers, and a fine of $500 each for the other two. We hope that the labor leaders will take the matter to the Supreme Court, and that the latter will accord the defendants the same rights as are enjoyed by the employers, and repeal the sentence altogether.

METALS IN WYOMNIG IN 1912.

Increase in Gold Output, But Decrease in Silver and Copper.

The mine output of gold, silver and copper in Wyoming in 1912, according to Charles W. Henderson of the United States Geological Survey, showed a decrease, compared with the yield in 1911, of $7,460. The output of gold, which represents 83 per cent of the state yield, was $22,235, an increase of $3,035. The yield of copper (formerly the most important metal product of Wyoming) was only 27,570 pounds in 1912, compared with 118,584 pounds in 1911. The silver production was 265 fine ounces, against 725 ounces in 1911. Almost all the gold output and over half the silver output was from the Atlantic City district, Fremont county, where there was a revival of the old Sweetwater district of 1867-1877. At the Duncan mine the ore was both amalgamated and cyanided. A small shipment of very high grade ore was made from the Hidden Hand mine. Small quantities of placer gold were recovered at Encampment, Carbon county; in the Hurricane district, Crook county; and in the Atlantic City, Wind River and Willow Creek districts, Fremont county.

Several cars of copper ore, containing platinum and palladium as well as small quanties of gold and silver, were shipped from the Rambler mine, at Holmes, Carbon county. The mill on this property was not operated. Several cars of copper ore, containing small quantities of silver, were shipped from the Hartville district, Laramie county. There was some development work and two small amalgamation and cyanide mills were under construction in the Bear Lodge district, near Sundance, Crook county, but no output was made.

ROCHESTER MINING DISTRICT, NEVADA.

United States Geological Survey Makes Examination of New Gold and Silver Camp.

The United States Geological Survey, through Geologist F. C. Schrader, has just made an examination of Rochester, the new and promising mining district in Humboldt county, Nevada, which for the last five or six months has been attracting much attention.

The ores are chiefly silver bearing but carry also gold, which in some of the ore amounts to 50 per cent of the value. They were apparently deposited by hydrothermal solutions.

The strike in Nenzel Hill was made late in November, 1912, and the shipment of a couple of carloads of high-grade ore by Joel Nenzel, Frank Schick, and Walt Moynaugh about Christmas started the Rochester boom. In less than a month the hitherto desolate cañon had a reported population of 3,000 and contained many substantial two-story frame buildings. Leases on blocks 300 by 600 feet in area were taken and were operated actively by experienced mining men, with the result that to date the devlopment of the mines and the showing of ore are remarkable. Six or eight leases are opened to a depth of 130 feet by crosscut tunnels from 100 to 300 feet in length. About 2,000 tons of ore averaging $30 to the ton has been mined and shipped and it is said that 100,000 tons of ore is in sight. Nearly a score of properties are producing.

The Rochester district lies mainly on the eastern slope of the Humboldt mountains, between 4,000 and 8,400 feet in elevation, in a north-south area about 6 miles long by 5 miles wide, on which the Survey will later probably publish a report accompanied by a geologic and topographic map.

The district is easy of access, being 10 miles east of Nixon, formerly Oreana, the nearest station and ore-shipping point on the main line of the Southern Pacific railroad, and 25 miles northeast of Lovelock. With both of these places it has daily freight, express, passenger and mail auto service and telephone connections.

The country is mountainous but not rugged. The ravines are open and most of them are passable for team and wagon.

Nenzel Hill, in which lie the ore bodies from which the present production is chiefly derived, is situated in the eastern portion of the district and forms a part of the crest of the range between the head of Rochester cañon on the west and South American cañon on the east. It is a north-northeastward-trending oval part of the ridge about 3,000 feet long by 2,000 feet wide and rises to 7,300 feet in elevation, or about 500 feet above the adjoining portions of the divide. In Nenzel Hill the veins, ten or more in number, vary from 100 to 3,700 feet in length and some apparently have a vertical range of at least 400 feet. The west vein or lode, now being worked chiefly on the Codd lease and the Platt lease, is about 32 feet in width and contains two veins, 7 to 8 feet wide, of good ore composed chiefly of alternating layers of quartz and silicified rhyolite. The workings on these veins have been continuously in ore.

Lincoln hill, which also contains producing properties and received much attention last winter, is a prominent land mark in the western part of the district 2½ miles distant from Nenzel hill, on the north side of Rochester cañon, abouve which it rises 1,200 feet, or to 6,600 above the sea.

Packard hill, the seat of the new "strike," is in the southern part of the district, at an elevation of about 5,800 feet, in the lower part of a broad ridge, and on the trend of the Nenzel hill zone of mineralization.

The ore deposits of the district are chiefly quartz replacement veins in fissures and shear zones in rhyolite and rhyolitic rocks which are of great thickness. The rocks very from felsitic to coarsely prophyritic. They are more or less silicified, devitrified, and sericitized and were referred by the geologists of the fortieth parallel survey to the Triassic period. The rocks dip about 35° E., but the veins dip 60° W. and are approximately conformable with the dominant sheeting and shear structure of the country rock.

The principal camp is East Rochester, with a population of 700, situated at an elevation of 6,200 feet in the head of Rochester cañon, at the foot of Nenzel hill, where about 200 miners are at work. Rochester or "lower town," 2 miles down the cañon at the foot of Lincoln hill, has a population of 250, and Packard, the newest settlement, but a few weeks old, at the south base of Packard hill, has a population of about 100 which is daily increasing. Panama, on the northeast near Spring Valley pass, in the head of Limerick cañon, has about a score of people.

BIG INCREASE IN ALUMINUM.

Many New Uses for the Metal Shown by Report of United States Geological Survey for 1912.

The year 1912 in the aluminum industry was marked by a notable increase in the use of that metal, more than 65,000,000 pounds being consumed, compared with 46,125,000 pounds in the preceding year. Not only was there an increase in the domestic production but there was a decided growth in the imports of the metal, according to W. C. Phalen, of the United States Geological Survey, in an advance chapter from "Mineral Resources" for 1912.

To meet in part the growing demand for aluminum, the Southern Aluminum Co., with a large capital, has acquired a water-power site on Yadkin river, North Carolina, and is now engaged in the development of the property. The projected operations of the company and the additional fact that the importation of foreign aluminum is being stimulated by a keen demand promise a sufficient supply of the metal in the future for consumers in the United States.

The Aluminum Co. of America has secured certain riparian rights in North Carolina and Tennessee and is planning development of a water power for use in an aluminum plant to be constructed at such point as will insure good freight rates and an adequate labor supply. In addition to this expansion in the South, the company is reported to be working on additions to its New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois plants.

Recent Applications of Metallic Aluminum.

A recently developed branch of the aluminum industry is the manufacture of the powdered metal, which is used extensively as a paint pigment, in explosives, in lithographing, and in printing. The material feels very much like powdered graphite. Aluminum foil, though not exactly a new product, is now being used on a larger scale than ever before, owing to improved methods which have lowered the cost of making it appreciably. It is now reported to be displacing tin foil for wrapping such articles as tobacco and candy.

The employment of metallic aluminum in the manufacture of cooking utensils is now being extended to the construction of tanks, cooking vats, and vessels employed by breweries, preserve manufactories, and similar industries where heat conduction, noncorrosion, and a nonpoisonous nature are essential.

The expansion in the use of extruded forms and tubing made of aluminum has been great during the last few years. The difficulties encountered in such use have been largely surmounted and these articles are now being turned out with high tensile strength and with very compact structure in almost any form called for.

Wire for Long-Distance Transmission.

The use of aluminum wire as a conductor in long-distance power-transmission schemes is not new, but recent departures from the ordinary practice bid fair to enlarge this application of the metal. It is reported that a steel reinforced aluminum cable, consisting in all of seven strands, has been placed upon the market. The six outer strands ore made of aluminum and the inner strand is made of steel of very high tensile strength. It is asserted that this conductor both transmits the electrical current and has the requisite strength for use on the towers which are rapidly displacing poles in transmission lines. The Pacific Light & Power Co., of Los Angeles, Cal., has adopted this product for its new transmission line.

The employment of metallic aluminum in the manufacture of articles of everyday use has become so common that such articles fail to attract attention as novelties. The present demand in this direction seems to be for skillful originality in designing new forms and applications.

Production of Bauxite Holds Steady.

The domestic production of bauxite, the ore from which aluminum is derived, during 1912 was 159,865 long tons, valued at $768,932. Compared with the output in the preceding year, these figures represent an increase in quantity of 4,247 long tons, and in value of $18,283. It is significant, however, that the importation of metallic aluminum of different grades increased enormously in 1912 a fact which may probably account for the small increase in the production and the decrease in the imports of bauxite.

Sources of Aluminum Are Many.

Though bauxite deposits are being found from time to time and though the present demand does not appear to tax unduly the known supply of the lower grade of material, the interest now being taken in the preparation of pure alumina from clay or other silicate minerals is worthy of note. As soon as a process for the extraction of alumina from clay is put on a commercial basis, the large quanties of low-grade bauxite containing considerable admixtures of clay will become available. There is a large tonnage of such material associated with most of the southern Appalachian bauxite deposits. This material should first be tested before the nonbauxitic clays containing the smallest amount of alumina are utilized. Two processes have recently been patented for the extraction of alumina from clay, and other patents, having for their object the extraction of potash salts and alumina from silicates like the feldspars, were taken out in 1912. These processes are described in the Geological Survey's report on bauxite and alumium for 1912.

The report, "The Production of Bauxite and Aluminum in 1912," may be obtained free of charge by addressing the Director, U. S. Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

EXPERIENCES OF A JOB HUNTER.

By One of Them.

What I had long dreaded at length had come to pass. One fine morning my employer called me into his office.

"Miss Siegel," he said, "no doubt you are aware that my business is not very prosperous. I have long been running under a heavy expense—too heavy, I am afraid. I believe I shall have to reduce it by dispensing with some of my office help. I am sorry to have to leave you go, but I am afraid I shall have to dispense with your services. Of course, you do not have to leave until you get another position, and I shall do all I can to help you secure one."

"I thank you," I answered dryly, and walked out of the room.

And then began the mad hunt for work. Daily I scanned the papers and answered advertisements in person or by mail. To those I answered by mail I seldom received a reply; to those I answered in person, I invariably was told that they would let me know, but I never heard from them again.

One day I received a reply to my answer to an advertisement from the firm of Joseph, Lazarowitz & Nussbaum, lawyers, asking me to call upon Mr. Joseph on Saturday, May 10, at 9:30 a. m.

I called sharply at 9:30. I found three other girls waiting for the position. By 10 a. m. there were nine of us waiting for the position, but still no Mr. Joseph in sight. At 10:30 a. m. Mr. Joseph arrived. There were then thirteen applicants for the position, including myself, waiting to be interviewed, besides a number of clients. The clients, of course, had preference. At 11:25 a. m. my turn came to be interviewed. I was ushered into Mr. Joseph's room. He was a pale young man of about 28, light, and almost bald.

"What is your name?" he asked in the tons of an inquisitor.

"Bessie Siegel," I answered.

"Where do you live?"

"No. 505 East 5th street."

"Have you had any law experience?"

"Yes, five years."

"Whom were you with?"

I mentioned the name. I might add that all this appeared in my letter, which he had before him, but did not take the trouble to read.

"What salary do you want?"

"Fourteen dollars a week."

"Do you live with your parents?"

"Yes."

"All right, Miss Siegel; there are several others I want to interview; I will let you know."

I departed with little hope of receiving the position.

I next advertised myself in the New York Law Journal as follows:

"Expert law stenographer, five years' experience, thoroughly familiar with all legal forms; best of references; salary $14. Address box 114, this office."

In answer to this advertisement I received a letter from the Aetna Life Insurance Company to call at their New York office, 100 William street. on Monday morning, May 12, at 9 a. m., and ask for Miss Burke, which I did. I was given a blank form of application, which I filled in as follows: Name, Bessie Siegel; address, 505 East 5th street; age, 19; nationality, Jewess; experience, 5 years; education, public schol and evening high school; reference, Charles Houseman, 302 Broadway, New York City; Meyer Kaufman, 320 Broadway, New York City, etc.

"I will submit your application to the superintendent," said Miss Burke, after I had handed it back to her filled out. My application was never accepted, although in answer to further advertisements in the Law Journal I received further communication from them asking me to call and interview Miss Burke. Subsequently, I met a friend of mine, a Miss Levy, who is also out of a position, and who also advertised in the Law Journal, and she told me of a similar experience with the Aetna Life Insurance Company.

Every day my employer anxiously inquired whether I had already secured another position, and each time I felt exceedingly embarrassed and humiliated as I had to admit that I had not. On Thursday morning he again asked the same question. I told him that I had and that I would leave on Saturday. This was not true, but I did not want to impose upon his good nature any longer.

When I arrived home Thursday night I found a letter from Joseph, Lazarowitz & Nussbaum to call to see their Mr. Lazarowitz on Friday at 4 p. m. Hope revived in my breast; I felt sure that I was called to take up the position.

When I called on Friday at 4 p. m. I again found a number of girls in the anteroom waiting to be interviewed for the position. My hopes again sank. After waiting for about half an hour, my turn came to be interviewed by Mr. Lazarowitz. Mr. Lazarowitz explained that Mr. Joseph had been obliged to leave town and had left the selection of a stenographer to him, Mr. Lazarowitz then again crossexamined me as to my name, age, place of birth, years of experience, whether I was familiar with legal forms and could draw legal papers on my own initiative, without dictation; whether I was married or engaged.

"You know," he said to me, "not that I want to discourage marriage, but sometimes girls who are engaged and about to be married take up positions and then, after several months, when they are just beginning to get used to our way of doing things they go off and get married and we must commence to teach it to somebody else all over again."

I hastened to assure him that I was neither married nor engaged, nor intended so to be, either in the far distant or immediate future.

"All right, Miss Siegel," he said, "I thank you for coming down. I have a number of others to interview and I will let you know."

I have not heard from them since.

I next received a letter from a gentleman by the name of Ducker, a lawyer, at 32 Liberty street, asking me to call on Saturday, May 17, between 9:30 and 11 a. m. I called at 9:30 sharp. I again went through a cross-examination as to my name, age, birthplace, nationality, years of experience, whether I resided with my parents, whether I was married or single, why I had left my previous employment, references, etc.; was told that he would let me hear from him, and departed feeling quite sure that he never would. It was here that I met my friend Miss Levy. She had also been out of a job; had also advertised in the Law Journal; had also received an answer from Mr. Ducker to call between 9:30 and 11 a. m. I waited for her in the hallway. She had also undergone an examination as to her name, age, place of birth, etc., and had also been told that he would let her know. Together we strolled down Broadway discussing the hardships of a stenographer's life, and it was then that she told me of her experience with the Aetna Life and I told her of mine, and we wondered whether it could be the fact that we were Jews that prevented us from obtaining the position.

On Sunday I bought the World and the Herald and answered all the advertisements that were to be answered by mail—thirteen in all. On Tuesday afternoon at about 1:45, I received a postal from the firm of Bangor & Bangor, 505 Fifth avenue, to call to see their Mr. Cramer on Tuesday, May 20, after 2 p. m., in reply to my answer to their advertisement. The postal had been sent out on Monday, but had been misdirected to 505 East 6th street, instead of 5th street, and therefore, I did not get it until a few moments before the time I was supposed to call. I dressed as speedily as possible, ran for the subway and arrived at the eighteenth floor of 505 Fifth avenue, the place of business of Bangor & Bangor, at 2:25 p. m. I asked for for Mr. Cramer and was immediately shown into his room. Mr Cramer was a young, rather sporty looking individual of about 25, with a flower in his buttonhole. Without glancing up from his papers he said to me.

"I am sorry, Miss Siegel, but the position is already filled. Good day."

Again I ventured out on the streets, sorely disappointed and despairing of ever getting employment.

I inserted an advertisement in the Daily Trade Record, setting forth my experience and virtues. On Wednesday morning I received a letter from Light & Schlesinger of 24 Washington place, in answer thereto, asking me to call to see their Miss Levy. I called. Miss Levy, was a woman of about 28, a bleached blonde, highly painted and powdered and with a head full of puffs. The place itself had more the appearance of a sweatshop than an office. The room was about 9x13; in it were seated four stenographers, two clerks and two bookkeepers, all rushing at top speed as if racing for dear life. "Well, what do you want?" asked Miss Levy. I explained the object of my call.

"Have you ever had any mercantile experience?" she asked.

"No, I can't say that I have," I answered; but I know the general run of an office. I have been in law offices for the last five years."

"Why did you leave?" she asked. I explained why I had parted company with my last employer.

"Our hours are from 8:15 to 6," she said.

"I don't mind the hours," I answered meekly.

"And what salary do you want?" she asked.

"Fourteen dollars a week."

"Well, I'll tell you," she said, "we don't need a stenographer just now, but we may make a change. Anyhow, it doesn't hurt to interview people, so I sent for you. I will let you know."

Again I walked out into the street, disappointed and rancor filling my breast.

I am still on the job-hunt.—New York Call.

THE SADDEST WORDS.

One Sunday morning, in one of the most famous churches in this country, Plymouth church, Brooklyn, Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of the society, said in his morning sermon:

"The saddest words that have been written in this generation were spoken by a young man who is to inherit one of the greatest fortunes in this country. They were spoken in defense of the trusts. Listen to them:

"'The American Beauty rose can be produced in all its splendor only by sacrificing the early buds that grow up around it. The rose has 1,000 buds, and in order to produce the American Beauty the gardener goes round it with a knife and snips 999, in order that all the strength and beauty may be forced into one bloom.'

"In his economic argument this young man tells the working classes, brutally, that 999 small business men must be snuffed out of existence in order that his American Beauty, the trust, may be produced.

"Listen to Christ: 'Let the strong bear the burdens of the weak; and again, 'Give and it shall be given unto you.'

"These words in defense of the trusts are the most heart-breaking things in literature to those who know what is going to come in the future. Can you wonder that, after that, when a man gives gifts we have no gratitude to return?"

These words, uttered by young Mr. Rockefeller, are profoundly significant, not so much because of the standpoint from which they are viewed by Dr. Hillis as that they indicate the trend in modern industry. The concentration in industry which has been going on during the last half century is aptly illustrated in this young man's address. And this same concentration, if it continue, must inevitably result in the snuffing-out process of which Dr. Hillis speaks. The 999 buds must be crushed in order that the one bloom may develop into the perfection of strength and beauty. The 999 small business men forced into competition with Mr. Rockefeller's American Beauty, the trust, must inevitably be forced to the wall.

Under the operation of the ruthless law of competition this would be the industrial outlook ahead were it not that on every hand there are evidences that the masses are awakening to the fact that the conditions which young Mr. Rockefeller so graphically portrayed must result from following the present trend. Mr. Rockefeller is not the only prophet, son of a prophet, in the land today. The cry, "back to the people," now to be heard on every hand, is indicative of the arrival of a time when the 999 buds will no longer suffer and die for the benefit of the one perfect bloom. When the final struggle comes between the people and the trusts and th contending forces will stand in the relative proportion of 999 to 1, and who can doubt the result?—California Social Democrat.

POETICAL

THE CONQUEROR.

It's easy to laugh when the skies are blue
And the sun is shining bright;
Yes, easy to laugh when your friends are true
And there's happiness in sight;
But when hope has fled and the skies are gray.
And the friends of the past have turned away,
Ah, then indeed it's a hero's feat
To conjure a smile in the face of defeat.

It's easy to laugh when the storm is o'er
And your ship is safe in port;
Yes, easy to laugh when you're on the shore
Secure from the tempest's sport;
But when wild waves wash o'er the storm-swept deck,
And your gallant ship is a battered wreck,
Ah, that is the time when it's well worth while
To look in the face of defeat with a smile.

It's easy to laugh when the battle's fought
And you know the victory's won;
Yes, easy to laugh when the prize you sought is yours when the race is run;
But here's to the man who can laugh when the blast
Of adversity blows; he will conquer at last,
For the hardest man in the world to beat
Is the man who can laugh in the face of defeat.

THE MAKERS OF WAR.

By Alice F. Tilden.

In the dark bay below the silent hill,
On sluggish waters breathing gray and chill,
Lay the old dreadnought, grim, dismantled, still.

Reluctant yielding to the mist's embrace,
Sullen and lonely, in that silent place,
Passing, she seemed the last of all her race.

A phantom pageant crossed the veiling gray;
A backward-gazing idol led the way
For men in garments of a bygone day.

I thought, "Who are those men of ancient creed?"
As if I spoke, the answer came at need,
"Makers of wars of vengeance and of greed."

Of grim, gaunt shapes a vast reproachful throng
Pointed accusing hands; and angry, strong,
Came through the mist the fallen soldiers' song:—

"The light flamed, and we followed; yours the way!
We recked nor pain nor loss.
The night paled, and our souls drank in the day.
Your light was shimmering dross.

"Give back our buried honor! Though ye show
The land of conquest fair,
Still glooms across our hearts the thing we know,
And casts its shadow there."

Vanished the fallen soldiers; and the wail
Of unborn children, shadowy and pale,
Came, sad and low, from out the sheltering veil—

"We cry from the dusk of the ages; our lips are cold in the mist,
Whom never a father has pitied, and never a mother has kissed;
They waited in shivering silence, whom we should have led to the day;
But war was the choice of nations; behold ye the price ye pay.

"Ours should it be to guide you; our hands should perform your will;
The light of souls among us should burn as your beacons still;
But we cry from the dusk of the ages; our lips are cold and gray;
For war was the choice of nations. Behold ye the price ye pay."

Slowly the shadowy forms withdrew; there came,
With grief-worn faces, hearts that nought could tame,
Mothers of men. Their song upflared life flame!—

"Give back our sons! In name of this our land
False-lipped ye called us, and we gave you men.
Dullards of heavy brain and greedy hand,
Give us our sons again!

"Ye cannot call us cowards if ye would.
Undaunted by a fray that shook the earth,
Giving, ungrudging, mid the din we stood
That gave a nation birth.

"And marvel not, ye servile men and blind,
Who, seeing many, look but on the few,
If from the turmoil of today ye find
That nation born anew.

"Across the seas when clangorous war-bells ring,
When, shamed, old earth in throes of conquest shakes,
It is the mother's flesh that feels the sting,
The mother's heart that breaks.

"Glazed eyes that see at last the truth unveiled,
Mute lips that shout their wrongs! With anguished breath
We voice the vision of the heights ye scaled
To unavailing death!"

The vision passed; the sunbeams swept the bay;
And on the waters gliding where she lay,
Dismantled, still, the dreadnough caught the ray.

THE STRIKE is still on at Alta, Utah.

STAY AWAY FROM BLAIR, NEVADA.

STAY AWAY FROM PORCUPINE, ONTARIO!

STAY AWAY FROM BINGHAM, Utah. No worker but a traitor will take the place of a striker!

AS LONG as the preachers can keep the workers looking up, the slaves will remain contented with their poverty.

NEW YORK is facing a strike of the garment workers, which may involve more than 200,000 employés.

DISTRICT No. 6 of the Western Federation of Miners will hold its fifteenth annual convention at Nelson, B. C., January 8th.

THE "DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE" declares that man is entitled to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," but these rights enunciated in our sacred document are as dead as a corpse and will remain lifeless until human beings have the right to work and receive the full social value of the product of their toil.

J. P. MORGAN has denied that there is a "money trust." The only answer to Morgan's denial is the oft-repeated epithet of Roosevelt.

THE EXECUTIVE BOARD of the Western Federation of Miners will convene in session at the headquarters in Denver, January 6th.

THE AVERAGE WAGE of girls in the United States is $6.13 per week.

It is no wonder that the "redlight" district is densely populated.

THOMAS J. MORGAN was killed in a railroad wreck in Arizona, while on his way to California. Morgan was identified with organized labor for forty years and was a pioneer in the Socialist party of the United States.

WILSON, the President-elect, has threatened the giant financiers with a "gibbet," should any of them precipitate a panic during his administration. Teddy threatened the malefactors with imprisonment, but "predatory wealth" made "Terrible Teddy" gentle in the year 1907.

Wilson will get his before 1916.

JUDGE ANDERSON, before whom more than two score of members of the Structural Iron Workers have been brought for trial, is now being castigated by the labor and Socialist press.

Anderson, during the trials, has ungloved his hand, and his many rulings against the men charged with crime, have raised the suspicion that Anderson "hears his master's voice."

Roosevelt branded Anderson as a "crook" and "jackass," and probably Roosevelt knew what he was talking about.

GOVERNOR DONAGHEY of Arkansas, has now become the victim of censure and criticism. The governor has extended pardons to 316 convicts and practically emptied the state prison.

The governor extended his clemency on the grounds that the leasing system in vogue in Arkansas and throughout the southern states is "a revengeful hell."

The contractors with a "pull" were shylocks who not only demanded "the pound of flesh," but were thirsty for blood.

The convicts, whom the governor pardoned, were gentlemen compared with the vultures who were fattening on the profits of the labor of convicted felons.

THE MINE OPERATORS of the Porcupine mining district are making desperate efforts to secure strikebreakers to take the places of the striking miners. Their agents have canvassed all the principal cities and towns of Canada and as yet, they have failed to secure a class of men to operate the miners.

The majority of men brought to Porcupine have been lured under misrepresentation and when reaching the strike district and discovering that there is a strike against a reduction of wages, the most of them refuse to accept employment. The thugs of the Thiel Detective Agency are busy in an effort to stir up trouble; but the strikers are keeping their heads on their shoulders and are not permitting themselves to be goaded to acts of violence. The strikers are standing firm and feel positive that they will win the strike.

TO ONE whose intellectual range of vision is bounded by the horizon lined off by the daily kept ladies of the press, there ean be no disturbing doubt of the fact that prosperity is unbounded and that there is no ground for diseontent and eomplaint.

It is true that statisties from capitalist sourees show 3,000,000 of sentient beings who are inmates of almshouses or the benefieiaries of public and private eharities, at a cost of some $200,000,000 a year in the aggregate.

But this estimate is not large enough. It overlooks the 10,000,000 souls who are trembling on the verge of hopeless pauperism and suffering from a laek of food, elothing, fuel, and sanitary housing. There are also over 2,000,000 women who are being systematieally rendered ineompetent for wifehood and motherhood by being driven to "keep the pace" in the mills and shops. As to the vast number of children immolated under childhood slavery, no correct estimate can be made. Solicitude and pity for their offspring and the neeessity of getting food for the family eonstrains fathers and mothers to swear lies in order to put the ehildren beyond the limit of the forbidden age. And in addition to all these things is the ghastly fact that about 1,000,000 workingmen are killed, maimed, and injured in the eourse of one year, which is more than five times as many as have been killed, wounded, and died from disease in the terrific slaughter of the Balkan war.—National Socialist.

THE NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE of the Socialist party has passed a resolution to recall William D. Haywood from the national exeeutive eommittee of the party. The vote closed on Monday and resulted in thirty-one yeas and four nays. The three delegates from Kings county voted no; the other negative vote came from Niagara county. The resolution will now be sent to the national secretary as a motion to reeall Haywood from the N. E. C. The New Jersey state eommittee of the Soeialist party has already taken action tending to the same end.—Exchange.

The above item of news from an eastern exehange indieates that Ponderous William, who was guilty of "sabotage" and "direct action" on J. Mahlon Barnes at the A. F. of L. convention, is slated for the "Down and Out Club." "Bill" has become petulant and irritable. He sees that common humanity is not swept off its feet when he bellows against Capitalism.

The eommon herd have refused to fall down and worship "Bill" as a leader, and "Bill," with his 250 pounds avoirdupois, eoneluded that an assault upon Barnes would reinstate him as the hero who was willing to fight, bleed and die.

But "Bill," in making the assault on Barnes, lost his prestige as a warrior when he flew to a laundry and barrieaded himself behind the petticoats of the female gentry.

Alas! how the mighty has fallen.

THE CONFEDERATION of trade unions of Franee, which is controlled by anarchistic elements, made another spectacle of itself Monday, when for the third or fourth time in as many years a "general strike" was called—just to show the world what really clever and powerful gents the fat-headed and egotistical leaders are. The latter called the general strike all right, but nobody eame, except a few thousand enthusiasts in isolated places, who, of course, had to display their frothy r-r-revolution by engaging in near-riots, quite like after stowing away sufficient wine to produce the proper amount of enthusiasm. It's getting so that whenever there is something wrong with the stomaeh of a great-great labor leader in Franee he begins to talk to himself about a general strike and sabot-ageing a wine ship, and the more red stuff he sees in a bottle the more feroeious he beeomes to punish it and the more voeiferously he ean shrug his shoulders and wave his arms in denouneing the "labor politicians," "governmentalists," etc. But when the anarehists are picked up and thrown into jail they loudly clamor to the Socialist members of parliament, and even to the despised eapitalists, to eome and get them out. It may be that the tactics of the Freneh syndicalists will prove advantageous, but we don't believe it. After generations of struggle in revolutions and local insurreetions and barricades, the saerifiee of thousands of lives and millions of money, the Freneh industrial movement is today, as far as the principal countries are eoneerned, the weakest in the world. The anarehistic impossibilists seem to dominate it completely.—Cleveland Citizen.

"I AM STRONG for Governor Blease of South Carolina. No hypoerisy about Blease; no pretense, no flub-dub eoncerning humanity and eivilization and that sort of rot. He's a beast and a savage and he says so. He believes in lynching and he says so. Comes right out and says what he thinks. No beating about the bush. Believes in the jungle and thinks we ought to go back there and stay. Others that have his instinets are afraid to admit the fact. No fear about Blease. Pranees out before folks, throws away his garments of eivilization puts on his skin elothes, grabs his hatchet and starts in with a whoop for plenty of lynching and "to hell with the constitution."

All about the eountry are thousands of men that think, so to eall it, exactly as he thinks, and still go snooping around talking guff about the saered constitution and blessed charity and the rest.

Blease knows that the constitution has eeased to exist and he doesn't propose to pretend otherwise.

In the last twenty-five years mobs in this eountry have lynehed more than 2,500 colored men, of whom not more than one in five was guilty of the offense that is alleged as an excuse for this unspeakable shame and savagery. Some of them have been lynched beeause they walked on the sidewalk with white men and some have been lynched for luck.

Blease doesn't eare. A lynching is a lynching and a good thing. All lynchings are good; some are better than others. That seems to be the idea that glimmers in his darkened mind.

South Carolina must be proud of its governor.—Russell, in Coming Nation.

THE LANGSFORD RECORD, published in Pennsylvania, in commenting on the suicide of J. A. Wayland, says:

"When the newspapers chronieled the report that Editor Wayland had eommitted suicide, the public was led to believe that it was ehiefly beeause of the eharges that hung over his head in eonnection with the paper that eaused him to take his life. But later astounding disclosures give the tragedy a different eolor. The cause is found in the mysterious death of a young woman, whose body was smuggled across the border to Canada. The ease at present as it appears, is not fit for print. Socialism has reeeived a severe blow in conneetion with the tragic death of Wayland. As he was the promoter and first editor of the 'Menace,' as well as the Appeal to Reason, it is high time the supporters of the 'Menace' take warning, that they may not share the fate of Wayland."

The journalistic buzzard who wrote the above would slander the fair name of the matron who roeked his cradle, providing that his depravity would meet the approval of that soulless exploiting aggregation, whose eeonomic power makes mental prostitutes of spineless editors. His statement that Wayland was the promoter and first editor of the "Menace" is as glaring a falsehood as the damnable lie that was bred in his debauehed brain that Wayland was conneeted with the mysterious death of a young woman whose body was smuggled into Canada.

The working class of Pennsylvania should know what steps to take to resent the seurrilous detraetion that dripped from the slimy pen of a blaekguard, who attempts to befoul the memory of a man whose life was an open book.

The infamy of the degenerate who slings ink for the Record lessens our surprise that Christ was vilified and condemned to die upon a eross.

NOW BIG BILL HAYWOOD is going to eall out the iron and steel workers and the wage slaves of the packing houses. He said so himself in Chicago last week. No date was set for the general strike, as was done when he called upon a million or two workers to throw down their tools at the beginning of the trial of Ettor, Giojvannitti and Caruso several months ago, and nobody eame excepting a few textile operatives in Massachusetts. That it would prove mighty beneficial for them if the iron and steel workers and slaughtering house toilers would organize and make a fight for better conditions, everybody is willing to eoneede, but it is unlikely that any practieal results will be obtained by Haywoodian trumpeteering.—Cleveland Citizen.

"Big Bill," like Barnum of circus fame, believes in the potency of advertising. "Bill' knows that he must keep in the limelight if he is to sueeeed in securing the necessary dueats to make life worth living.

If "Big Bill" can call out the steel workers and slaves of the beef trust, the opportunity will present itself for sending out strike bulletins and appeals for finaneial aid, and the professional parasites in the I. W. W. are noted for keeping their vision glued on revenue.

The chronic slanderers who yell "fakir," and "grafter" at everyone outside the hell-roaring aggregation of dynamite-daubers, can graeefully and cheerfully aceept all the "mazuma" that the "fakirs" and "grafters" donate to the "Bummery" and for their generosity reeeive the slime of the "soup-house" Spartans who never were known to refuse money, even though it was tainted with scabbery.

The professional swindlers in the I. W. W. are less to blame than the "Rubes" who, knowing the degeneraey and hypoerisy of the blatant, brawling, calumniators, contribute to these reprobates, to whom honor is as dead as a corpse.

If the labor organizations that are tradueed and defamed, will cease donating to the disrupters and breeders of dissension, men of the Haywood type will be foreed to seek honorable employment.

THE CHAIRMAN of the New York aldermanic eommittee which is investigating police graft upon viee, has delivered himself of the opinion that viee and wages are inextricably interwoven. He has found that there s a direct connection between morals and eeonomics. In an interview, Mr. Curran, the chairman, is quoted as saying:

"I tell you, the men who pay the daughters of this eity $4, $5 and $6 a week will have more to answer to their God than will Mrs. Goode, and she is admittedly the keeper of a disorderly house.

"We did not need Mrs. Goode to tell us a girl eannot support herself on $4 a week. The girls from the stores and the factories leave their work on Saturday night with their pay envelope—and it is so small, they start for the street—they are soon followers of Mrs. Warren's profession."

Mr. Curran is mistaken. He is as much responsible for the existing system as the men that pay low wages. The rate of wages is not determined by the goodness or badness of employers. Mr. Curran has perceived the fallaey that commercialized vice is a produet of bad women, but he is yet so simple as to think that low wages are due to bad men. He has still got his economics and his morality sadly confused.

The idea that wages are fixed arbitrarily has no basis in sound economics. Employers, to obtain the most efficient, which may increase instead of diminish their profits, may pay higher wages than the ruling rate. Yet there are well defined limits below which wages may not be reduced or above which they may not be raised.

Wages are not the only element entering into the problem. Wages may be high in money and low in fact. In New York 33 per cent. of the workers' earnings are required to pay rent. Yet the superficial investigator places the whole responsibility for the economic condition of the worker upon the individual employer, ignoring the fact that interest and rent, no less than profit, share in the distribution of the earnings of labor.

If the New York aldermen shall pursue their investigations, they may find that they are investigating a system and not, as they suppose, an isolated evil.—Milwaukee Leader.

To Take Their Homes

IN DANBURY, CONNECTICUT, and some other little towns in that vicinity, the United States marshals have levied on the homes of 189 workingmen, members of the Hatters' Union, to satisfy the judgment granted against them, and in favor of the firm of Loewe & Co., for $240,000, claimed to be thrice the damages sustained by that firm on account of a boycott by this union.

The judgment was granted under the Sherman anti-trust law, supposed to be passed to check great industrial combinations from unlawfully restraining trade.

We have stated in the Journal, in former issues, and will continue to call the attention of our readers to the fact that this body of workingmen is the only so-called combination that has really been penalized, supposedly in accordance with this law.

We can all remember the huge pre-election joke, the fining of the Standard Oil Company $29,000,000. We also remember the reversal of that judgment. We can all remember the reading into that law, by the Supreme Court of the word "reasonable," by which almost any business combination can, and does, escape any penalty from that law.

We can also remember how the courts dissolved (?) the Standard Oil trust, the tobacco trust, in such manner that they still can carry on their monopolistic business without any fines, but placing them on such firm basis that values of their stocks and bonds almost doubled.

We remember the failure to convict the leaders of the packing trust on the criminal charges supposed to be included in that law. And the opinion, lately expressed by Attorney General Wickersham that it would be impossible to convict any trust magnate under the criminal section.

But no such "mawkish sentiment" was allowed to interfere when it came to the prosecution, or should it be called persecution, of the members of a trade union, against which institutions this law was never supposed or intended to be aimed. Sentiment might be too strong against imprisoning men who make the price of meat almost prohibitory to a worker, but not too strong to prevent the mulcting of that worker of the home that generally amounted to the saving of his lifetime.

Is it any wonder that the workers have come to believe that the "law" is their enemy?

Is it a wonder that they believe that the judges are only hired flunkeys of the powers that oppress?

Is it well, is it safe, that the great masses of the working class should lose confidence in the integrity of the courts?

Show us, show the workers, that the courts deal out exact justice between man and man, rich or poor, and we will gladly obey the law; be only too willing to recognize that justice.

But it is too apparent; we cannot avoid seeing that class bias, if we would.

Apparently the only "unreasonable" combination in restraint of trade is a labor union.—United Mine Workers' Journal.

It has been only during the past few years that journals would assume an editorial attitude that reflected on the integrity of the courts. But patience with the flagrant decisions of judicial tribunals has reached the limit, and men in the field of journalism who have endeavored to retain some reverence for our temples of justice, are finding themselves in rebellion against the dictum of courts that are absolutely bereft of any semblance of justice. Even the conservative man can no longer successfully deny that decisions of courts seem to be formulated to meet the approval of a class of privilege.

When men declare that the courts are owned and controlled by trusts and corporations, they are justified in making such declarations, because such declarations are based on the character of the decisions rendered by the courts.

It has become a prevailing sentiment among the vast majority of the people that the comparatively poor have no standing in court, and for this reason, the recall is being demanded by that mass of citizenship who are surely realizing that our courts are being prostituted to serve the interests of Mammon.

Interesting News for Laboring People

MRS. GEORGE B. BRAYTON had a cat betrothal party at the Plaza hotel, New York, recently, and the following appeared in the daily journals as an announcement of the wedding in the higher circles of feline aristocracy:

"Mrs. George B. Brayton requests the honor of the presence of ——— and her cat, ——— at the betrothal party of The Quakeress and Don Dia, at the Plaza hotel, New York, on December the 14th. Grand ballroom, 4 o'clock.

"New York, Dec. 14.—Tabby—'Spt! s-s-sph! spis! sis! tude.'

"Tom—'Meouw! meouw! sis! maow!'

"Matilda—'Sohs swp! scratch gr!'

"The above chorus of feline anger and disappointed wailings is ringing in the ears of late sleepers today. It comes from cats who have failed to receive invitations for the most important event catdom has ever known—the cat betrothal party to be held in the Hotel Plaza December 16.

"The secret—or rather the cat in the bag—has been let out. It is just that Don Dia, English silver chinchilla cat, has popped the question to The Quakeress, royal tabby, and has been accepted. Oh, miaow!

"Don Dia was bought in London for $150 recently and sent from London to Boston as the only passenger on a liner, traveling in a stateroom of his own.

Mrs. George B. Brayton, 27 Keicester street, Brighton, Mass., owns both felines. Invitations were sent to all the fair owners of cats of high degree to attend the betrothal party."

The above news from the "smart set" in the cat kingdom will be appreciated by the laboring people who are always pleased to learn that cats belonging to the Plutes can travel across the ocean in a stateroom, and when reaching the shores of our grand and glorious republic, can find sumptuous apartments in our fashionable hotels.

Hundreds of thousands of men and women, struggling to earn the means of life, must forego the joy and happiness of wedlock, but cats with a pedigree, whose owners have bank accounts, can secure bridal chambers in an aristocratic hostelry and be honored with the presence of those dames of fashion whose hardest work is squandering the profits that have been extracted from the labor of enslaved humanity.

Many will condemn the frivolity of this woman who engages the grand ballroom of the Plaza hotel in New York to pull off a cat stunt, but the millions of big, brawny men who have ballots in their hands and who use those ballots to perpetuate an industrial system that permits a sweatless parasite of aristocracy to make arrangements for a cat wedding, are far more to blame than the brainless butterfly of fashion, who indulged in a feline bridal party in New York.

When the working people become intelligent, Mrs. Brayton and her ilk will announce no more betrothals between cats.

Poverty Breeds Prostitution

MISS S. M. FRANKLIN, secretary of the National Woman's Trade Union League and editor of Life and Labor, after a thorough investigation, has declared that $12.00 per week is the minimum wages upon which a self-supporting girl or woman can live in Chicago.

This was Miss Franklin's reply to Miss Ida M. Tarbell, who, after an investigation of conditions in New York and Boston, fixed the scale at $10 a week for New York and $9 for Boston.

It is a well known fact that the vast majority of girls and women do not receive the scale of wages which Miss Franklin declares is necessary in order that girls and women shall be self-supporting. The low wage paid by department stores, laundries, factories and other places where girls and women are employed, results in furnishing recruits for the "redlight" districts and makes it easy for male degenerates to carry on the "white slave" traffic.

Economic necessity drives girls and women to the brothels, and no matter how vigorous may be the denunciation against white slavery and prostitution, the evil will assume a more serious magnitude until the gentler sex is placed in a position where honorable employment is certain and where the wages paid make it possible for woman to live without courting dishonor. A great many of our so-called reformers have held that "redlight" districts and prostitution were the result of a moral illness or inherent badness among the unfortunate victims who are found in the "bad lands," but these reformers have never felt the pangs of hunger, nor have they heard the brutal mandates of a landlord insisting that the rent shall be paid.

These reformers have never been the victims of eviction, nor have they been forced to walk the streets, homeless anl penniless.

Thousands and tens of thousands of girls and women annually enter dens of shame, not because of any inherent moral depravity, but because employers, in their greed for profit, scorned to pay a scale of wages that protected the virtue of a slave.

The life of the social outcast is repulsive, but as long as dishonor commands a higher price than so-called respectable employment, just so long shall our reformers be throwing up their hands in holy horror at the spread of the moral pestilence that builds a "redlight" district in every city of this country.

The Catholic Layman Talks Back

By William Clancy, in the Social Democratic Herald.

WHILE DISCUSSING SOCIALISM with a Catholic clergyman recently, he patronizingly informed me that after I really learned what Socialism is, I would abandon it.

"You Catholic young men," he began, "who become infected with the virus of Socialism, do not understand the deeper significance of the movement. You do not understand how utterly materialistic and atheistic it is. You do not see the danger to your faith and morals."

"You are playing with fire, young man," he continued warmly. "You are playing with fire."

As a matter of fact, I was playing with my watch fob and thinking, the while, what a lofty mountain the clergymen of my church make of the tiny molehill known as Socialist materialism.

Socialism materialistic? Of course, it is. It embraces the materialism of bread and butter, work and wages—the materialism of life itself.

Is Socialism atheistic? Some Socialists are atheistic, but Socialism only attempts to show the relation between man and his social environment—not the relation between God and man or nature and man. Socialism can be neither deistic nor atheistic.

The atheism of early Socialists was a survival of French freethought of the eighteenth century. Indeed, our own American revolutionists, in no small measure, borrowed from the French free-thinkers many of the theories of republican government now weaved into the warp and woof of American institutions. We can imagine with what vehemence French clericals attacked those early theories. We know how vigorous the Catholic church has become in America under the constitution born of those theories.

The majority of men are secular and live in a secular, material prosaic world. The very material tools with which they work have a very material bearing on their very material lives. This was as true of the first rude implements of production and the first barbaric produces of wealth as it is true of the modern, automatic machine and and the later-day wage workers.

If early Socialist writers accentuated the material and neglected the spiritual, they did so because they sensibly recognized that man's physical and not his spiritual hunger has been responsible for the creation of human society.

From the investigations of these early Socialists came the discovery of an immutable law—the law of social change. They discovered that modern society is a product of all the societies of the past. They found that the tool was mightier than the sword or the pen and that the manner in which a people made their living determined the laws, customs and most of the institutions of that people. This law has been christened economic determinism.

If Marx and Engels were alive and were asked to give a concrete, modern example of the operation of this law, they would probably remind us that the reason there is no economic independence for the mass of men in America today is because the simple tool of a century ago has become, through development, complex and expensive—out of the reach of the producer. They would also point out that the continued development of the tools of production will necessitate their collective ownership. This would be Socialism consummated through economic determinism.

Marx and Engels would have also been careful to point out the fact that economic determinism does not attempt to account for the origin or destiny of man. It involves neither biology nor theology. It could not have become operative as a law until man became a tool user.

This is the head and front of Socialist materialism. This is the bug-bear, the specter that is haunting the Catholic hierarchy. This is the process that will break up the home, destroy the family, establish free love, put religion on the bum and raise hell generally.

Of course, there are some Socialists who believe that economic determinism is the answer to the riddle of the universe just as there are some folk who confidently believe that Dr. Hartmann's Peruna will cure a ham. There are Socialists who do not know their Socialism, just as there are Catholics who do not know their catechism.

One of the most exasperating claims of the Catholic clergy is that they do not enter politics; that they are non-partisan. The relentlessness of their opposition to Socialism "proves" this. However, notwithstanding the vigor of their onslaughts, the church, as yet, has not officially declared Socialism to be a matter of faith or morals. The pope has not condemned it ex cathedra. How could he?

What can a Catholic who understands and is sympathetic toward Socialism think of these hedging tactics. The only conclusion one can reach is that the officials of the church are simply functioning as police for the capitalists.

If Socialism is as fruitful of error as they say it is, why don't they condemn it, officially. Every well-informed Catholic knows that such a condemnation is the only sort that is binding. I am a Socialist and a Catholic and I should like to know definitely where I stand.

I question the right of the Catholic hierarchy to force upon me the alternative of supporting the Republican or Democratic parties when my conscience, my intelligence and the very mainspring of my well-being—my economic interests—scream to me that they are both rotten to the core.

My priests would leave me a political derelict without party, without principles, without hope of social salvation for me and mine, because I believe that the people ought to own the trusts.

They give me my choice of two dromios, two gold-dust twins, and have the effrontery to tell me that I am offending God and insulting my religion by refusing to make a stupid and stultifying choice.

I remonstrate with them for their lack of practical sympathy with the aspirations of the working class; they recite the obvious—they tell me that the church is the historic friend of the workers.

My history tells me this: What I want is escape now. I am not an ancestor worshiper. I am looking for a way out. I want something now.

My spiritual superiors have it conveniently waiting for me. It is made of such stuff as dreams are made of; it resembles a mirage and has the substance of a rainbow, but, nevertheless, they have it for me. Here it is: "A fair day's pay for a fair day's work."

This must be the last, full measure of social justice for me. This must be my political omega—my economic revelations. This is the final, the finis. Curtain!

If such an ideal of social justice were practicable, with labor enjoying the status of a commodity, does any level-headed Catholic workingman believe that the Republican or Democratic parties would bring it into being? These are the only vehicles the clergy have left us on which to ride into our capitalistic Utopia.

To bring out such an ideal condition is manifestly an economic and legislative task. It is folly to assume that a Sunday sermon preached to capitalists can bring about the least measure of relief for workingmen. If capitalists were amenable to moral suasion this old earth would have been a paradise long, long ago. Ruling classes have been preached to by clergymen of all denominations since the lust for gold and power first seized with its brutish claws the human heart and mind.

One fact is patent. Our political and industrial problems are not going to be solved by prayer, or masses, or pious devotions, or retreats. Whether the Catholic church solves these problems or the Socialist party solves them, they must be solved by action.

At the present moment, what are the hierarchy, the clergy and the societies of the church doing to bring about their ideal of social justice, "A fair day's pay for a fair day's work?" Nothing!

On the other hand Socialists believe that the people ought to own the trusts and get all they produce. What are the Socialists doing at the present to bring about their ideal? Everything!

An Approval That Will Not Be Approved

THE OFFICIALS of the American Federation of Labor, according to the News-Advocate of Stockton, California, have given their approval to the Boy Scouts and believe that by co-operating with the promoters of the Scout movement they can so control such an organization as to prevent it from becoming military in its character.

The News-Advocate published the following:

"The executive council of the American Federation of Labor has recommended that the general organization keep in touch with and ally itself with the Boy Scouts of America. Though a resolution last year denouncing the Boy Scout movement was presented in the annual convention of the labor organization, the executive council now is convinced that the activities of the Boy Scouts of America are not military or designed against organized labor. In a report signed by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and by the other officers, a statement is made of the aims and the scope of the American Boy Scouts and the Boy Scouts of America.

"The report shows that the American Boy Scouts are military. It makes it clear that the Boy Scouts of America are for peace; that the boys are taught to be manly, self-reliant and determined to think for themselves. It shows that there is nothing in the activities of the second organization hostile to the interests of organized labor.

"Concerning its presentation of the Boy Scouts of America, James E. West, chief scout executive of that organization, says that it is a fair, impartial, direct statement of the organization. The other officers of the executive council who signed the report are: James Duncan, first vice president; John Mitchell, second vice president; James O'Connell, third vice president; D. A. Hayes, fourth vice president; William D. Huber, fifth vice president; Joseph F. Valentine, sixth vice president; John R. Alpine, seventh vice president; H. B. Perham, eighth vice president; John B. Lennon, treasurer, and Frank Morrison, secretary."

Though the executive council of the American Federation of Labor may have given its approval to the Boy Scouts, yet such approval will not change the attitude of men and women towards the Boy Scouts, who have given this organization their closest scrutiny.

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor has been known to have given its approval to organizations whose aims and objects were not in harmony with the progress and advancement of the working class. It is a well known fact that not only has the executive council of the American Federation of Labor given its approval to the National Civic Federation, but the majority of the members of the executive council were members of the Civic Federation and used the most specious arguments to convince others that the National Civic Federation had performed splendid work in the settlement of differences between employer and employé.

The approval of the executive council of the A. F. of L. will not change the character of the Boy Scouts, nor will the approval change the opinion or remove the impression from the minds of those observing men and women of the labor movement, who have reached the conclusion that the Boy Scouts have been launched for no other purpose save to convert the boy into a soldier to be used in future conflicts between exploiter and exploited.

The Boy Scout of today is to be the soldier of tomorrow, and this organization, having the support and backing of Capitalism and all its allies, leaves an indellible impression that no good to labor can come from the Boy Scouts.

The General Strike

III. IN AMERICA AND FRANCE.

By Robert Hunter.

(Courtesy of The National Socialist.)

IT IS A CURIOUS FACT that the Haymarket riot in Chicago gave to the present French labor movement the idea of the general strike.

In this country the Haymarket affair brought a terrible reaction. The labor movement lay stunned after its brief flirtation with anarchy. The union men drew away from the anarchist agitators, and, taking their information from the capitalist press only, concluded that Socialism and anarchism were the same thing, and would, if tolerated, lead the movement to ruin and disaster. Without a doubt, the bomb in Chicago put back the labor movement for years. It ended the great national movement for an eight-hour day and did more to induce the rank and file of trade unionists to reject all association with revolutionary ideas than perhaps all other things put together.

In France it had an altogether different effect. From that moment on, the anarchists took new heart. The general strike became the subject of the hour, and little by little, the "Conservative" believers in political action were forced by the "Revolutionary" direct actionists out of the leadership of the French unions.

In 1888 the French unions meeting at Bordeaux voted the following resolution:

"Considering that the monopolization of the instruments of labor and of capital gives to the employers a power which diminishes by so much only as the strike puts power in the hands of the workers;

"That capital is nothing if it is not put in action by labor; That, therefore, in refusing to work the workers would destroy by a single stroke the power of their masters;

"Considering, That the partial strike can only be a means of agitation and organization, the congress declares:

"That the general strike alone, that is to say, the complete stoppage of all work, or, in other words, the social revolution, can lead the workers toward their emancipation."

The French trade unions had for years advocated working class political action, and this was a move on the part of the anarchists to put the Federation of Trade Unions in opposition to political action. The opposition was increased when the French Socialist party, meeting in Lille, in 1890, defeated a resolution declaring for the general strike. At the various congresses thereafter, both trade union and Socialist, the general strike became the great bone of contention. The trade unionists began to look upon it as of vital importance; and the Socialists, in opposing it, were placed in an apparently indefensible position.

At this moment a great orator appeared on the scene. The young, unknown lawyer, Aristides Briand, assumed the leadership of the advocates of the general strike. There is no question that Briand is a master of oratory, and behind him were many able direct actionists who had set out to divorce the unions from political action.

The history of this episode has much in it that even today lies in darkness. All sorts of rumors are rife concerning the reactionary forces that were behind Briand at that time, and however one may look at his brief career as a revolutionist, there is much in it that points to double-dealing. A bit of history will illustrate.

The capitalist politicians had for years tried to break the great power of the Socialists in the trade union movement. The anarchists were, of course, active to the same end. Some of the unions were indeed at that time dominated by anarchists. The "revolutionary" anarchist unions, however, were always in need of funds because the anarchists have, as every one knows, utter contempt for organization and for payment of dues. This led certain radical politicians to urge the French municipalities to take, what seems to many, the most extraordinary act of any government, and that was to vote funds for the support of its most bitter enemy, namely, these most vilently "revolutionary" unions.

Trade union halls were built by the cities; funds were voted for their up-keep; and these trade union headquarters were turned over to the use of the unions. Despite the fact that the government placed its agents in these halls to watch and report upon the union movement, the anarchists found these government halls an acceptable and inexpensive arena for their action. The various halls were soon consolidated into a national federation. A brilliant young anarchist, Polloutier, became the secretary of this organization. With the help of the unions in this federation, of the anarchists in control of other organizations, and of a few other radicals opposed to political action, Briand won a complete victory over the older trade union leaders.

The Trade Union Congress at Nantes was the final battleground, and those who believed in political action were there defeated decisively, and they withdrew from the hall. Divided thus into two factions, the older unions were soon overwhelmed by the General Federation of Labor, which was organized at Limoges in 1895. The new organization was made up of a union of the Federation of Trade Union Halls, and a new organization composed of trade unionists, anarchists, and professional men.

From this moment on political action was spurned by the unions. The general strike, direct action, and sabotage became the rallying cries of the new organization. The Socialist leaders were practically annihilated, and all efforts to capture the new organization have thus far been futile. Nor, indeed, is this rule of the anarchists soon to be overturned. Certainly not until the French trade unions adopt a different method of voting. For instance, the Miners' union, with over 100,000 members, has exactly the same number of votes in the congress as a small group of Paris anarchists with thirty or forty members. This system of voting allows the forming of little groups, all of which can be affiliated with the trade union movement. These little groups can each send a delegate and each delegate exercises the same power, whether he represents a dozen or a million workers.

The philosophy and the organization of French syndicalism (trade unionism) is the subject of another story. Let it suffice here to say that the general strikes in the late '70's and '80's in America gave birth to this idea in France, and that the partisans of the general strike were so bitterly and so unanimously combatted by those who believed in political action that the latter were literally forced out of all leadership in the French trade union movement.

This history has this importance. The general strike as a panacea is not of Socialist origin, nor is it of trade union orign. It s certainly not from Marx nor Engels, as some have claimed. In fact, nearly every trade union and Socialist leader outside of France looks upon the advocacy of the general strike as a menace to the Socialist movement, and as a dangerous fancy for the trade union movement.

We shall take up in later articles the views of the chief Socialists and trade unionists. Just now we are dealing with the history of the general strike, as a panacea, and the credit for that belongs wholly to the anarchists of France, to the renegade "revolutionist," Aristides Briand, and to the subsidies which the French cities voted in their effort to divorce the trade union movement of France from working class political action. An idea which comes into the world with such questionable parentage may be a good one, but it should be forced to undergo the most rigid and searching examination.

Threats Will Not Convert Sinners

THE CATHOLIC REGISTER, the official organ of the Catholic church of Denver, in an editorial a short time ago, hurled its denunciation against the character of dances that were indulged in by our respectable people, who seem to enjoy the latest developments in terpsichorean art.

The condemnation of the Register was followed by a vigorous sermon delivered by Father Hugh L. McMenamin at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, in which the participants of the rag dances were handled without gloves.

The Rocky Mountain News gave the following synopsis of the threatening harangue delivered by the angered priest, who has decreed that levity in dancing must cease:

"The 'grizzly bear,' 'chicken flip,' 'bunny hug' and other serpentine 'rags,' which were attacked last week by the Denver Catholic Register, were made the subject of vehement denunciation by Father Hugh L. McMenamin in his sermon yesterday at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception.

"Father McMenamin did not stop at his attack on the sinuous glides, but denounced what he characterized as 'looseness' of the New Year celebration.

"Declaring that the new Year scenes in Denver cafés rivaled all the wantonness of ancient Rome, he startled his audience by the announcement that a watcher will visit each café a week from Tuesday night to take the names of Catholics who indulge in unseemly exhibitions.

"He deplored the invasion of the 'rag' which he said had crept into the best society and even into the functions given by the church.

" 'Last week the Register published a criticism of certain actions prevalent among the younger members of Catholic societies—a criticism telling of conditions so glaring that it was made the comment of local papers,' said Father McMenamin. 'Even the Associated Press took it up and sent it out to all the English-speaking people of the world.

" 'I hope,' he continued, 'that we shall profit by this example, and that it shall not be necessary for the Register to refer to this matter again.'

"In speaking of the New Year celebration, he said that the boldness of the revelries had reached such proportions that it was a disgrace to the city.

" 'If what I have been told of these exhibitions is true, then the bacchanalias of ancient Rome could be no worse,' he declared. 'I trust that no member of the Catholic faith will take part in them. Such actions deserve the most vehement condemnation. In order that no further disrepute shall come to us, as mentioned last week in the Register, it has been decided to have a reporter from the Catholic Register visit all the cafés and take the names of Catholics in attendance. If necessary, the names will be published. The actions referred to last week are to be deplored in the extreme.

" 'These things must stop. If it cannot be done by public criticisms, more drastic measures must be taken, by publishing, for instance, the names of the guilty parties.' "

The condemnation of the Register and the denunciation of Father McMenamin will have but little effect in halting the rag dances in Denver or anywhere else.

To convert the church into a detective agency from which sleuths will go to cafés and ballrooms to play the role of spotters, will not appeal very strongly to intelligent people. Threats are poor arguments to convert sinners.

The use of the club will hardly convince men and women that they are wrong.

Fear of exposure may affect the weakling or the coward, but men and women with starch in their spinal columns may take the bit in their teeth and resent the assumed authority of a Catholic priest or a Catholic publication to regulate their conduct at cafés or ballrooms.

If men and women of the Catholic church are indulging in dances that are vulgar, then it may be that the Catholic hierarchy of Denver are lacking the efficiency to deal with a matter that has aroused their indignation.

Indignation and wrath, expressed through the columns of a Catholic publication, and condemnation hurled from a pulpit, will not lessen the evil complained of by Father McMenamin. The spy system will prove unavailing and the publication of the names of people who indulge in the dances boycotted by the clerical fraternity, will only have the effect of nerving the culpable to bid defiance to the threats issued from the pulpit.

Father McMenamin is treading on langerous ground, aud it would probably be advisable for him to give this matter more serious consideration and through calm and temperate deliberation evolve ways and means by which men and women of his faith may be weaned from an indulgence in festivities that are looked upon by him as immoral.

The March of Humanity

WHEN THE HISTORY of 1912 will have been written, it will mark some well-defined milestones in the progress of mankind. Labor has had an unusual amount of battle, with victory almost invariably crowning its efforts. If we men who toil could only come out of our comatose condition and demand what so rightfully belongs to us.

Every concerted effort has been successful, even beyond the wildest dreams of the most radical agitator. In Lawrence, the textile troubles started in a modest way and before it ended 300,000 workers in that industry had gained substantial increases in wages. In England, the dock workers' strike gained for all men employed in harbors and on ships better hours and more wages, and the coal miners' strike involved all of Europe and threatened to spread to the ends of the world and tie up the commerce and industries of all nations and forced parliament to enact a minimum wage law. Labor has also had an unusual amount of prosecutions, but to date not one conviction. All of them were shown up to be malicious persecutions brought not for the purpose of finding criminals but designing to fasten on labor and its champions charges of various character for the purpose of exhausting the treasuries, humiliating and discrediting its leaders and if possible convict innocent men.

The McNamaras pleaded guilty with the understanding that Los Angeles be organized and all charges against organized labor resulting from these cases be dismissed. The business men who helped to bring about this agreement turned traitor to their agreement as soon as the McNamaras were in San Quentin. This plea of guilty is hard to explain to the uninitiated. Not being satisfied, Darrow was attacked but gloriously acquitted. Then followed Ettor, Giovanitti and Caruso trial and acquittal, and the Louisiana timber workers' trials, all of whom were found not guilty. We still have the courts grinding out injustice to fifty-four men at Indianapolis at the direction of the steel trust, which will no doubt end in the same way.

Socialism and socialistic principles have grown by leaps and bounds and bid fair to become the leading factor in the uplift of the toilers and putting them in possession of what they have so justly earned.

Southern Europe is in the midst of an upheaval that will result in lasting good.

Foremost among the achievements of 1912, however, is the abdication of the Manchu dynasty in China, which for 300 years continually degraded and enslaved the Chinese people. While the old monarchy has voluntarily gone to rest, the wants of the people have not been satisfied.

From all indications and reports, it seems as if this great human giant of the Orient, numbering 400,000,000 people, is just awakening.

Oppressed and tyrannized for centuries, this immense mass of people have at last reached the limit of human endurance. They have turned on their cruel task-masters and have forced them out of their position of vantage and power. It may take decades before the revolution in China is settled. It is a tremendous task, and although there may be temporary adjustments, yet there will be no permanent peace until the needs of the millions are met.

Any government, be it monarchy or republic, that tries to exist half slave half free, is bound to fall, and any country that tolerates exploitation and robbery of its working and producing class cannot endure.

Rebellious struggles for freedom and justice and right may be temporarily checked by coercive measures, but the seed of liberty rooted in the human soul can never be killed.

Regardless of race, color or creed, be they black, yellow or white, the sigh and song for freedom and happiness is alike the common heritage of man.

Race hatreds and color prejudices fade away before the light of knowledge and toleration. The brotherhood of man knows no boundaries nor does it recognize race or color, but includes all men in whose veins flows red blood that feeds a heart throbbing for liberty's immortal cause.

The logical conclusion of it all is that the "giant" labor is waking up and demanding its own. As long as the workers are satisfied with bare bones they will have to starve and steal and die in disgrace, while their lords and masters feed and fatten in glory.

That is the story from every factory, mine, shop and ballot box of the world where the toilers sacrifice themselves on the altar of superstition, prejudice and ignorance.

But there is hope. Labor is waking up and the discontent that now envelopes the globe will only melt away when there shall be given equal opportunity to all and complete freedom to all human beings of whatever race or country.—Seattle Union Record.

Significant Correspondences

THE FOLLOWING APPEARED in The Citizen, a Socialist journal published at Schnectady, New York:

"Schenectady, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1912.

"Rev. James Hayden:

"Dear Sir: : A large number of clergymen are using their influence against Socialism, due no doubt in a large measure to their lack of accurate information of the movement.

"In view of this fact, the Tenth ward branch of the Socialist party voted to invite the ministers of the ward to separate debates on this momentous subject.

"You are therefore challenged to a public debate on Socialism with some one who shall be chosen by the Tenth ward branch, who is thoroughly capable of defending the principles of Socialism.

"Kindly send your reply in writing at an early date and if the challenge is accepted, a committee will wait on you to arrange specific subject, time, place and other details. Respectfully yours,

"G. B. SISSON,

"Recording Secretary, Tenth Ward Branch, 30 Osterlitz Ave."

THE REPLY.

"Schenectady, N. Y., Nov. 27, 1912.

"Sir: Your circular has been received, and in answer I would say that the same has been placed on file. Yours, etc.,

"J. B. HAYDEN."

The above correspondence is significant. The letter of the recording secretary of the Tenth ward branch of the Socialist party of Schenectady, extending an invitation to Rev. J. B. Hayden to participate in a discussion on Socialism is respectful and courteous, but the answer of the disciple of Christ, who is presumed to have the humility of the gentle Nazarene, can scarcely be classified as one of those epistles that will do credit to the Christian traits of a Catholic priest. Rev. Hayden seems to have been insulted by the letter which challenged him to meet in debate an advocate of the principles of Socialism.

If Hayden entertained the opinion that he could vanquish the party selected to espouse the doctrines enunciated by Socialism, he would not have hesitated in accepting the invitation, but because he knew that he could not meet the unanswerable logic of Socialism, he dismisses the challenge by notifying the recording secretary that his letter has "been placed on file." These Catholic priests, bishops, and even cardinals who have been casting odium on the principles of Socialism at long range, must get to close quarters and meet the men of the Socialist cause who are only too willing to measure steel with the dignitaries of the church, or else a suspicion will creep into the minds of people who think, that these expounders of Biblical lore are cognizant of the fact that it would be dangerous to the prestige of church prelates to lock horns with Socialists in debate.

If Socialism is wrong, and the priests, bishops and cardinals know it and can prove it, then the sooner they meet Socialists on the platform the sooner will the people take stock in their statements.

Winning Our Way

By Eugene V. Debs.

THE SPIRIT of Socialism is irresistible. Once it lays hold of the heart it takes complete possession and insists upon complete capitulation.

The Socialists do with joy what others regard as sacrifice. Nothing is too great for them to undertake and nothing too small to escape them. The holy fire burns within them and their ruling passion is to serve the cause.

Only a few years ago the very name of Socialist was a reproach and the man or woman who bore it an outcast. Today the Socialist movement commands the respect of the civilized world.

There is nothing so rich with promise for the future as the social spirit which is moving the workers of the world to unite in revolt against the slavery of the world. It is this spirit that converts helpless wage slaves into conquering revolutionists and light up the horizon of the future with the sunrise of the coming day.

Looking about us in the present campaign we behold for the first time the workers rallying to the standard of their own class. The work of years of agitation is at last coming to fruition. We feel ourselves thrilled with a new-born power.

We are grandly winning our way.

The past has been full of struggle; the future will be full of achievement.

The growing power of the workers is shaking the social fabric to its foundations. The working class is now attaining to its manhood and when it stands erect the fetters of servitude will fall from its limbs forever.

No longer do the workers petition their masters; no longer are they satisfied with rags and crusts, and no longer do they yield to abject despair. They have come to realize at last that they have power and that the secret of their power is within themselves. Solidarity is now their watchword. They recognize their common kinship, born of their common slavery. They see that they are in the same class; that they are the victims of the same class; that they outnumber their exploiters and oppressors a score to one, and that when they unite and stand four square to the world their cause is won and thenceforth they are the world.

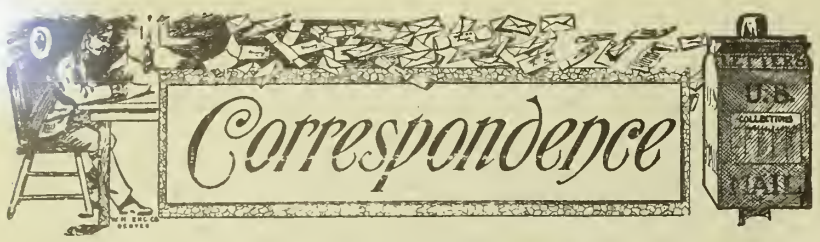
It matters not that strife ensues within the ranks; it matters not that obstacles bestrew the way. The cause is the cause of progress and the movement is the movement of humanity. It may falter, but only to gather fresh strength. It cannot fail.

At every sunrise we realize that we have advanced and we know that we are winning our way.

The Socialist crusaders are animated by the spirit of the working class revolution. Their zeal, their fidelity, their hope and their resolute determination have never been matched in all the history of the world. They never weary and they complain only that they cannot do more.

The poorest among them give the last of their substance with a prodigality the rich might envy. I have seen the little Jewish comrades in the East Side of New York triumph over their pinching poverty by eschewing food and joyfully inviting hunger pangs that they might give their last penny to the cause. From these fine proletarian souls, all aglow with the social spirit, born of their own common misery, I have learned the true meanig of consecration.

Some day the workers will be free and the race will be civilized, and until then it is well enough to know that the battle has begun and that we are steadily winning our way.



LOCAL NO. 249 ENTERTAINS.

Herculaneum (Mo.) Smeltermen's Union No. 249, entertained Dec. 23rd, and it was an occasion not to be forgotten soon by those fortunate enough to be present. I visited the local Dec. 5th and the attendance was not very large, and some of the most enthusiastic expressed themselves as being discouraged because the rank and file did not attend all meetings, as they felt they should, and I suggested the local appoint a committee to arrange some kind of an entertainment for the purpose of bringing the membership together for a social time. I agreed to help in every way possible to make the event successful and promised to return to Herculaneum on whatever date they should decide upon, nothwithstanding I was very busy in Illinois.

In a few days I was notified that I would be expected to fulfill my promise and should be on hand Dec. 23rd to help Local No. 249 celebrate. The committee appointed decided upon a grand ball. The K. of P. hall was rented, which is the best in southeast Missouri, and the best orchestra in Festus (a nearby town) hired and a perfectly congenial crowd united to do the rest. Business men of the town, smelter foreman and wife and union members and families seemed to forget the "no identity of interest" clause in the constitution and got so mixed in quadrille and two-step that if Gabriel had chanced to blow his horn you could not have been sure "which was which."

For those that danced—the floor and music was perfect—others that did not dance, enjoyed themselves in conversation and watching the jolly dancers.

The writer was ticket saleswoman, but found time to make merry with the rest before the close of the entertainment. Notwithstanding the expenses were high on account of Herculaneum not having a home orchestra, the union made all expenses and everybody pronounced the event a grand success.

Here's hoping Herculaneum will celebrate more frequently, as the membership know how to make a success of whatever they attempt. July 6th they gave a picnic that will not soon be forgotten, and in their recent ball they added new laurel wreaths to their already enviable reputation as entertainers.

PROMISING OIL AREAS IN TEXAS.

The feature of greatest interest in the petroleum industry in Texas in 1911, according to the United States Geological Survey, was the discovery and development of the Electra pool, in Wichita county, on the northern edge of the state. The oil in this field proves to be of an exceptionally fine quality, being almost identical with Pennsylvania oil. There is considerable prospect of extending this pool to the southeast and the southwest, and good indications of oil are found as far east as halfway to the next producing region, in Clay county. The latter district has not been as profitable as the new Electra field, but has yielded sufficient gas to supply Wichita Falls, Dallas and Fort Worth. Much prospecting is going on in the western half of Texas in many different localities, where seepages nd other indications show the probability of fine oil supplies.

HELL AND THE WAY OUT.

By Frederick Guy Strickland in Wheeling (West Virginia) Majority.

The workers do not need to argue a hell. They live in one. It is not necessary to die to find it. Hell is with them when they awake every morning.

But the joy of the situation is that we know the way out of present conditions. We have sturied our surroundings to some purpose. We have read the signs of the times. We know that the workers must get themselves together. And if the talk about a future hell divides us, we will lay that matter aside until we have gotten out of the suffering in which we now find ourselves.

The purpose of our getting together is to own our own collectively-used means of life. The common sources of the bread must be the common heritage, or no brotherhood is possible. And the lack of brotherhood is hell.

No preaching about individual "badness" will save us. If society itself that needs saving. "Man in his corporate capacity" is the subject of redemption. The call to the individual is to realize his social guilt.

The next step is to accept the full measure of one's social responsibility. This calls for a new heroism—the losing of one's life in a common cause. It means the defying of the Big Devil of public opinion. And many a man will walk up to the cannon's mouth who has not the courage to face the scoffings of his neighbors. Yet out of the social heroism of the present workingclass movement is being builded the ladder of human souls and bodies that will lift us out of the pit in which we now live.

UTAH'S DIVERSIFIED MINERAL INDUSTRY.

Utah is unique among the states in the diversity of its production of precious and semiprecious metals. It does not rank first in the production of any of these metals, but it stands well among the leaders in the production of gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc and vanadium minerals. In the production of lead and silver it ranks third; it ranks fourth in the production of copper, sixth in the production of gold, and seventh in the production of zinc. Forty per cent of the total production of the state, according to E. W. Parker, of the United States Geological Survey, is derived from the copper mines. The quantity of copper produced in 1911 was 142,340,215 pounds, valued at $17,792,527. The silver production was valued at $6,280,500. The principal silver-producing counties are also the chief producers of lead, the output of which was 55,198 short tons, valued at $4,967,820. Gold is the fourth in importance among the metal products of the state, and it amounted in 1911 to 217,020 fine ounces, valued at $4,486,200. About 25 per cent of the gold is obtained from dry or siliceous ores, but most of the output is obtained in the refining of copper. Some of the lead and zinc ores also produce gold.

Utah's zinc production was 7,004 short tons, valued at $798,456. The value of the metal production of Utah in 1911 was $34,325,503 out of a total value of all mineral production of $41,139,075. More than half of the remainder is obtained from coal mines, which in 1911 produced 2,513,175 short tons valued at $4,248,666. From 250,000 to 350,000 tons are made into coke annually, chiefly from the slack produced in the coal-mining operations.

The manufacture of Portland cement began in Utah in 1910, with an output of 811,800 barrels, valued at $1,005,960. The industry appears to have been overdone in the first year, for the production dropped in 1911 to 662,849 barrels, valued at $827,523.

Clay products of the state consist chiefly of common brick and front brick, with smaller amounts of vitirfied brick, drain and other tile, and a small output of pottery. The value of the clay products, exclusive of pottery, was $548,955 in 1911. The principal stone quarried in Utah is limestone, the larger part of which is used for flux in the smelters, although some is used for foundation work and for other building purposes. Utah produces also sandstone and granite. Other mineral products are asphalt, precious stones, lime, salt (gathered on the shores of the Great Sale Lake), arsenic, bismuth, graphite, gypsum, mineral waters, petroleum, phosphate rock, pottery, sulphur, vanadium minerals, sand and gravel.

HOW TO BE A MILLIONAIRE.

By George R. Kirkpatrick in Mental Dynamite.

If you wish to become a millionaire you can easily become one by observing the following logical directions:

Get a job that will pay you $1,200 a year. (Logically that's easy—for we now are in the midst of "unparalleled prosperity.")

Spend not more than $200 a year. (That's easy.)

"Save up" $1,000 a year. (That's easy—for if you will cut off one foot you can save a little extra on shoes.)

Keep up this saving $1,000 each year for 1,000 years. (That's easy—for Senator Hanna said, "The future is full of hope for the workingman." Did you ever try to pay rent with hope?)

If you wish to be a billionaire (as rich as Rockefeller) by saving your own earnings—why, all you have to do is to "save up" $1,000 a year for 1,000,000 years.

There is also another way to be a millionaire:

Buy some human labor power of people who are forced to sell their labor power.

Have a few hundred of these people apply this labor power—with tools, machinery, factories, etc.—and have each worker thus produce, each day, $6 to $8 worth of values.

Each day give each seller of labor power, say, $2 or $3—called wages—barely more than enough wages to enable the worker (by eating and sleeping and rearing children) to get more labor power to sell to you.

Give these workers "hot air" about freedom before election, and cold lead after the election, if they go on strike and get noisy.

BENEFICIARIES OF THE SYSTEM.

Conspicious among those who oppose and vilify Socialism are those who are beneficiaries under the present social system; those who have special privileges, secured through bribes and collusion with corrupt officials; or those who have inherited wealth of one kind or another, which their ancestors have seized upon to the enslavement and degradation of their fellow-beings, aided and abetted by those fawning, cringing, servile creatures who feed and enjoy themselves at the hands of the possessors of the stolen wealth filched from the unremitting toil of the working class during several thousand years. The masters have ever sought to keep cowed those who are and ever must be under the system beholding to them for a place to serve as a slave, and receive from their product a pittance barely sufficient to keep life in their bodies and in condition to continue the struggle for existence, until their posterity reaches the age where it can be more profitably employed; then the old, the worn and decrepit slaves are relegated to the rear. It is by keeping them cowed they can best be kept in servitude to gasping, avaricious molochs who have secured possession of the means of production and distribution, and through these reaches indirectly every avenue through which the people may live. It is an indisputable fact through these means they control the land, by controlling the means of distribution the products of the land; they control the homes, through controlling the very things necessary to them being homes.

There seems but one, and only one, way to successfully remedy these conditions, and that by or through the socializing of the things collectively used; by making them collective instead of private property, as at present. These conditions are but a natural outgrowth of the things people must use in common being allowed to become private property, thus giving a monopoly to those who control these things. These monopolies would neither be sought or desired if through their domination and control tributes could not in some way be levied off those who have lost control, but must still in some way have access to these things. The most of the people still believes it right, because they have been taught, if sober, industrious and economical, they themselves might readily secure possession of some form of monopoly and in turn benefit off the labor of their fellow-beings. The fact that an occasional one of the workers does break through the cordon with which the workers have been environed seems to satisfy them they all may do likewise, and that they have only themselves to blame that they do not succeed. So much for false teachers; so much for false teachings of the servile mouthpieces of the beneficiaries of this unjust, corrupt system.—M. A. Lowe.

PORCUPINE STRIKE NEWS.

South Porcupine, Ont., Dec. 21, 1912.

The master class in this district have now thrown off all pretense at observing the law, and enlisted the support of all the powers of government to assist them in carrying out their nefarious designs.

Last night (Friday) sixteen men were brought in, in the Pullman car "Inverness" and as soon as it pulled into the station, the Provincial police blocked the approaches to the cars, even those which formed part of the regular train, refusing to allow anyone to board the train.

Some of the boys, having the idea that the public had the right to use a railroad that they are supposed to own, insisted on their rights, with the result that four of them were badly clubbed and beaten up and thrown into jail, being held on bail of $1,000 each.

There can be no doubt that this whole episode was purposely arranged by the authorities in order to incite a disturbance, which would provide an excuse for the militia being shipped in to murder the workers wholesale.

We have dozens of witnesses who are willing to swear that one of the Provincial officers emptied his revolver in the attempt to murder a man who was doing his best to avoid trouble by leaving the scene of the trouble. This miserable caricature of insulted humanity is known, and he may rest in the assurance that somewhere, sometime, he will reap his reward; the reward of any other cur that, losing his usefulness to his owner, is spurned under his master's feet.

It should be noted here that the Thiel gunmen, who shot down our brothers in Timmins in cold blood, are still at liberty, the only one who was committed for trial being allowed out on $1,000 bail, and has not been seen since. If a slave tries to enter a public vehicle and only succeeds in getting in jail, his bail is $1,000 (might as well be $1,000,000) while a company tool can attempt murder and get away with it; $1,000 being less to the men who employ, than 10 cents is to a working man.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, the fight is going on with added vigor, and the ultimate result is no longer in doubt; the working class is now becoming too intelligent to allow themselves to be divided upon the field of industrial conflict, and defeated by detachments.

The gigantic strides that have been made in this respect may be seen by comparing this conflict with that of Cobalt in 1907.

At that time it was a simple matter for the labor skinners of Cobalt to get all the miners they wanted from the unorganized districts of the various Eastern provinces.

Today, notwithstanding that the scab herders of Canada and the United States have been scouring the country to secure miners to break the strike, it would not be too conservative an estimate to say that there are twenty competent men working in the mines of this whole camp.

The first bunch of real miners that the operators have been able to hood into coming up here deserted in a body when they discovered that they were required to work against their own class interests; and these men were from the vicinity of Sundury, where it has been the proud boast of the Canada Copper Company that an organizer of labor could not stay.

Authoritative word has been brought out from the Dome mines that even the scabs have organized a little strike of their own, as they all want to quit, and the company has refused to pay them.

The Hollinger Mines have seized on the personal effects of a lot of the men who quit their employ and refused to give it up, and when this was reported to the local judicial authority, he made the remark that "he did not give a —— if they ever got their baggage."

One thing is certain, that the workers in this camp are not getting what they voted for, as at the last election the workers here rolled up a big majority for the Socialist candidate, and whatever the result of the industrial fight may be, there will be some capitalist politicians who will sincerely regret having opened the slaves' eyes to what they may expect from a parasite government, under the present system of exploitation.—H. NEWS FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

R. F. Wilson.

Washington, Dec.—Representative Victor L. Berger of Wisconsin, the only Socialist in Congress, will have the opportunity early in January to probe into some of the graft for which the District of Columbia is notorious, since he has been appointed as one of a sub-committee of four to investigate alleged financial irregularities in stock-selling fire insurance companies which have sought haven in the favorable municipality of Washington.

It is predicted that this investigation will make astounding revelations of corruption in capitalist financial circles in the nation's capital, involving several men of national repute, and at the same time showing how trusting investors who put their savings into fire insurance stock are duped by the wily promoter.

The sub-committee which will conduct the investigation which was ordered after recent sensational charges of financial chicanery against the First National Fire Insurance Company and the Commercial Insurance Company, consists of Representatives Ben Johnson of Kentucky, Henry George, Jr., of New York, William C. Redfield of New York and Victor L. Berger.

Some of the most prominent men in the capital will be summoned as witnesses and the Socialist representative will have his first opportunity during his service in Congress to cross-examine some of the shining lights of the capitalist class of Washington—members of the small real estate and insurance ring which has been able to dominate affairs in the District of Columbia because the citizens of the district are denied the ordinary rights of American citizens—the right of suffrage.

The investigation is directed largely at George W. Ingham, insurance commissioner of the District of Columbia, who O. K.'d the affairs of the two fire insurance companies over the protest of the board of commmissioners of the District of Columbia.

Ingham is a nephew of Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire, who is chairman of the Senate committee on the District of Columbia

The names of Judge George Atkinson of the United States Court of Claims and Judge Ashley M. Gould of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia appear in the promotion literature of the First National Fire Insurance Company, and they will probably be brought into the investigation. Eldrige E. Jordan, just appointed vice chairman of the Wilson inaugural committee, is one of the promoters of the First National Fire Insurance Company. Another promoter of this company is Robert N. Harper, notorious for being the first man convicted for violation of the pure food law as a manufacturer of a fake headache cure, and who was a strong candidate for chairman of the Wilson inaugural committee.

The three original promoters of the insurance companies under fire attempted a similar operation in Syracuse, New York, but were closed out by the state commissioner of insurance as being purely a stock-selling concern. They sought the shelter of the easier insurance regulations of the District of Columbia. Although their headquarters have been maintained in Washington, they have sold no stock of the two companies within the District of Columbia, but their sales throughout the states are said to have been enormous. Recently the surplus of the companies became so bulky that they were invested in one of the newest fireproof office buildings just constructed in Washington, which they bought in for $1,500,000. Immediately thereafter —to be exact, in nine days—they listed this property in their assets at a valuation of $2,000,000. The commissioners of the District of Columbia questioned this procedure and asked Ingham to investigate. Ingham did so and put his official O. K. on the transaction, whereupon the commissioners appealed to the District committee of the House of Representatives for an independent investigation.

Instead of doing the expected and whitewashing the insurance companies, who swing a powerful influence in Congress, Chairman Johnson of the District committee, who at present is on the outs with the powers that be in Washington, picked as radical a group to do the investigation as he could find in his committee, including Berger, the Socialist, and Henry George, whose criticisms of the real estate assessments in the District of Columbia have put him in the bad books of the capitalists.

The investigation promises to be a hummer.

ARE YOU HEATHEN, OR CHRISTIAN? WHICH?

An Educated Hindoo Publicly and Proudly Confesses He is Not a Christian.

By R. A. Dague.

Once I was a member of an Orthodox church and called myself a Christian and gave money to send the gospel to the Heathen. While still thinking I was a fair sort of Christian, I met an educated Japanese in San Francisco, and entertained him at my home, and he made me ashamed of Christianity as we have been taught it and practice it in America. Now here is an account of the visit to Boston of the educated Hindoo—Bipin Chandra Pal of Calcutta who delivered an address at Lorimer hall, at the Moral Education association of Massachusetts.

He said, "I am not ashamed, of appearing before you as a Heathen. Heathen means one who is not a Christian, and I am not ashamed confessing that I am not a Christian. If I had any doubt on the subject when I left India, my two years' residence in Christian England and America, and my closest study of the religion in the fogs and mists of London and on the streets of Chicago, Boston and New York, in Piccadilly and other places, have removed every bit of doubt. I am prouder than ever of being a heathen, as distinguished from being a Christian.

"Buddhism does not exist in India, and has not existed there for centuries Ignorance is faith in many quarters, and I will not disturb that faith.

Some of your writers have said that the Hindoo is impracticable. If that is true then it is because a few English soldiers lord it over 300,000,000 of them. We may be impracticable as far as grabbing land and gold is concerned, but we claim to be far beyond Christian civilization in matters of ethics.

"When a begger comes to our door in India we do not send for a policeman and turn the beggar over to him, while we return to the enjoyment of our leg of mutton and strawberry shortcake, happy in the contemplation that we have done our Christian duty in sending a hungry man to jail. But even a little child will take a handful of rice or a couple of potatoes or a mango and give it to the beggar. We teach kindness by actions, not by pictures of a Sunday school lesson.

"And before the Christian civilization came among us it used to be the custom of our heathen India for every householder to stand before his door at mealtime and invite everybody in the neighborhood who was hungry to come and partake with him. We have felt that when we give we give for God, and when we receive we receive for God. It used to be the custom, too, for the children at mealtime to sprinkle crumbs of bread for the birds and animals who shared with us life in heathendom.

"People have come to India and have looked at us through Christian spectacles. May I ask you to keep your judgment for India in abeyance until you can come to verify for yourself what you hear about India?"

I am not surprised that this Hindoo is glad he is not a Christian. We have in fact precious little genuine Christianity in America. Ours is the bogus, the Paganistic brand given to us by Constantine who made vital changes in Christianity in both its doctrine and practice. This counterfelt or paganized Christianity has for centuries, deluged the world with blood, enslaved, robbed and butchered its millions, and today wherever it is in power, builds great warships, and expends more money for war than for schools.

Our brand of Christianity is a cruel, selfish, savage, blood-thirsty system. While preaching about universal peace, and universal brotherhood, and the Golden Rule, it practices none of it, and viciously opposes Socialism, which does champion those foundation Christian doctrines. The plain, naked truth is, that ours is the bogue brand of Christianity whose motto and practice is, "Every fellow for himself and let Satan take the hindmost."

Yes, the Hindoo was right in sizing up Christianity as it has existed since the days of the Emperor Constantine.

Personally I am a Socialist and as such, hold the man Jesus in high esteem. He uttered some sublime truths. His teachings have never been followed by the church. Its practice wholly differs from His and that of His twelve disciples.

Socialists come nearer representing Jesus and His contemporary followers, than any class of people I know.

I conclude that there are many individuals to whom these remarks do not apply, but I insist that the modern church, as an organized institution, is more Paganistic than Christian.—R. A. Dague.

THE SONG OF THE DAWNING.

I sing of the breaking Dawn!

Of a searching sun that is rising high in the heavens of Life, of education and discernment, of staggering brains unburdened of immensities untold;

Of clarified visions and sacred smiles of hope—throbbing hearts rejuvenated, bent backs straightened; the birth of a newer day, democracy populated by the minions of Truth;

Of gray-black citadels smouldering in the flames of mind-revolution, of mind matter developing—master strength rising superior to the devils of cunning and exploitation; of proft pillars tottering,

And Capitalism submerged.

On to the brighter day; poverty exposed to the searchlight of reality—the black mask falling from the eyes—the clash of fetters falling from the eyes—the clash of fetters falling—movement, breathless expectation, progress;

Freedom and Liberty—O sweet and triumphant peace; flowerng in the gutter—spreading in the slums, opening in the hovels; O the bright stream of education, how in their new-found exhileration they drink—

Ah, how they bend on those blessed banks and gulp down that cooling wealth; O how they delve and con over those illuminating pages, and caught in the whirlpool of enthusiasm read on and on;

Light—light, their tired minds cease not in the ardent quest; brain cells stir in their skull wombs—O stagnant brain cells, work—expand, fertilized by the flow Truth; O slumbering brain cells, revive;

And ye, O Superstitution and Ignorance, depart—to the black oblivion of the past, depart—and depart ye, too, O cowardice, and thou, O age-old conventionality;

Welcome fresh Spring of Thought and welcome Summer, thou dawning one of universal reconstruction.

Flower, thou bud of Freedom—wing forth thou social triumph; to the turmoil of the mill and the factory, sweatshop and mine—O from this murderous Hell—from these damnable prisons—O these festering cauldrons of despair;

Stamp in their hearts the spirit of revolt—O thunderous revolt—O mental revolution—O blessed class-consciousness;

Spread thou wild-fire of Hope—into the darkest nook spread the heart-blood of thy message, permeate by the glory of thy lesson; senses revive—on to the kingdom of man—brotherhood supreme!

O this steadfast uniting—O solidarity—Power immense; hand joined to hand, circling the globe, and all minds nurturing the spirit of Freedom and Liberty—glorious day!

O this loyal democracy, fashioned of sinew and muscle, and of quickened minds; of red blood, of high ambition, of righteousness and noble sacrifice;

O courage unblighted—conscience unstained; eyes clear and bright, with the honesty of sacred endeavor; of truths with firm foundations, of friendliness holy!

Hope for the child slaves—hope for the wage slaves, and hope for the mothers of men; O blessed future of strong women and stalwart sons and daughters; of abundance and plenty for all.

Comfort for all and sunshine for all and close binding love for all; O gradual ascendancy, progress unswaying!

King of my soul—king of my spirit—king of my throbbing youth, I feel it and sense it; I am triumphant—

And on the smothered lute
Sing I the dawning!—Exchange.

POETICAL

PROUD PLUTOCRAT.

By J. S. Yancey.

Proud plutocrat! Would you impart
  Some solace to the poor,
That toil may bear, with braver heart,
  What brutes could scarce endure?

Can you console the starving wretch
  With pious eloquence?
Can pangs of hunger even stretch
  Your sermons into sense?

Or can you cast their woes away,
  By saintly, smiling cheer,
By giving want, on Christmas Day,
  A dinner once a year?

Perhaps some sweet delightful book
  The starving may console!
Teach him the beauty of the brook,
  Its message to the soul!

The blunted brain of famine feast
  On jewels of the mind,
Or on the prattle of the priest
  Whose very dogs are dined!

The book you give that wretch to read
  Is it to free his will,
Or meek submission meant to breed
  That you may rob him still?

Can you inspire the poor to love
  The cursed chains that bind them
By pointing to the sky above
  While ever more you grind them?

Must men submit to your command,
  To crimes that never cease;
Be governed by an iron hand,
  Is that the path to peace?

Is that the road your book reveals
  To heaven high and holy?
When wolves are snapping at their heels,
  Shall men be meek and lowly?

Can you expect a race of slaves
  To ever be divine,
While governed by ungodly knaves
  Who kneel at Hammon's shrine?

Can you create from crooked dealing
  A spirit just and fair;
Restrain the wretch you rob from stealing,
  The ruined from despair?

Prevent the woman destitute
  From sinning for her bread.
Or check the hunger-driven brute
  Who slugs your haughty head?

If you cannot these ills prevent
  And more that I could name,
Then blame your godless government
  And hold yourself to blame.

Yet blame likewise the wretched masses
  For being led like sheep;
Vast millions shame the very masses
  By voting while asleep!

Yet labor has begun to wake,
  Begun to use her brains,
And shall, through Socialism, break
  Her cursed cruel chains.

IT'S UP TO US.

By Berton Braley.

Well, after all, the whole thing's up to Us.
  However we may try to shift the shame.
  It's you and I that really are to blame
If things are tangle and a muss.

If Might is right, if Goodness yields to Greed,
  If mammon thrives, and God is quite forgot,
  If evil reigns in many a beauty spot,
It is because We have not taken heed.

The wrongs that live are those We tolerate
  Because we have not tried to make them right;
  If Darkness where Justice call for Light,
If Love is trampled out by wrath and Hate,

If little children toil and women slave,
  If some men starve while other feast and waste,
  If Truth is lost and Liberty disgraced,
If millions fast from childhood to the grave.

It is because, for all our noise and fuss,
  We stay content with matters as they are,
  We have the final chance to make or mar—
Well, after all, the whole thing's up to Us!

THE THINKER.

By John Jerome Rooney.

(Upon seeing in the Metropolitan Museum of Art the heroic cast "Le Penseur," by Auguste Rodin.)

Alone he sits upon a barren rock,
His bowed back bare to every scourging wind
Silent and gnarled, like some old naked oak,
Riven, but still defiant of the storm.
His head hangs low, heavy with too much thought—
His steady gaze, that seems to search the ground,
Ranges the trackless heavens of the mind,
Pierces the stars and weighs the wheeling suns.

What martyrdoms of spirit scarred that bow?
What demons of the soul beleaguered it?
What ecstasies of hope? What hells of doubt?
He met the ancient shapes of monstrous might.
He met them and o'erthrew them with a thought.

He saw unnumbered hosts of Persia come,
Swarm over Greece and whiten all the seas—
A world in arms against a single man.
And, lo! he shot the arrows of his mind—
Power brandished high his myriad of spears
And crumbled into dust at Marathon!

The petty tyrant of a hundred towns,
Reeking with spoils of many a pillaged cot,
Reaches red hands to seize a people's life;
When, sudden, he feels a clutch upon his throat,
The grip of one bold word for Freedom's sake
Uttered by this lone watcher on the rock.

Nature rose up and crowned himself the king,
Bade puny man obey his iron rule
And be the voiceless servant of his might.
A flash of light across the heavens ran,
The solitary watcher raised his hand,
Plucked the white bolt out the blazing cloud.
Harnessed and worked it to his will and whim—
Lo, earth and air bore tribute to his feet.

Yet there he sits upon a barren rock
Seeing his ancient conquests with dim eyes;
Heedless of glory, so his task be done,
His spirit-gaze is on the forward track.
He seeks the path of justice for the weak;
Green fields of plenty for the huddled poor;
Play for the haggard children of the loom;
Light for the mind eclipsed by brooding want;
Peace as a blossom from the thorn of strife.
The outcast and the felon are his care.

Godlike he shares the sorrow of their sins
And in their wounds he pours the balm of love.
This is old Atlas bearing up the world,
The bound Prometheus agonized for man.

CHRIST'S SOLILOQUY.

Wm. E. Hanson, Butte, Mont.

(For the Miners' Magazine.)

"Is this the world I came to redeem,
Where cannons roar and bright swords gleam—
  And fields are covered with dead?
Where men thrive on the lives of slaves—
And slaves' children fill the shallow graves
  In their frantic battle for bread?
If this be the way they honor my word,
'T were as well my name were never heard,
  In this world of greed and gain.
In 'my name' they build me temples apace,
Wherein my teachings have never a place—
  Oh, God—was my coming in vain?

"The millions of poor that fill the mart,
Of which in earthly life I was once a part,
  Seems forgotten by God on high.
And those who wear my livery on Earth,
Enslave the poor from the hour of birth,
  And are deaf to humanity's cry.
I want not the altar nd sculptured shrine,
Hypocrite sermons and music divine,
  But Justice, and Mercy and Love.
Take me down from the cross where I've been for years,
Ye crucify still—I am blind with tears,
  As I gaze on this woe from above.
And in my place on the arms of the cross,
Place Wealth and Power, Profit and Loss,
  And worship on bended knee.

"My name ye use as a cloak and mask,
And my Father's blessing unblushing ask,
  While professing to follow Me.
Ye steal and starve, ye murder and kill,
While pretending to bow to a Father's will,
  Ye are bartering lives for gain.
As I look on the graves of the nameless dead,
I ask, as I see the tears that are shed,
  Oh, God—was my coming in vain?

"Oh, the night is dark, and the night is long,
But the poor are many, the poor are strong,
  And daybreak will come again.
"With my crown of thorns on the cruel cross.
All that I gave—I count but dross,
  For my coming was not in vain."

WHY RESIST STRIKERS?

One of the conundrums that is mighty hard for the average citizen to answer these days is this: Why does any big corporation or combine approaching the power of monopoly make any effort to resist a strike or even resist the suggestion of a strike on the part of its workmen?

In order to make the answer almost impossible, take a look at the immediate results to the anthracite coal trust following a short strike of its miners about a year ago.

After the men had been out long enough to allow for the cleaning up of accumulated supplies, the managers of the trust, of whom George F. Bear is the big boss, threw up horrified eyes and hands, made horny, in spots by clipping coupons, and said: "You win." Thereupon there was an increase in the anthracite miners' payroll aggregating the sum of $6,440,000 annually.

But, also, thereupon, those callous-fingered financiers, rapidly recovering from the shock of being held up by the miners, proceeded to recoup themselves—recoup, that's a word used in high finance, and it means get even, and get even a-plenty—by adding 25 cents a ton to the price the public was compelled to pay for anthracite coal. The annual output of the trust mines is about 60,000,000 tons.

So the tabulated account for that strike stands thus:

Higher pay to miners	$ 6,440,000
Higher cost of coal	15,000,000
Higher trust profits	$8,560,000

Now, why should a monopoly resist a strike? That's the conundrum.—Fresno Labor News

THE PUPPETS OF THE PRESS.

"I am paid $150 per week for keeping my honest opinion out of the newspapers I am connected with. Others of you are paid similar salaries for similar things. Any one who would be so foolish as to write his honest opinion would be out on the street looking for another job. The business of the journalist is to destroy the truth, to lie outright, to pervert, to vilify, to fawn at the feet of mammon and to sell his country and his race for his daily bread. We are the tools and vassals of rich men behind the scenes. We are the jumping jacks; they pull the strings, we dance. Our talents, our possibilities, and our lives are all the property of other men. We are intellectual prostitutes."—Speech of John Swinton, well known New York journalist, at newspaper banquet.

The worst of it all is, John Swinton tells the truth in the above. There is not in the United States today a single daily newspaper of any great circulation that can be at all depended upon to tell the truth upon any matter in which members of the wealthy class are interested. And this is not a bold statement to make. Daily newspapers of any size are naturally the property of wealthy individuals, because it requires great capital to run them. They could not be expected to champion the cause of the poor—and mean it. The Chicago World upon this subject recently said:

Some rich men "keep" a cow so as to be sure and have fresh milk on their table. They also "keep" a stable. They "keep" most anything around from cows and horses up to women and lawyers. Whatever will gain their ends the capitalist personally and the capitalists as organized into a system, "keep" for their use and pleasure. So it is with the newspapers. Not one big corporation is to be found but has one or more "kept" newspapers. These newspapers give service just like a "kept" cow. There is nothing wrong about this, except the hypocritical pretense of these papers that they tell the facts and report the truth about what is happening in the city, state and nation. These "kept" newspapers are like hired lawyers. They tell only so much of the truth as will help their clients. And as often as falshood will accomplish results they print falsehood. Every man who knows the newspaper game knows that this is ordinary, everyday truth around a newspaper office. Those who suffer are the people who take these papers "kept" by the corporation and believe what they read.—Chicago World.

THE SERMON.

By E. J. R.

It was Christmas morning and the hearts of men warmed to their fellows. Christian charity diffused itself through the air and made one man call the other brother. I sauntered along the avenue and tried to think kindly of my fellow man. All sorts of people passed me by, but I seemed to distinguish only one characteristic in them all. It was a kind of pellucid warmth that permeated through them and radiated from them and about them like a genial haze. Cast and class and all were melted, and I seemed to feel the heart-pulse of all mankind. There was not one I hated, not one I despised. They were all kin to me and I was kin to them all. Tears of rapture welled to my eyes, and I could have cried out with the hysteria and the joy of it all.

The air was as balmy as in May and I could have swooned with the delicious fragrance and delight of this all encompassing love. Oh children of men, how happy you could be if only you knew! Every day should be Christmas Day, and every eve Christmas Eve. Thus I thought and thus I felt, if my feelings were expressible in words.

Before me stretched the wide and peaceful street, in its very restfulness it seemed to be recuperating from something arduous and painful. There was an air of halted traffic, of silent mill wheels, in its shuttered stores and barred warehouses. It appeared to be awaiting the magic call of the master magician to reawaken into a feverish activity. Its quiescent attitude impressed itself upon me but for a moment and then as my eyes dwelt upon the beautifully chiseled spire of a church, rising high and trying to pierce to the azure blue of the vast dome above, while the sun glinted from its gilded cross, and as my eye took in the moorish turrets that clustered all about the magnificent edifice I thought that such temples alone were fit to consecrate to the worship of love.

I entered within its portals and the music of the organ stole upon my consciousness and transported me to the seventh heaven of delight; I was exalted and my heart opened up and embraced the world. The music ceased and in my pew I sat doubled up, my body craned forward, eager to catch the last vibrating chord of melody. The beautiful service continued, and soon the soft velvet tones of the preacher were wafted up to me, and I could distinguish as from a distance the same striving for oneness with his fellows. In a sort of luxurious, dreamy way he tried to sound the same keynote to the wells of human emotion. He told of a dreamer who had dreamt and suffered and died. He told of the dream that he had handed down through the dreamless ages, and of the final regeneration of that dream in the busy world of today, where men had time to step aside and be their brother's keeper. He told of deeds of charity and the eternal goodness of those who dwelt in the high places. He spoke of himself as God's shepherd and he called the [illegible] to come unto him that they might be led back into the ways of right[illegible]. I felt that here was a brother trembling with desire to be of help, and I thought of all those benighted who needed help, and I wondered that any one was cold or hungry or naked. I laughed at the foolishness of the sheep that had strayed from the fold, and then it struck me that this shepherd did not know of many sheep that had strayed from the fold. As suddenly I resolved that I would lead him to the waste places where these sheep dwelt. He could heal the sick and feed the hungry and clothe the naked and warm the cold as did the Man of Nazareth.

He spoke for a long time, but I was only dimly conscious of what he said. Beating tumultuously in my brain was the refrain, "I would lead him. I would lead him."

Almost impatiently I waited for him at the door. The day had lengthened into evening and a cool breeze that made it comfortable to wear an overcoat blew from the east. The last handshake had been exchanged and a fine light beamed in his eyes as he bid the last member adieu. He was about to re-enter the church when I accosted him. His glance was benign and gracious as he surveyed me with dreamy eyes. He bid me wait a moment while he re-entered the church and appeared a moment later, and arm in arm we strolled along as I told him of the sheep that needed tending. We had not walked a block when I was startled by a lurid flame from the bottom of a cellar that revealed for a moment in its fantastic glare the half-naked forms of human beings.

I recognized the palatial building above that cellar as a well known bakeshop, and I turned to him and said: "There are sheep who sadly need a shepherd." I prevailed upon him to come with me and enter the cellar. The scrawny bodies of ill-fed people, half-naked, dripped sweat. The air was stifling. No means of ventilation were visible. Cutting machines like instruments of torture stood about, and the perspiring forms moved and swayed in the ruddy glare like shadows in a phantom dream. It reminded me of hell, and these, I said, must be the tortured sinners. I tugged at the arm of the preacher and I asked him if hell was like that. He shuddered and drew away in horror as one of these phantom shapes approached him. He feared contamination. I asked him, "What was their sin?" And I wondered whether their sentence would ever be commuted.

I took him to the haunts of the lowly and I showed him sights such as no devil dreamed of, and in our pilgrimage I dragged him to the bottom- most pit. I opened up for his inspection the festering sores of society and he shrank back from the spectacle. I showed him where women sold their souls for a crust, and I challenged him to throw the first stone. I told him that the golden calf had not died without progeny—that it had bequeathed to us the dollar.

And I could see him with bowed head in the desolate silence of the night, his throat husky with emotion, his hands clenched, swear the great oath that millions have sworn—to consecreate his life to the cause of those millions who are resolved to drive forever the money changers from the temple.

All this had occurred in my imagination as I waited at the door, out of which the fashionable congregation was issuing, in little whirls and gusts of raiment. But even as I stood there so another applicant waited with outstretched hands, empty and blue with cold. And all passed by him unseeing. And so as the great door closed and the preacher joined a group of waiting women admirers, I also turned my back upon the great tall church, now empty and black within, as the scene of a crime.—New York Call.

THE MASTER CLASS ALWAYS REACTIONARY.

The following quotations from the mouthpieces of the ruling class prior to the Civil war make instructive reading at this time.

From these quotations it will be seen that the ruling class in this country have always opposed every effort on the part of the working people to raise their standard of life or improve their condition. The arguments used against the establishment of free public schools, the unfranchisement of the working people and the abolition of chattel slavery appear absurd in the light of history, but the arguments against Socialism will appear still more absurd to future generations when the writings of those who are now opposing Socialism pass into history and are read by our posterity.

Do these arguments in defense of slavery sound familiar?

Freedom is against the order of nature.—The Judiciary. "It is the order of nature and of God that the being of superior faculties and knowledge, and therefore of superior power, should control and dispose of those who are inferior. It is as much in the order of nature that men should enslave each other as that other animals should prey upon each other."—Chancellor Harper, of Southern Carolina, quoted in the "American Churches, the Bulwark of Slavery," Birney, 1842, p. 8.

Slavery an Eternal Institution.—The Press. "Let us declare through the public journals of our country, that the question of slavery is not and shall not be open to discussion—that the system is deep rooted among us, and must remain forever; that the very moment any private individual attempts to lecture upon its evils and immorality, and the necessity of putting means in operation to secure us from them, in the same moment his tongue shall be cut out and cast upon a dung hill."—Columbia, S. C., Telescope, quoted Birney, etc., p. 8.

Opposition to Slavery Unchristian and Anarchistic.—The Church. "It is our belief that slavery as it exists in the South is no evil, and is consistent with the principles of revealed religion; and that all opposition to it arises from a misguided and fiendish fanaticism, which we are bound to resist in the very threshold; that all interference with this subject of fanatics is a violation of our civil and social rights—is un-Christian and inhuman, leading necessarily to anarchy and bloodshed; and that the instigators are murderers and assassins."—The Rev. J. H. Thornwell, Methodist, at a public meeting in South Carolina in 1836. Quoted in Birney, etc., p. 17.

Slavery Sanctioned by Scripture.—The College President. "The relation of master and slave, may and does, in many cases, exist under such circumstances as free the master from the just charge and guilt of immorality." 1 Cor. 8:20-23.

This text seems mainly to enjoin and sanction the fitting continuance of their present social relations; the freeman was to remain free, and the slave, unless emancipation should offer, was to remain a slave.

"The general rule of Christianity not only permits, but in supposable circumstances enjoins a continuance of the master's authority. The New Testament enjoins obedience upon the slave as an obligation due to a present rightful authoriay."—Rev. Wilbur Fisk, former president Wesleyan University, quoted Birney, etc.—Exchange.

HALTING THE TIDE.

In testifying before the New York state factory commission, the president of the Engineers and Firemen's union is credited by the New York Times with stating, when asked what he would do to improve the condition of the workers: "Let us enact laws, and if a court throws them out, let us throw out the court."

The Times, which is a conservative newspaper, is quite shocked at the suggestion of recalling judges that invalidate laws designed to improve the condition of the working class, yet it is more shocked when it contemplates the fact that Mr. Roosevelt has been preaching that judges are not infallible and sneering at the bulwarks of our liberties. It recalls the colonel's words:

> I hope you will try to write into the laws of Illinois, just as I will try, with all my might, in my own state of New York, a provision that if the people want certain laws no official, governor, legislature or court shall have the power to prevent them. If any of our legislation is decided unconstitutional we, the people, should have the power to declare it constitutional. We shall not permit anything else.

The idea of appealing judicial decisions to the people—decisions in cases affecting public policies rather than private litigants—has long been urged by Socialist writers. Until recently the idea that the people are capable of determining what is and what is not constitutional has been dismissed as chimerical, having been one of those "vissionary" proposals which Socialists hatch every once in awhile to cause respectable and substantial citizens to worry, but now that the "Progressive" incendiaries have taken it up; it has become quite devilish. The Times says:

> The nation has met and beaten one form of nullification, and now must meet and defeat this more insidious doctrine of personal judgment of what the fundamental law is, and rejection of it if it is not liked. It is feasible to make constitutions fit laws, instead of laws fitting constitutions, if, in fact, that is the real will of the people. In that case there can be no resistance to making constitutions over into any form whatever, as many states are exemplifying. But when the will of the people supports constitutions as they are, the only course open to those who want constitutions otherwise is that declared by the colonel at the same time that he made the above declaration.

If the constitution had a fixed meaning, if it were not "made to fit laws" by courts or made by them to defeat laws, why is it that there is no unanimity of opinion among the judges themselves as to the constitution's meaning? Why these four to five decisions or decisions in which the preponderance of judicial opinion, including the various courts before which a given case may be tried, is often found giving support to the legality of legislative acts which the court of last resort declares to be null and void by a divided bench?

If the issue were submitted to the people they could not err more than the judges themselves, who are unable to agree as to the meaning of the constitution and decide the issue by a show of hands.

The recall of judicial decisions is not an untried experiment. The American people are now engaged in recalling the income tax decision of the supreme court, in which the court reversed itself and gave the constitution a new meaning.

The people, if they tried their hardest, could do no more than get on both sides of a question, or make the constitution mean one thing today and exactly the opposite thing tomorrow, as the supreme court repeatedly has done.

The supreme court, in spite of the fact that it was deemed the settled interpretation of the constitution that the federal government could tax incomes, after, in fact, it had taxed them with the court's consent and approvl, turned around and upset the settled practice of a century by a four to five decision that was changed from a decision upholding the law to a decision declaring it unconstitutional by one of the justices changing his mind over night.

It has taken nearly twenty years to recall the income tax decision, so cumbersome is the method provided in the constitution for its amendment where its meaning has been changed by judicial interpretation. Twenty years is too long a time to employ in recalling an obstructive decision.

It took four years to recall the Dred Scott decision and effce the judicial voiding of the Missouri compromise. It took the baynotes of the union soldiers to write the "war amendments" into the constitution—amendments which in the hands of the federal judiciary have been fashioned into bulwarks behind which our mammon-made masters have found shelter.

Without the gift of prophsey, we shall not undertake to predict how long the American people will remain content while the judiciary hampers and obstructs them in their endeavors to shape and conform the law to our changed and changing civilization. There are quite a few signs, including the signals of distress that our conservative contemporaries are flying, that it will not be long before the judicial dog will be ousted from the industrial manger. A nation moving with the impulse and mighty sweep of the American people can not long be held in check by five lawyers, even if they do wear wigs and are venerable with age, who project themselves in front of the moving mass and in the name of the constitution command it to halt.

The tide is running too strong for King Canute.
